DWIGHT L. MOODY.

NEVER during the past century has the Church of Christ had such an opportunity for the spread of the gospel as now presents itself. Never has the world manifested a greater interest in religious teaching. All substitutes for Christianity have proved a failure, and the nation is seeking once more for the old paths, the good old way. Let the church arise and make ready for the work.—From Mr. Moody's recent letter to the churches of the country.

My mind is made up on the question proposed, namely, the relative merits of Christianity and infidelity, under whatever other name it appears. Somebody once asked Charles Sumner to hear the other side of slavery. "Hear the other side?" he replied, "there is no other side." I would as soon discuss the relative merits of Christianity and infidelity. Nobody who studies history need hesitate in answering the question. And I know what Jesus Christ has done for me during the last forty years since I have trusted him. Let the members of your club accept Christ as their personal Saviour, and they need not waste time discussing such a question. If I had a remedy that never failed to cure disease for forty years, I should not stop to compare its merits with another remedy.—From Mr. Moody's letter to the Manhattan Liberal Club, declining its invitation to a debate.

WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING.

CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, JAN. 1.

It was a New Year's meeting indeed, with appropriate contributions in connection with the passage selected by the leader, Mrs. Nathaniel Greene, "Hitherto hath the Lord helped us," a review of the past history of this work, with the mercy which has crowned it and the success which has attended it, furnishing a warrant for strong faith in God's promises for the future.

Mrs. Judson Smith emphasized the thought that, with grateful recognition of divine guidance in the past, hearts full of the spirit of Christ make it possible to carry on the work, even though the future path be not always plain.

Miss Child noted some special events of the year in Turkey, India, Spain, Africa and Micronesia, and urged constant prayer in behalf of the missionaries, with courage to face whatever the coming months may bring. She recalled her recent visit in Sholapur, India, where Miss Fowler has an interesting school of twenty pupils. Arriving on Saturday, she was invited to the school Monday morning, to find that they had spent the day Saturday in decorating the room with tissue paper, and had a "good morning" greeting for her in plain English letters. As they gave the salaam one little girl kept her hand upon her forehead, and when asked why explained that she was making her salaam to the people in America who had sent her her clothes. Some of the girls in this school have recently volunteered to share their own grain and rice with two new girls who wished to come in, but for whom there was no money left to be appropriated.

Miss Child also reported incidents in other stations. Miss Gordon of Wai, India, writes of a father and mother whose means of support were so reduced by the famine that the father finally sold their child for a rupee, about thirty cents, and purchased some grain with the price. The mother, ignorant of the transaction, cooked the grain and called for her hungry child to share the food. When she learned the fact she rushed from the house and drowned herself in a deep well, and her husband immediately rushed to the same fate. Miss Daniels at Harpoot has arranged for a hot lunch for the day pupils, and finds the girls picking out the pieces of meat from their pilaf to carry home to their less favored brothers and sisters. Mrs. J. K. Browne gave extracts from a letter from Malatia, where Harpoot missionaries were visiting in their tour, illustrating one phase of the influence of Christianity upon Islam.

Mrs. Kellogg spoke of the indiscriminate giving on the part of many Christian people, which greatly cripples the work undertaken by the church in definite missionary lines, and urged discrimination in considering the many truly philanthropic calls of the present time in connection with the work to which Christian bodies are pledged. Mrs. Thompson said it was easier to get a hundred persons to give something to relieve a starving family than to induce one to give towards general Christian work.

The preservation of this nation, of any nation, is dependent on the religious observance of the Sabbath set aside for rest and prayer and for honoring the Lord. The Sabbath was well kept in the days of our forefathers. We are today too lax, and are becoming more so each year. We ought to return, in a large measure, to the customs of our fathers, and spend all the hours of the Sabbath in prayer and rest and in those employments that will make us a more religious people. The rest day must be preserved for the working men, and I hope there will never be a general desire to mingle amusement and frivolity with the observance of the Lord's day.—Senator John Sherman.

OUR 'ARMENIAN ORPHANS' FUND.

The receipts for the week ending Jan. 5 carry the fund beyond the twenty thousand dollar mark. Meanwhile reports are just beginning to come from the field of the use to which money cabled earlier has been put. Dr. Raynolds of Van, in the very act of preparing a letter appealing for the 5,000 orphans in the vicinity of that city, received our cable remittance, and takes it as an answer to the promise, "While ye are yet speaking I will hear."

It will accommodate us in sending receipts if stamped and addressed envelopes accompany contributions.

Amount received during the week ending Tuesday noon and acknowledged in detail by individual receipts	$ 1,565.20
Previously acknowledged	18,846.46
Total	$20,411.66

TRUTH EMBODIED IN A PERSON.

To the man who has wearied himself in seeking for the truth amid abstract doctrines and formal creeds it is an unspeakable relief to find that the truth is a personal being, and that Christ himself is the truth. This, as I interpret his book, was the experience of Berdoe. He was a student of medicine. He became an agnostic. Entangled in the toils of unbelief, yet eager to find some satisfaction for conscience and heart, he asked a certain theological professor where he could find light. And the professor wisely said to him: "Buy a set of Robert Browning." Browning's continual insistence that love is the central secret of the universe, and that this love is demonstrated in Christ, turned the medical student from an agnostic into a believer. Not first doctrine and then Christ; not first creed and then Christ; not first inspiration and then Christ; not first Scripture and then Christ; but first Christ and then Scripture, inspiration, doctrine, creed. This is both the order of logic and the order of experience.—President Strong of Rochester University.

The Book of The Pilgrimage

An Appreciation from

The Christian Register

"Not with pilgrim staff and scrip, not footsore and weary, and begging from house to house, did The Congregationalist's New World pilgrims make their journey to the Old World shrines. Just how comfortably and happily and sensibly the New World pilgrims can make such a journey may be seen in the charming 'Book of the Pilgrimage,' just issued by W. L. Greene & Co., at the office of The Congregationalist in Boston. The book is a fascinating record of the pilgrimage to England and Holland in June and July of the present year. The pilgrimage letters which furnish the basis of the book were written by Miss Frances J. Dyer, one of the editors of the paper. The graphic narrative is illumined by an abundance of pictures gathered from many sources, some made by the camera especially for this volume. We heartily commend the enterprise of our orthodox contemporaries in trying to see so much of this world before they see the other."

Just the thing for Weddings.

Marriage Chimes

For True Lovers.

Compiled by M. C. Hazard, Ph. D. Pp. 98. 75c.

This dainty little book contains some of the choicest poems in the language on Love, Marriage and Home.

It also has six full-page emblematic drawings with corresponding tail-pieces by Ipsen. A handsome steel engraved wedding certificate on parchment paper is bound into the book if desired, though it is also furnished without it. Bound in white and gold, gilt edges, with cover design of orange blossoms and marriage bells.

It is equally appropriate for a wedding souvenir or a wedding anniversary gift. Pastors will find it the most acceptable souvenir and certificate combined that has ever been issued at a moderate price.

A 25c. Pattern FREE

Ladies' Bebe Waist with Mushroom Sleeves.

To Every One

HOW many words do you think you can correctly spell with the letters in the word OPPORTUNITIES? Using each letter as desired, but not more times than it appears in Opportunities. Proper nouns, obsolete and foreign words not allowed. Words spelled alike but having different meanings, count as one word. Work it out as follows: Poor, Tin, Tins, Nut, Run, Runs, etc.

Our Offer.—We will pay $100 for the largest list, $50 for the second largest, $25 for the third, $10 each for the next five, $5 each for the next ten, and $1 each for the next twenty-five. That is to say we will divide among forty-three contestants the aggregate sum of $300, according to merit. Don't you think you could be one of the forty-three? TRY IT.

Our Purpose.—The above rewards for mental effort are given free and without consideration for the purpose of attracting attention to MODES, by May Manton, the most popular up-to-date Fashion Magazine in the world. Its 36 pages, replete with beautiful illustrations of the latest styles in ladies', misses' and children's garments, make it a real necessity in every household; the Designs and Fashion Hints, being by May Manton, render it invaluable as an absolutely reliable Fashion Guide.

Our Conditions.—You must send with your list of words 25 cents (stamps or silver) for a Three Months' Trial Subscription to MODES.

Our Extra Inducement.—Every person sending 25 cents and a list of 15 words or more, will, in addition to three months' subscription, receive by return mail a pattern of this ladies' bebe waist with mushroom sleeves, No. 6959 (illustrated above), in any size from 32 to 40 inches bust measure.

Our Aim.—The present monthly circulation of MODES exceeds 50,000. We aim to make it 100,000.

This contest will close February 15th next so the names of successful spellers may be published in the following issue of MODES, but SEND IN YOUR LIST AT ONCE. For our responsibility we refer you to any Mercantile Agency. Address:

FACTS Worth Remembering for 1897

TO begin the new year's church business right you should have a good Church Record Book. The best is the PILGRIM CHURCH RECORD, published by your own society at $2.00 and upward.

HAS your Sunday School Library been replenished recently? Remember some of the best books are issued by YOUR OWN SOCIETY. Some of the new issues are very attractive and teach important lessons.

EVERY Congregational Sunday School should, and most of them do, use the PILGRIM LESSON HELPS. If your school does not, isn't 1897 a good time to begin? Samples free. Our S. S. Record Books are also the best.

NOW is the time for ministers to get some good books for home reading and study. OUR GENERAL CATALOGUE gives our reduced prices on the best books from all publishers. Send for one.

EVERYBODY should have a list of the year's S. S. Lessons, Y. P. S. C. E. Topics, etc., handy for reference. Our PILGRIM SUNDAY SCHOOL TREASURY has all this and much more. 4 cts.; $2.00 per 100; $2.40, postpaid.

WHY not start a HOME DEPARTMENT in your Sunday School? It is the greatest Sunday School extension movement of modern times. Hazard's Home Department book, 25 cts., tells you all about it.

YOU cannot afford to longer use Cruden's Concordance now that WALKER'S is such an immense improvement upon it, and only $2.00. We want agents to sell Walker's. It has 50,000 more references than Cruden's.

EVERY college girl should have the "MARY LYON YEAR BOOK," containing a daily thought from this great pioneer in women's higher education. $1.25; beautifully bound. $1.00, postpaid, to any one mentioning this advertisement.

ARE you aware that business sent to the Congregational bookstores helps SUNDAY SCHOOL MISSION WORK? Our business department is the largest single contributor to it, appropriating $3,000 to $5,000 annually.

REMEMBER that the appropriation we now make could be doubled if we had EVERY CONGREGATIONALIST AS A CUSTOMER. May we have you, and your church and school?

HOME MISSIONARY FUND.

We are grateful at the increasing interest in this fund shown the past two weeks. It will be betraying no one's confidence if we say that we have never received so many letters from pastors of small frontier churches, regretting their inability to subscribe for the paper, as this year. We want to help these worthy men and will do our full share if the contributors to the fund will help us. Another year many of these pastors will be able to take the paper for themselves. Sunday schools, like the one mentioned below, may do good service through this fund.

Two More Opinions.

"I am glad to see that you improve on these topics from year to year. Have always liked them, but they seem to grow constantly better."—OHIO.

"The best yet."—COLORADO.

NOT long ago Mr. Moody preached to the convicts in Sing Sing prison. His subject was Partakers of the Divine Nature. He told them that human nature is sinful; that it can be redeemed through Christ; that the only way human nature can become partaker of the divine nature is through the new birth by the power of the Holy Spirit into the divine life; that the first step to this new birth is to gain the mastery over self, the control of one's passions, so that there shall be no hindrance to the new birth; and that the divine life is the realization of God's purpose for every soul. The gospel which Mr. Moody preached to those prisoners is just the gospel needed in Boston today. Human nature which has not fallen into crime is still sinful, and, while criminals are separated by prison walls from fellowship with it in the outer world, it shares the same need, and both can receive the same redeeming grace. Without that we are all condemned before God. With it we are partakers of his nature. Whoever preaches this gospel in sincerity and in the power of the Holy Spirit finds response in the hearts of men and women wherever he meets them. May it be proclaimed with renewed earnestness in every pulpit in these opening weeks of the New Year.

The old question of the taxation of churches and of colleges seems to be coming up again for discussion. Those who are considering it will do well to jot down in their note-books some figures concerning the taxation of other properties which are of advantage to the general public. For example, according to the United States census of 1890, railway corporations owned 17 03 per cent. of all the taxable wealth of Minnesota, but paid only 5.02 per cent. of the total taxes. In Wisconsin they owned 16 46 per cent. of the property of the State, but paid 6 8 per cent. of taxes. In Iowa, owning 19.72 per cent. of the wealth, they paid 7.92 per cent. of the State taxes. In North Dakota, owning 35.53 per cent. of the property, they paid 6.24 per cent. of the taxes. These figures are taken from an article in The Independent by Mr. L. G. Powers, commissioner of labor for Minnesota. Before imposing a tax on the institutions for the promotion of morals and education, it would be well to consider plans for more equitable taxes on properties which yield some pecuniary return to their owners.

Nothing is easier than to run an established business into bankruptcy. Thousands are doing it every year. It only needs a little carelessness, a few unnecessary risks, a neglect at one point, timidity at another and rash overconfidence at a third, and the losses so far overbalance the gains that the business comes to a stop. There may be a show of confidence for a while, but sooner or later collapse is inevitable. It is possible also to handle the business of the Christian life so improvidently that, so far as influence for good is concerned, it shall be bankrupt. A little carelessness, a few neglects of duty, some risky trading with the powers of evil in the world, evident, perhaps, in worldly gain and certainly in hardening of character, all showing that Christ is only admitted to the second place, and the man's influence is gone. Sobriety, which does not mean gloom but honest care in handling our own life as a stewardship for God, is necessary to influence, as influence is necessary to the highest Christian joy. How can a bankrupt Christian be a joyful Christian? We miss the delight of service, not because we have gone so far as to profess Christ but because we have not gone so far as to live for him.

It is comforting for those of us who are conscious of our ignorance to know that great men who have preceded us have not been able to solve all the puzzling questions which Christian religion is putting to us. Thus it is reported that after Melanchthon's death there was found a note-book on his table in which the reasons were written why he did not fear death. On one leaf stood the words, "Thou wilt be free from sin; thou wilt be delivered from anxiety and from the rage of theologians." On the other leaf were the words, "Thou art coming to the light; thou wilt see God and his Son; thou wilt know the wonderful mysteries which thou couldst not penetrate in this life: why we are created as we are, and not otherwise, and what is the union of the two natures in Christ." How gladly we would know what this union is, as well as why we are brought into the world to fight the battle of sin from the first moment of conscious existence to the last. The reformers knew whom they believed. So may we.

The difference between German and American theologians in their study of the Bible is said to be illustrated by two questions. The German asks first of each statement to be considered, "Is it true?" The American asks, "What will be the consequence if it is believed?" A recent address by Professor Harnack of Berlin, as translated for the Literary Digest, would seem to suggest the importance of both questions in order correctly to answer either. Professor Harnack is perhaps the most influential theologian in Germany. He declared that historical Protestantism is dying out. It was a church, he said, based on a creed drawn from the Holy Scriptures. But theological science has become secularized and its confidence in its written sources is disappearing. It is also as independent of the traditional teachings of the church as of the Scriptures. Professor Harnack says that two things have been preserved from the old Protestantism, which in fact constitute the gospel. These are: (1) that religion is nothing else than an attitude or sentiment of the heart, trusting in God; (2) that in Protestantism this trust in God is found united with the simplest and plainest morals in a most intimate manner. But, in our judgment, if the trust in God of holy men of old was not the result of a knowledge of God who revealed himself to them, and if they left no trustworthy record of the revelation, neither will such trust abide among men, nor the simple and plain morals which were united with it. This fear of consequences is a real motive with us for believing that the Scriptures record a genuine revelation of God. But we are satisfied also by the evidence in history and in our own experience that they are true. When Protestantism in Germany ceases to find adequate support in the Scriptures and in the traditional teachings of the church, it will fail and so will any other form of Christianity.

MR. MOODY'S PRESENCE IN BOSTON.

During the twenty years in which Mr. Moody has been before the American public as an evangelist he has held only two protracted series of meetings in Boston, although he has been here on many other occasions for the purpose of special addresses and sermons. His first campaign in 1877, features of which are recalled elsewhere in this paper, took place not long after his return from England, and the results of it were far-reaching. Four years ago he came again to Boston, establishing his headquarters at Tremont Temple, where for two months noon meetings were held daily, the attendance never falling below 1,500 persons, and reaching that minimum only on the most unpleasant day of the winter. His plan of operations then was to supplement these noon meetings in the heart of the city by evening assemblages elsewhere, and he visited successively various portions of the city and suburban districts.

The method of the campaign ushered in this week varies considerably from that heretofore adopted. Tremont Temple is again to be the scene of the great mass meetings, but they are to be held in the morning at 10.30 and in the afternoon at 3, and for the present there will be no evening meetings, and none at a distance from the Temple. Mr. Moody's idea is that individual churches, or groups of churches, should supplement the Tremont Temple influences by holding special meetings designed for their respective localities. He has no desire to monopolize public attention, but wishes, on the other hand, that there should be many centers of special evangelism, and he rejoices in every indication that churches under their natural leaders or, by availing themselves of other evangelists, are arousing themselves to serious and definite work.

The adoption of this plan of procedure gives a hint as to the probable character of Mr. Moody's preaching. He will strive to arouse Christians to break up the formalism and to bring to an end the apathy of churches wherever such detriments to the progress of the kingdom exist. He hopes to make his meetings of service first of all in promoting a higher type of Christian life and service not only in the immediate vicinity but throughout New England. He will not neglect the preaching of the gospel to the unconverted but that phase of his endeavors will, for the present at least, be subordinated to the carrying out of the other purpose which has long been gathering strength in his mind.

Mr. Moody comes here from a series of six weeks' meetings in New York city, the influence of which through newspapers and other channels has extended far and wide over the country. He says that he has never conducted a more satisfactory campaign. Some of its features are set forth elsewhere in this paper by a New York pastor. His methods in that city have largely shaped his program for Boston, and there is every reason to believe that as great and desirable results will follow his work here. He came at the invitation of local ministers, on whose committee are representatives of four denominations. The business arrangements are in the competent hands of the well-known layman, Mr. Henry M. Moore. May the great evangelist receive a fresh accession of power from on high as he comes among us and may the churches be attentive and responsive to his message.

CONCERNING LEAST THINGS.

It is certain that most of our happiness in the new year will depend upon little things. Great choices, decisive steps—as the world calls them—will probably be very few for any of us, but the result of the year's living will be determined by a multitude of little efforts and decisions, any one of which we may be tempted to think lightly of.

Life seldom makes progress by leaps and bounds. It is rather, in the oft-repeated figure of our Lord's parables, a growth. We cannot see its progress from hour to hour, but we have no difficulty in recognizing its tendency. Little temptations are the forerunners of great falls. It is at the outposts that the enemy begins his successful war. Would it not be well for us, therefore, to post our sentries of prayer and watchfulness at the very openings of the way of sin? The spirit of obedience is shown in care for little duties. Is it not our wisdom, therefore, to prove ourselves in this form of self-discipline before we are subjected to harder trials? Regularity of prayer and worship holds the key to the enjoyment of communion with God. Is it not wise to enter constantly that door of strength and beauty?

It was not this habit of attention to the essential little things of life which our Lord condemned. The Pharisees invented petty observances which left out the spirit of the law, but this is carrying the spirit of unselfishness into all the details of life. If any one imagines that he is to become a perfected disciple by beginning with the large observances to the neglect of the little ones, he will learn his folly in bitter experience. The test of life is action, and action has most to do with what we call the petty details of life. Love of the brother whom we have seen is evidence and practice for the love of our unseen Father. Ministry to the brethren is the only opportunity of ministry to Christ. The spirit of thankfulness for little gifts from day to day is the best preparation for the glory which it is beyond the heart of man to conceive.

It is in social relations, however, that the importance of little duties and observances appears most urgent and inviting. The happiness of home, the comfort of friends, the large, or halting, witness for the joy of Christian service which we bear, depend far more than we imagine upon common words spoken in love or carelessness. The very tones of the voice in ordinary conversation—and much more in the inevitable disagreements of intimate acquaintance—tell of our Christian attainment or neglect.

Which of us, looking back, but wishes that his time might have been spent to better advantage, with more loving service to his friends and more effective witness to the faith? For ended days the present offers only space for repentance, but the little, pressing, momentous opportunities go on, the little vexations continue to annoy, the little temptations assail and, too often, find us careless still, in spite of all regrets. Yet out of these choices and opportunities, which are so little and which pass so swiftly by, our character is growing toward some decisive and unchangeable result.

LET THE CHURCHES BEGIN.

"The future of the American republic depends upon the development of the American conscience," said Harper's Weekly recently in commenting upon the Moody meetings in New York. To that business our churches in and about Boston are being summoned with especial emphasis as Mr. Moody begins his work among us. In his appeal he says, "First, let us have a revival of righteousness among ourselves and then open wide our churches to those whom we have so long neglected." It is a fact which every thoughtful man has faced with more or less of courage, that our national and social need is not so much for the adoption of new institutions or the modification of existing laws as it is for the education of the public conscience and the improvement of the average type of man. It was the disinterested patriotism of the fathers which made the success of the American Revolution possible under a system of confederation which was always threatening to fall to pieces by its own weight. A higher standard even than—let us say the standard of Washington and Franklin—would have lightened the task; yet few would be willing to claim, we suppose, that the average of disinterested service is as high in our modern legislative bodies as it was in the Continental Congress.

It is the office of the church to educate the consciences of men. She does this for her own members, but also for those outside her membership by holding up a standard which men may disregard but must respect. The leaven grows and spreads and does its office beyond the limits of sight. Wise men who are not believers understand this and are loth to see the influence of Christianity lessened or broken. They feel the need of the machinery of the churches for police purposes if nothing more, and are well aware that if it were destroyed there is nothing to take its place. They would like to see its efficiency increased along this line—a wish in which the members of the churches must heartily join.

This duty of helping to educate the conscience of the people which God has laid upon the churches is also an opportunity. In its fulfillment one of the great ends of Christ's kingdom is to be attained. Every thoughtful disciple must feel that success in this work must be one of the best evidences of faithful stewardship as well as one of the best methods of increasing that attractiveness of the churches which is the best measure of their efficiency. Power is attractive. When the churches are a great moral power in the community the history of Judah in King Asa's time will be repeated: "They fell to him in abundance when they saw that the Lord his God was with him."

The first step toward raising the level of right thinking and unselfish living in the nation must be the uplift of the standard of the church's own life and thought. The Christian conscience must be educated first, because judgment will begin at the house of God. The pastors and deacons of our churches are the natural leaders in a movement of deepening spiritual life which will be felt from one end of the land to the other. This effort comes first in order of time and is first in importance. Without this, gain in knowledge, wealth and numbers counts for little. There never was a better opportunity or a more fitting time for this purification and enlargement of spiritual life at the centers of influence than exists today. The promise of God's presence was never more assured. This winter may be the beginning of an unexampled spiritual growth and extension of righteousness if God's people, with united faith and effort, will but use the opportunity which is ready to their hand.

PROMISES FOR THE OPENING YEAR.

Strictly speaking the promises of God have no more to do with the opening year than with its passing or its closing. They always hold good. But there is a real and an important sense in which they seem to have a special significance as the year begins. It is a time when thoughtful, conscientious persons have been looking back over their spiritual history, regretting their lapses from goodness and determining to do better in the future. It therefore is a time when they especially need and appreciate encouragement from above. It affords them an additional degree of strength to be reminded afresh just then that the Almighty Father has pledged his sovereign word to forgive and help them. The trustworthiness of his promises becomes doubly precious and invigorating.

It is the eternal faithfulness and omnipotence of God which make his promises sure. He is the embodiment of truth and power. With him is no variableness nor so much as the merest shadow of turning or of weakness. What he says he means. What he has promised is certain to be fulfilled. In the cases of even the wisest, mightiest, most willing human friends, the most positive pledge always is uncertain because of the nature of things. There always is the possibility that, in spite of the good will and honest endeavors of him who made it, unforeseen and unavoidable conditions may defeat its fulfillment. The qualification, "if it be possible," always is implied. But no such limitation attaches to the pledges made by God. No conditions can arise unsuspected or unconquerable by him. The word of God, once uttered, standeth sure.

This fact renders our duty twofold. We are to believe simply and unfalteringly in the divine promises. They are solid foundations for faith and we are to stand upon them erect and firm. We also are to act as if we believed them thus, to go straight forward when and whithersoever they point us, no matter what obstacles may seem to exist, assured that the way will open in God's own time. Thus both we ourselves and all who know us will be encouraged and enabled to win noble successes in God's name.

CURRENT HISTORY.

Freedom of Speech and Thought in Canada.

On Dec. 27 the Roman Catholic clergy of the Province of Quebec, speaking from their pulpits, placed The Electeur, the chief Liberal organ of the Province, under the ban, and forbade all Roman Catholics to read, buy, circulate or labor for the contumacious journal, under pain of incurring mortal sin and refusal of the sacraments if they disobeyed.

The reasons given for this act of the bishops are: That one year ago its editor dared to protest against clerical interference with a then pending by-election in the Province; that he recently reprinted a pamphlet written by an able French Liberal, in which he sharply defined the spiritual and political spheres of activity of the clergy, and intimated that it would be better for them to cease posing as mentors in politics; that he approves the Laurier administration's settlement of the Manitoba school controversy. The results of this boycott by ecclesiastics already apparent are most significant. The Electeur is dead, for it were useless for it to fight against such an edict, but a new organ, with essentially the same views and backed by the same men, already is in the field. The proprietor and editor of The Electeur are considering the duty of suing the archbishop and bishops issuing the mandement, in order to test the legality of their action and their power to suppress free thought and ruin a prosperous property. Most of the Liberal and many of the Conservative Roman Catholic laymen of the Province condemn the action of the bishops as both unjust and impolitic, and the press of the Dominion, irrespective of party, warns the clerical despots that they have raised an issue on which they may ride to their permanent undoing. Taken as a forerunner, the act seems to imply that the hierarchy has decided to reject the ministry's plan of settling the Manitoba dispute, and is preparing to dragoon the French Liberals into desertion of Premier Laurier. He replies that he is confident "that the Catholics will render to God what is God's and to Cæsar what is Cæsar's," and the tone of the French and Irish Catholic press of the Dominion indicates that if the ultramontane party forces the issue, and compels the Catholic electors to choose between Premier Laurier's theory of church and state and its theory, Premier Laurier will win. The independent action of these electors in the last election, and their indifference to the hierarchy's mandement then issued, points the way to other revolts. It is to be hoped that the issue will be joined and tested both in the courts and at the polls. Disciplined and chastened by a punishment given by Canadian electors, the ultramontane faction of the Roman Catholic Church in the United States may feel less inclined to challenge the organic law and inbred spirit of our land, as they will sooner or later if given opportunity to indulge in inherent propensities.

Ireland's United Front.

When the British Parliament reassembles the ministry will be faced by a combination of Irishmen such as men of this generation have not seen, demanding a revision of the scheme of imperial taxation and a lessening of Ireland's share. Protestants and Roman Catholics, Ulstermen and Munstermen, landlords and tenants, lords and servants are all of one mind now, and why, forsooth? What has happened to bring about the harmony, so unprecedented? Naught but the old, old solvent—self-interest. The report of a royal commission with its cold, dry statistics has done what all the eloquence and statesmanship of men could not do. Irish advocates for years, in and out of Parliament, have asserted that Ireland was overtaxed, but their assertions even when backed with facts have been dismissed as the mouthings of ambitious politicians or the ravings of intolerant, unforgiving, ungrateful Celts. But presto, change! A royal commission, chiefly Englishmen, is appointed. It studies the data, reports dispassionately, and at once men who differ on Home Rule, the Real Presence and every other subject rush into each other's arms and rally in defense of their purses, and of course those Irishmen who hitherto have sworn that they were not party to injustice are more vehement now than those who have protested against it for years. It is always galling to be proved a fool as well as a thief.

Is Russia Playing a Double Game?

No new fact respecting the real situation in Constantinople has come to the surface. Conjecture is rife of course, and, in the absence of action, speculation like the following is interesting, especially as the Vienna Neue Presse, which ventures to put it forth, is credited with being one of Bismarck's mouthpieces. It says:

> The web on which Russia, together with the other Powers, is publicly engaged, namely, the work of reforms, is secretly undone by her day by day. The Turk knows that Europe is not united, and acts accordingly. The whole is a comedy in which the dupes are not even duped, because every cabinet in Europe knows that Russia is insincere. She will, at the right moment, land troops on the shores of the Bosporus, force a protectorate upon the helpless sultan, and then close the doors of the straits, putting the keys into her pocket, and, being secure against surprise from that side, she will devote all her energy to the furtherance of her Asiatic schemes. It is unlikely that England would object by force, because she could count upon military support neither from Austria, which has already concluded a compact with Russia on the model of that signed at Reichstadt with regard to the occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, nor from Italy, which, statements to the contrary notwithstanding, has a treaty with Russia. The upshot of it all will be that Constantinople will become Russian with the rest of the Turkish empire, except the portion allotted beforehand to Austria, namely, Salonica and its neighborhood.

It is significant of what may not be expected from this Administration that our fleet in the Mediterranean is scattering, and we hear nothing more about the Bancroft entering the Dardanelles, nor aught save promises—if even those—respecting payment of indemnities to American citizens and institutions that have suffered loss.

The Outlook in India.

In reviewing the way of the world during 1896 we said concerning India that she not only was suffering from famine, but also undergoing a process of gradual impoverishment, caused by unfair British taxation. Of course, if this latter statement be true, then there must be more or less discontent among the natives of India. As confirming the impression that there is such unrest, we note the letter from Allahabad, dated Nov. 12, and published in The Nation of last week. Written by an American, it gives an outsider's point of view. He reports that he has received confidences from lips that were sealed or gave only smiling answers, as long as he was supposed to be an Englishman, which indicate clearly a changing attitude of the natives toward Great Britain; confidences, too, showing that the spirit of criticism and disloyalty are not confined to any one district in India, but are "already echoing softly in the hearts of all the people." Contrasting his description of British Indian officials' indifference to the extent and horrors of the famine and the Indian Government's refusal to limit the export of grain, or in any way to check the rapacity of the Indian grain dealers, with the general solicitude of the Russians, from the czar down to the humblest Russian official in territory adjacent to India, it does not surprise one much to know that while love for the Briton wanes in India, love for the Russian waxes. The papers of Moscow and St. Petersburg are filled with appeals for the famine sufferers, and there seems to be a general desire to relieve the distress. Of course it is easy for the British to impugn the motives which prompt these manifestations of feeling, but such criticisms will not counteract the effects of Russian action and British inaction, and as yet there is not the slightest hint of aid from the British imperial treasury, or of any general subscription from the British public. The bubonic plague still ravages Bombay, and the rate of mortality among the foodless is awful.

NOTES.

France and Great Britain are both seeking to win the favor of King Menelek of Abyssinia, and special missions from each country will soon set out empowered to deal with him.

Spain's advertised reforms for Porto Rico do not satisfy the Porto Rican delegates now in Madrid, and if similar terms are offered to Cuba they will not be accepted as satisfactory. The revolt in the Philippines grows apace, and dissatisfaction with General Weyler is increasing in Spain.

Atrocities committed by Japanese soldiers in Formosa, seen and testified to by unimpeachable missionary witnesses, will go far toward dimming the record made by Japan's army in the war with China. The veneer is thin, and soon wears off in the presence of persistent opposition, it would seem.

While the receipts of the Federal Treasury during December were greater than the disbursements, it nevertheless remains true that the deficiency of the first six months of the fiscal year amounts to $37,902,396. A fair tariff bill and economy in expenditure will remedy this, and the one is as essential as the other.

Our churches in Wisconsin and their members have been forewarned by the Personal Liberty League of that State that the league will endeavor to secure from the legislature about to convene the repeal of all legislation which now guards the Lord's Day from secularization. Forewarned should mean forearmed.

The minister from Venezuela to the United States has returned to this country with such authority from the home government as makes it certain that Venezuela will not put any obstacle in the way of a ratification of the agreement between Lord Salisbury and Secretary of State Olney. Venezuela would like a representative on the arbitration tribunal, but will not insist upon it.

New York's recent constitutional convention was swept off its feet by fear of organized labor, and since Jan. 1 all its convicts have been condemned to idleness. Mrs. Maud Ballington Booth is quite right in saying of the new policy, "It means that the judge who, under the new conditions, imposes a penalty of five or ten years upon a prisoner is virtually condemning him to death." Certainly moral and spiritual death, if not physical.

Senator Wolcott of Colorado has started for Europe ostensibly, so it is said, to sound sentiment—official and popular—there respecting the advisability of the United States calling together another international monetary conference to pass upon the subject of remonetizing silver. It is believed that the real meaning of the mission is a desire to preserve the Republican party's record for consistency, and to enable the party leaders to say that they at least have tried to live up to the letter of the platform of 1896.

The temper with which some of the British Liberals intend to discuss the foreign policy of Lord Salisbury as soon as Parliament opens may be inferred from Mr. James Bryce's recent speech at Aberdeen, in which he said: "The only British interest which the government seems to treat lightly and relegates to the second rank is the maintenance of British honor, the fulfillment of obligations we have assumed to protect the oppressed and deliver the victims of the Turk from the cruelties which our past conduct has contributed to bring upon them."

Two new striking figures in our political life began their service in higher realms of activity last week. Ex-Mayor Pingree of Detroit took up the reins of authority as governor of Michigan, and ere long his grapple with the corporations must begin. Hon. Frank S. Black of Troy began his career as governor of New York, and his first appointment to office would seem to indicate that he is to be a partisan. If the Republican "machine" triumphs in the senatorial contests in Illinois, Pennsylvania and New York, the leaders of that party will reap a harvest later of the kind which always follows the sowing of dragon's teeth.

A judge of Boston's Municipal Court decides that the performances usually witnessed in the First Spiritual Temple are "religious," hence the young men who recently exposed frauds there are guilty of disturbing "a religious and lawful meeting," and must be fined. We hope the young men, who performed a distinct service to society, will appeal from this decision. If that which occurs in the First Spiritual Temple each Sunday is "religious," then we do not know what is irreligious. Boston's assessors are of a different opinion from the judge. They have recently decided to tax the Temple as they would any other place of secular amusement and money-making.

The well-meaning efforts of the committee, appointed at a mass meeting in Faneuil Hall, to effect a better understanding between the West End corporation and its employés, have failed. Mayor Quincy, in his message just issued, says what is very true, and sooner or later the West End officials will see it too. He affirms:

> The uninterrupted operation of the West End Street Railway system is a matter of vital importance to the public, and they are therefore interested in having the relations between this great corporation and its employés placed upon a stable and satisfactory basis. It seems to me that such stability can best be secured by the recognition, by the management of the company, of any labor organization properly organized and conducted of which the great mass of the employés become members, and by the renewal of some such agreement as was formerly in force between the company and its employés, defining the conditions of employment and providing for the redress of cases of injustice to individuals.

The trial and conviction of Thomas Mead Bram, by a Federal jury which found him guilty of the murder of Capt. Charles Nash of the ship Herbert Fuller last summer, has absorbed the attention of many New Englanders during the past three weeks. Much of the interest in the case has been healthy and legitimate; much of it morbid and evil in its tendency. The revelations since the trial respecting the character of the deliberations of the jury and the method of securing unanimity will, however, intensify distrust of the jury system. This said, it also should be added that much of current criticism of judges and jury goes far toward discrediting processes of law, and substitutes "trial by newspaper" for far safer tribunals, and, as Mr. Moorfield Story points out, makes it vastly more difficult to secure jurymen who will convict murderers, be the evidence ever so clear.

IN BRIEF.

We shall publish next week an article by Dr. Alexander Mackennal of Bowdon, Eng., entitled England and America as Affected by the Events of 1896.

Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher, at eighty-four years of age, has kept up an active career of literary usefulness. It is welcome news that she is recovering from the recent accident in which her hip was fractured.

Over seventy per cent. of the stock capital of American railroads in the United States gets no dividend. But the question remains to be settled whether this is because of overproduction in railroad building or overproduction of stock.

It would be interesting if some expert statistician could cipher out how many resolutions of various kinds have been passed by Ministers' Meetings during the last decade, and still more interesting to learn, were it possible, what good they have done.

Anent Dr. McKenzie's address on the retirement of Mayor Bancroft of Cambridge at the end of his term of service, The Boston Herald gives this deserved compliment: "Happy the citizen of Cambridge who is the subject of one of Rev. Dr. McKenzie's eulogies! They are about as graceful as anything in that line."

One of our exchanges, speaking of ministers always ready to leave their own denomination and working for calls to good churches in other denominations, aptly describes them as "clerical jayhawks, with eager eyes watching for nests already well feathered by honest builders."

Heartiest congratulations to Colorado College! New Year's Day was a jubilant one for the institution, marking as it did the consummation of the long and arduous effort to meet the conditions of the Pearsons bequest. With $200,000 thus assured and more to follow, the institution will move forward gladly and gratefully to larger achievements and better service.

The Outlook has, in recent years, been the pioneer in religious journalism in important respects. It takes another new departure with the new year and appears in new form and dress as a high class magazine. Its business enterprise will no doubt conquer the difficulties of putting a weekly newspaper into this smaller form, and it will be, if possible, more attractive than ever.

Mr. J. G. Woolley's advice about ministers to temperance workers of his sort as given in the Voice is, "Let them alone, expect nothing of ministers as such, but let your money rot before you pay a cent to support one who is not frankly and openly a party Prohibitionist." It would seem to be wise, also, for ministers, except those of the class he would support, to let Mr. Woolley alone.

A capital story is going the rounds which will amuse Dr. Lyman Abbott. The president of the Senior Class in a Western college took the prize in a recent State oratorical contest. It was afterwards found that he had taken his oration almost bodily from one of Dr. Abbott's sermons. The judges had marked his effort low on thought and composition, but he had taken the prize because of his excellent delivery.

Just as we go to press the announcement comes to us of the death of Gen. Francis A. Walker, president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. He had been in the best of health, and died early Tuesday morning of apoplexy. The shock came without warning. General Walker has long been a prominent figure in national and international as well as in educational affairs. He was fifty-six years of age.

The Mid-Continent of St. Louis has gone to swell the ranks of the Herald and Presbyter. It was a bright and able paper and we shall miss it. Its final issue predicts that "some day an evangelist will appear who doesn't know a single funny story." Perhaps that not altogether desirable event will be hastened, now that our contemporary has ceased to be, for its editor has often shown that he could tell a good story and make it an effective illustration of religious truth.

It is significant of the growth of new methods of missionary work that the National City Evangelization Union of the Methodist Episcopal Church ranks third among the missionary organizations of that denomination in the amount of contributions received last year. The union, which lately held in Chicago its sixth annual convention, reports twenty cities organized with a view to lift them to a worthy standard of Christian citizenship. The annual receipts in this short time have risen to over $200,000.

Mr. Gladstone's remark made some time ago deserves to be kept standing in type as a comment on the successive steps of the Powers in their treatment of Turkey:

> The remonstrances of the six Powers during the last twelve months have not been mere failures or a simple mockery, but a great instrument of mischief, for they all along implied that such a matter can be disposed of by discussion, and thereby supplied wholesale and deliberate murder with the only assistance it wanted, namely, assurance of impunity.

A volume containing many articles that have appeared in The Congregationalist from the pen of Dr. Quint will be issued in the course of two months, bearing the imprint of the Cong. S. S. & Pub. Soc. His son, Mr. Wilder D. Quint of The Boston Traveller, has gone carefully over the files of this paper and chosen a valuable and representative collection of his writings. The book will bear the appropriate title, Common Sense Christianity, and we have no doubt that it will find a welcome in many homes.

The Church of Glad Tidings, the Church of the Love of Christ, the Full Bible Church—these are three of the new ecclesiastical departures to which the year 1896 gave birth. To be sure one of them was launched in literature and the other two in real life, but we should say that the chances of the survival of the one which appears in a celebrated novel of the year are fully equal to those which are actually appealing for support to a public somewhat wearied of the multiplication of sects and novelties in religion.

For the benefit of those who occasionally raise the question regarding the new Congregational House we would say that, although there are yet no visible signs of building operations, the edifice, so far as human prevision can go, is sure to be a reality within two years. The necessary transfer of deeds was long ago made, and at present committees are at work arranging for preliminary plans. The coming of spring will doubtless witness the beginning of the demolition of the buildings now standing at 12–14 Beacon Street, on which site the new Congregational House is to arise.

Are progress and safety antipodal? We infer that the recently appointed editor of The Christian Guide thinks so, for in his salutatory he says:

> I shall endeavor to make the paper keep step with progress and safety as far as these two journey together. When they separate I shall tarry behind with safety.

He meant, doubtless, to say that he will be as liberal as he can be conscientiously. All genuine progress is safe. Motion should not be confounded with its goal.

Despite charity machinery—organized and unorganized—there are still a few individuals left who do not "sift out kindness through the sieve of reasoning," but indulge in the impulse to give directly to those who appear to be needy. Two such individuals were seen on Fifth Avenue, New York, on New Year's Day. One was a Jewess, the other a fair New Englander, and the object of their charity a cripple. We know that the New England woman knows all about the "evils of indiscriminate giving." Is there a reaction against "machinery" we wonder?

In Chicago, Sunday before last, the American Volunteers in Battery D fed 7,000 people. At the Tabernacle Congregational Church in Denver 1,800 children received a good dinner last week Wednesday, and in other great cities during the holiday season there was similar liberal provision for the friendless and outcast. While one rejoices in the benevolence which furnishes food for the hungry, one is rendered inexpressibly sad at the thought of such vast numbers of hungry people living in a country which produces such an abundance as ours. That any one willing and able to work should suffer from hunger seems hard indeed.

A curious lawsuit has been going on in Washington as to the ownership of a tall beaver hat, once the property of Abraham Lincoln and worn by him at the time of his assassination. It would still further enhance the value of this notable relic if it could be proved that it were the one coveted by an office-seeking visitor soon after his first inauguration. It was one of the earliest stories reported of Mr. Lincoln after he became President, and was told by himself with great relish. The caller presented his application for a high position—perhaps that of ambassador to the court of St. James—but when unsuccessful gradually lowered his ambition from one office to another, the President always having a kindly but unfavorable answer. At length, rising to go, he said, with quaint dignity, "Mr. President, have you any old second hand stovepipe hat you could give me?"

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE.

BOSTON LETTER.

A Striking Variety.

A glance at the advertisements of Sunday services in the Saturday evening papers shows that nearly 100 meetings are held in Boston, and the large majority of these, judging from the subjects announced, treat religion as the most serious business of life. Some, however, indicate little relation with religious thought or feeling, while there are a few which seem to rival the dime museums. Last Sunday, for example, among the secular assemblies, the Labor Church was told What Will Come of Millionaires and Monopolists, and the Single Tax Society had an address on A Plan of United Action. Among what may be termed religious oddities, the Christadelphians heard a lecture on The Devil, with no collection; and the Boston Seaman's Friend Society exhibited an eleven-year old girl preacher, colored, with seats free. But the most popular place for freaks is the People's Temple. It opened the year with the announcement that > the only original "Sam Jones" will preach. He has been called the Solomonic evangelist of the ages, the surprise of the church, the wonder of the world and the intellectual king of revivalists. Before him there has been none like him, neither shall there be after him.

In the afternoon an ex priest was announced to speak on The Protestant Ministers of Worcester Kissing the Pope's Toe, with "a voluntary silver offering at the door as you enter, to save time." In this way the worshipers are impressively reminded of the value of time at the beginning of the year, while the church authorities do not altogether forget the value of money. This plan of taking pay in advance for the stuff advertised indicates a fair amount of worldly wisdom. Revival services were to be held every evening at the People's Temple, with a concert on Monday evening which those invited to go there to seek salvation were assured should be a "double-decker." But such things as these do not represent the real religious life of Boston nor the gospel which is preached in its pulpits.

Mr. Puddefoot and the Free Thinkers.

We are all familiar with Mr. Puddefoot as an advocate of home missions, and some of us also are possessors of tangible evidences that he has no slight artistic skill. We are aware, too, that his book, The Minute Man on the Frontier, is a vivid portrayal of pioneer evangelizing work, but there is another rôle which he can play to perfection. He can meet doubters and scoffers on their own ground and hold up the standard of Christianity in a way to compel their attention and respect. The other Sunday afternoon he dropped in to the Wells Memorial Hall in this city, where free thinkers had gathered to discuss the old question whether civilization had conferred benefits upon the working men. The regular speakers rapped the churches and organized Christianity with genuine Ingersollian indignation and noble disregard of all the facts in the case. They also exalted science as the chief friend of the down-trodden and neglected masses. Mr. Puddefoot heard them patiently, but when a lull ensued he took the platform, and, claiming the privilege of free speech, launched forth. In his keen but good-natured way he pointed out the difference in the condition of the working man today from what it was fifty years ago. He showed what a vast betterment had come about, and he went on in playful banter about the enthronement of science: "Look what your god has done for you! He has invented machine after machine which has turned hundreds of you out of employment." "The fact is," he continued, "you men little realize that some of your best friends are in the ranks of those very clergymen whom you are now denouncing in a wholesale way. Did you never hear of Maurice or Kingsley or Robertson? Don't you know that the Christian Church is interesting itself in the welfare of humanity as never before?"

Mr. Puddefoot never scored a greater oratorical triumph, even in his most impassioned addresses at Saratoga, for in a few moments a number of the audience, including the president, were applauding him, and his short but impetuous speech changed the atmosphere of the assembly. The Home Missionary Society ought to spare Mr. Puddefoot now and then in order to visit trades unions and meetings of the character described. He is just the man to enlighten and persuade the class which thinks it has a grievance. He knows what hard, monotonous manual toil is. He is a man of wide reading. He would pass as a pretty good Christian socialist, but his shrewd common sense and his ardent belief in the Christian religion prevent his becoming enamored of the half truths of socialism and populism.

The Sign of the Cross.

The fame of this play, now running at the Boston Museum, had preceded it across the Atlantic, and unquestionably, in view of its character, religious people have been cherishing a prejudice in its favor that is rarely accorded any dramatic production. At all events, the audiences thus far have contained a considerable number of persons who are far from being habitual theatergoers. It is probably this class which appreciate this drama most. The blasé attendant at the playhouses is transported into an historical atmosphere with which he is quite unfamiliar and is somewhat bewildered thereby, or else indulges in feeble witticisms concerning "Sunday school plays" that do but reveal his own shallowness. On the other hand, the keen professional critic discovers certain inherent faults and weaknesses in the plot and dialogue, which are there but which do not distress the uninitiated, who look rather to the total impressiveness of the play. Undoubtedly The Sign of the Cross appeals most strongly to those who know something of Christian history and to whom Christianity itself is a personal experience.

The company which is rendering this play in America, having already produced it in New York, is not the same as that which has been producing it night after night for a year in London, and of whose performance an editorial correspondent gave a detailed description in The Congregationalist of May 28. The phenomenal success of the play may be judged from the fact that four companies are engaged in its production in England, and so a picture of the struggle of Christianity with paganism is nightly set before thousands. Inasmuch as the chief material of the play relates, on the one hand, to the most tender and sacred realities of the Christian religion and, on the other hand, brings in as a necessary contrast the gross aspects of paganism, the need of the utmost delicacy in both portrayal and rendering is apparent. This reserve and carefulness are not so marked in the company now producing it in this country as they were in the rendition at the Lyric Theater, London, and for that reason we cannot commend the play as heartily and unreservedly as we did its London prototype. Wilson Barrett, the author and leading figure of the drama, has written a book with the same title, which sets forth more elaborately the story which constitutes the thread of the play.

Elevating the Theater.

Sporadic attempts in past years have been made in Boston, as well as in New York, to furnish persons who believe that the drama has a legitimate place in life with performances of a high character. Unfortunately these attempts have almost invariably come to grief. There has either been too great diversity of opinion in the committee which took upon itself this rather Herculean task, or else the management has not been competent. Yet failure in the past does not necessarily augur a similar result in the future, and the project now under way has elements of promise in it which previous endeavors did not possess. Mr. Atherton Brownell, the well-known dramatic critic, directs the movement, which is indorsed by such prominent Bostonians as Rev. Leighton Parks, T. W. Higginson, Prof. W. J. Rolfe, Henry A. Clapp, Louise Chandler Moulton and Irving Winslow. The five dramatic performances to be given, probably at the Bijou Theater, beginning late in January, are already announced. The program contemplates the bringing on of such first-class plays as Browning's A Blot in the Scutcheon, W. D. Howells's Yorick's Love, W. S. Gilbert's Palace of Truth and Miss Wilkins's Giles Corey. Naturally the cast will be made up with great care and discrimination, the co-operation of men and women who stand high in the profession having already been assured.

For its financial success the undertaking relies upon subscriptions to the series, and circulars have been sent to persons whose interest in elevating the drama is supposed to be sufficiently strong to warrant the expectation that they will be willing to pay $15 for five entertainments. It is quite likely that after the initial evening of each play, when subscribers only will be present, the general public on subsequent evenings will have an opportunity to see the same performance at largely reduced rates. As a disinterested endeavor to lift the drama and thus bring to bear a purifying influence upon the amusements of a great city, which are often so lamentably low, this venture of Mr. Brownell and his friends is worth mentioning. Unless we are to relegate to the region of forbidden fruit all the recreative agencies of a city like Boston the difference between the good and the bad ought to be noted and kept before the rising generation.

In the line of entertainment, to which nothing but the heartiest praise can be awarded, was the performance at the Bijou Theater last Monday of the Midsummer Night's Dream. It was rendered by the Class of '95 of Smith College in the interests of a building fund. ☞

FROM THE INTERIOR.

The "Evangelisten."

This little paper, edited by Professor Jernberg of Chicago Seminary, is rendering indispensable service among our Norwegian and Danish brethren. Their churches are scattered over the country and are bound together by this paper. In fact, it is the organ through which they communicate with one another. It has been doing its educating work for seven years, but so quietly that few, comparatively, have known of its existence. Both at the East and in the West it has made these foreigners acquainted with the spirit and polity of the Pilgrims, and thus has prepared the way for them to enter into fellowship with our body. Naturally they are prejudiced, as most foreigners are, against the methods of our free churches. In two places, certainly, churches have been organized as the result of information brought their members through the columns of the paper. A copy sent to Cronstadt, Russia, has led three young men to the seminary where they are studying for the ministry. No wonder that the Western Association of Scandinavian Churches has heartily indorsed the paper, and has expressed its sense of the value of its service and its obligation to the societies, the A. M. A., H. M. S. and S. S. and P. S., by which it has been aided. Without the assistance which these societies, since its establishment in 1890, have given it it could not have survived. We are sure that no money has been more wisely expended than that which has been put into this paper. It is with regret that we learn that the Publishing Society, because of diminished receipts, has felt itself compelled to withhold its accustomed aid this year. We trust its income will enable it before the end of another year to renew its usual appropriation. Such a paper is essential to the proper cultivation of our Scandinavian field, and it must be sustained till it has subscribers enough to pay all its bills. Professor Jernberg has put a vast amount of time and energy into it, in addition to carrying a financial burden which the benevolence of our churches should hasten to take from his shoulders. Certainly no missionary in any of our frontier fields has a harder or more delicate task than Professor Jernberg in the editing of the Evangelisten, and in the training of his classes for the ministry of our Scandinavian churches.

Chicago As It Used To Be.

Robert Fergus, who has resided here since 1839, has reprinted the first directory on which the name of Chicago appears. This was issued in 1844. There were then less than 8,000 people within the city limits. There were thirteen churches, but Congregationalism had no representatives here. Six papers were published, of which the Chicago Democrat—John Wentworth, editor and proprietor—may in a certain sense find its successor in the Tribune. The single religious paper was the Northwestern Baptist. The Prairie Farmer looked after the agricultural interests of the Interior. At the post office forty-eight mails were received and made up every week. There were eight public schools and a young ladies' seminary, which proposed to give "a thorough, practical education, to develop and mold the character, cultivate the manners and form correct habits." Quite a large number whose names appear in this historic directory are still alive.

An Aftermath of Failures.

No one here is at all surprised that the failure of the National Bank of Illinois should have far-reaching consequences. But for its failure the Atlas Bank, which has decided to go into liquidation, might have continued its career. The great paper manufacturers of Batavia, Ill., and Appleton, Wis., the Van Nortwicks, would not have been obliged to make an assignment in order to protect their creditors. Nor would the Batavia Bank have closed its doors. In all these failures it is thought creditors will be paid in full, but fortunes will vanish, and men whose wealth was counted by the millions will either lose everything or be reduced to a mere competence. Worst of all is the loss of life which these financial changes have caused. One man, whose banking house had been his pride and whose integrity was above reproach, has committed suicide. Another was so disturbed at losing his place in the bank that he died from the mere shock of the announcement that his services were no longer needed, and still another, long an invalid, was unable to bear the news of the great losses which had come to him. No one will ever know how many widows and orphans were entirely dependent on dividends from bank stock which is now worthless, or how much suffering will come to hundreds whose income has been severely curtailed. Yet it is a comfort to know that the failure of a National Bank is comparatively rare, and that there can be no doubt as to the financial soundness of nearly all our moneyed institutions in the Interior. But one is tempted to ask, if it be not possible to prevent catastrophes like these, and if some method could not be devised by which innocent men and women shall be protected against such losses.

Minister Deposed.

Dec. 30 Rev. J. G. Stewart of the United Presbyterian Church, Monmouth, Ill., was deposed by the Monmouth Presbytery from the ministry and from church membership. Mr. Stewart has been a successful evangelist, but persuaded himself into the belief that he could heal disease through faith and by prayer. He has had several trials, insisting always that his views are Biblical and that he cannot be rightly suspended from or expelled from the ministry. He has organized what he calls a Full Bible Church in Monmouth. He has formed a church in St. Louis, and is about to organize other churches of the same character in other cities. He has also sent out several missionaries to advocate his views. His brethren felt that they could not indorse his opinions and hence withdrew their fellowship from him. There would not seem to be very much difference between his views and those of the notorious Dr. Dowie, whose immense establishment in Chicago is drawing hither hundreds, if not thousands, of whom a large proportion profess to be cured of the ills from which they had suffered. It is interesting to observe the congregation which Dr. Dowie addresses every Sunday in Tabernacle No. 2, near Sixty-third Street. The walls of the room are lined with crutches, stretchers, trusses and various contrivances which surgeons employ for the alleviation of pain, which have been laid aside by their former owners as useless. The platform is filled with men and women who testify to the blessings they have received, both spiritual and physical. Hard as it is to reject the testimony which is given, just as it is difficult to reject the testimony as to the miraculous cures wrought by sacred relics and at sacred shrines, it is harder still to accept it, or to look upon the man who encourages it as a sincere believer in the power he professes to exert. With Dr. Dowie the aim seems to be to make money, although he claims that he is chiefly anxious to do good.

New Year's Receptions.

In general these have been given up, but they are still popular in some of our churches. The First Church and the Union Park Church set aside Friday afternoon and evening for a reception to Drs. Goodwin and Noble, their respective pastors. Both were exceedingly enjoyable and indicated the strong hold these pastors have upon their people. Dr. Goodwin and Dr. Noble are not quite as strong as one could wish, though neither of them is seriously ill. For two Sundays Dr. Goodwin has been kept out of his pulpit by an attack of his old enemy, the grip, and will hardly be able to preach the coming Sunday. He will, however, soon be in his place as usual, in a pulpit which loses none of its attractions with the growing years of its occupant. Dr. Noble has been overworked since his return from Europe, but has rallied rapidly and is nearly as well as ever. FRANKLIN.

FROM AUSTRALIA.

Congregationalists in Session.

The autumn meetings of the Congregational Unions of the colonies have been well attended. The years 1892 to 1894 were times of deep financial depression. Our churches, in common with those of other denominations, suffered severely, and the denominational funds became heavily burdened with debt. In 1895 a determined effort was made to reduce our debts. The effort was continued during this year. As the result of two years' work about half the incumbrance has been removed. The effect of these financial embarrassments has been disastrous. For two years the denomination in New South Wales has been "marking time." The necessity for getting rid of overdrafts has strangled all aggressive enterprise.

Dr. Bevan's Discussions.

One of the greatest attractions at the Sydney meetings was the presence of Dr. Bevan of Melbourne. The doctor goes to England for a season next year, so that New South Wales is not likely to see him again for some time. In lecturing, preaching and speaking he has been well occupied and he has lost none of the art which gains and retains the attention of the multitude. In his own church in Melbourne Dr. Bevan has entered upon a new departure, concerning which there is a good deal of difference of opinion. After a sermon, say on immortality, it is announced that the meeting is open. Thereupon Christadelphians, agnostics, "advocates of the larger hope," advocates of "conditional immortality"—all sorts and sizes of theological disputants, in fact—come to the front and state their views. Every one is allowed to say exactly what he pleases, with just a few qualifications. Every speaker must be respectful in his references to those who differ from him, he must speak to the point, and he must speak within the time allotted to him. The meetings begin at half past eight and last sometimes till nearly ten o'clock. Any pastor who thinks Dr. Bevan's experiment worth trying must prepare himself to hear the speakers tell him that he is "ignorant," does not know the Scriptures, and so on. In fact, he must prepare for what is called in this country "a slating." Else he may lose his temper, when his critics will no doubt lose theirs. Then, it is to be feared, the church would suggest pandemonium, with the minister in the rôle of the principal bad angel.

Sunday Cycling.

The reference to Dr. Bevan suggests the matter of Sunday cycling, upon which he has lately been delivering himself. Unfortunately, the possession of a new means of travel seems to have added to the already too numerous temptations to Sabbath desecration. The churches are becoming alive to the fact. Dr. Bevan's utterance has been referred to. Archbishop Carr (Roman Catholic) and Bishop Goe (Anglican), who also belong to Dr. Bevan's city, have been declaring themselves on the same subject. The line taken by those who have discussed the subject is not indiscriminate condemnation of bicycle riding, but a dehortation from turning it into a means for the neglect of public and family worship.

Hospital Parades.

Another attack on the Lord's Day comes in the shape of "hospital Sunday parades." This attack is all the more difficult to meet because it comes in the guise of charity. The Friendly Societies have taken to the way of processionizing on Sunday in aid of the medical charities. "Druids" in white robes and long horsehair beards, "foresters" in red and green, mounted on white horses, firemen in jack boots and helmets, and many other strange types turn out and march to the accompaniment of very brassy bands, with the inevitable tail of juvenile and other spectators which the peripatetic brass band always draws after it. The result is a complete reversal of all our customary ideas concerning the day of rest and worship. Among other injurious influences of these "parades" (which are "parades" in a different sense from that intended by those who have so named them) is the withdrawal of children from the Sunday schools to witness the show. In the ranks of the paraders are a good many church attendants and some church members. It is not surprising, therefore, that doubts of the propriety of these Sunday processions have invaded the ranks of the processionists themselves. The churches also have begun to speak out. In one suburb the ministers, after ineffectually endeavoring to persuade the Friendly Societies to hold their demonstration on a week day, organized a collection on their own account. In this way the churches of the district cleared themselves of any suspicion of stinginess, and, at the same time, entered their protest against Sabbath desecration.

The Anglican Primate Censured.

Bishop Saumarez Smith, the Anglican primate in Australia, has recently committed the unpardonable sin—that is, according to the judgment of the High Church party. He has attended meetings of "dissenters," and has actually wished them Godspeed. His attendance upon the centenary of the L. M. S. was ranked as a crime of no small magnitude, but it was surpassed in turpitude by his presence at the Y. P. S. C. E. convention. The primate's speeches were sincere and hearty and did equal credit to his heart and his head. The Churchman (the organ of the Ritualists) told him that his action is "utterly disloyal to the church and entirely inconsistent with the church's regular intercession—'From all false doctrine, heresy and schism, good Lord, deliver us.'" Pursuing the subject, the same liberal and enlightened organ declares that "the church was founded by Christ, who is God; the other religious bodies were founded by men." The primate was not in the least dismayed by his assailants. In his address before the recent Anglican Synod held in this city he replied to them. He told those Anglicans who are so excessively fond of the epithet "Catholic" that the Church of England is historically "on the Protestant side of the line"; that, while anxious to treat with respect all opinions conscientiously held, he "deplores" his critics' "narrowness of view," and that "to refuse to recognize ministers of other denominations as Christian ministers because they have not been episcopally ordained, and to speak of the Church of England as if it excluded the possibility of any other constituted body of Christians being regarded as a 'church,' does not make for that wider unity for which many are yearning." Finally he tells his opponents that they have no right to question the loyalty to the Church of England of those who do not share their views. The primate's speech was the severest trouncing the High Church party have ever received, and the more severe because it was given with marked ability and good temper.

Y. P. S. C. E. Annual Australasian Convention.

The second annual meeting of the Australasian convention of the Y. P. S. C. E. was held in Sydney. It was on the plan of American conventions in everything. A banner for good citizenship was given to South Australian Endeavorers. The meetings seemed to have "grip." The scene at the consecration meeting, when between three and four thousand Endeavorers met in the city Town Hall, was one which will not readily be forgotten by those who were present. The council of the Australasian Y. P. S. C. E. Union sent a very cordial invitation to Dr. Clark to visit Australasia. They ask him to come either at the conclusion of the San Francisco convention in 1897 or at the conclusion of the Nashville convention in 1898, and express the earnest hope that Mrs. Clark will accompany him. Beyond a doubt, if they do come they will have a royal reception.

Sydney, N. S. W. W. A.

Mr. Moody's Winter Labors in Two Great Cities.

To the Editors of The Congregationalist: My desire is, by holding the meetings at times that will not interfere with regular church services, to supplement, not to supplant, regular church work. As in New York, I shall in Boston address myself mainly to Christians, and not specially to the unconverted. I believe that what the church needs today is a thorough rousing, and if we get on fire ourselves we shall be more successful in our battle against iniquity. The power to evangelize the country lies dormant in the church, and all that is needed is that we be wakened to action. If the church is quickened and revived, I believe that our mission boards will not be hampered longer by overwhelming debts, and that other things that trouble us and stifle effort will vanish away. The object of my meetings will be to scatter the fire, not to concentrate it. I do hope that a special evangelistic effort will be made all along the line during the month of January. I would like to see every church open for gospel services—not in Boston only, but throughout the whole country; not on Sundays only, but every night of the week. Let the work in missions and cottage meetings, etc., take a new start also. If all these agencies worked together, we might have such an ingathering of souls as has not been seen since Pentecost. What this country needs above all things is the old gospel. Let us be much in prayer, that the Holy Ghost shall be shed abroad in large measure. Let us nurse a spirit of expectancy, and we shall not be disappointed.

Yours in the work, D. L. MOODY.

MR. MOODY IN NEW YORK.

BY REV. JOHN T. BECKLEY, D. D.

Mr. Moody's aim in his work in New York, which began Nov. 9, has been to uplift the churches. He has made a definite attempt to reach Christians, appointing meetings at such hours as would not interfere with church services. And from the churches of New York and Brooklyn the people have flocked to the meetings, while the ministers have been conspicuously absent. They are in full sympathy with Mr. Moody and the work; no doubt they would plead that tremendous pressure which is so constant in a city like this. Besides, there has been no committee, no organization, no special attempt to enlist them. Mr. Moody has depended on affecting the churches indirectly by a rising tide of spiritual fervor. What are the results of the work thus far? The best of them, as always, can never be reckoned. That there has been a spiritual quickening cannot be denied.

THE PRESS.

Perhaps the most conspicuous good in this campaign has been the co-operation of the press. Mr. Moody has felt this very strongly, conscious that he was reaching not only the city but the whole country through these metropolitan journals. In the second week of the Cooper Union meetings he felt that New York had been more thoroughly reached in this way than after a whole month of the famous Hippodrome meetings. It is something phenomenal. The worst papers and the best have vied with each other in giving reports of the sermons and striking incidents of the services. The most "up to date" paper gave its front page to an autograph letter of the evangelist. A journal sent its most brilliant caricaturist, but he caught the infection and his reverent treatment in illustration helped to deepen the force of the printed word. In one of the early meetings two reporters arose for prayer, convicted while writing down the sermon. As one went out, a renewed man, he said, "I surely did not come here to become a Christian." Testimony has come to Mr. Moody daily, from all parts of the country, telling of men converted through reading these reports. "I have a letter today from a man in South Carolina and one in Minnesota brought to God through reading the New York ——," mentioning the daily scavenger that has the trail of the serpent all over it.

The manager of one of the journals of largest circulation came to Mr. Moody and, in the presence of a business man of national fame, urged upon Mr. Moody the editorship of the Sunday edition for twelve months. He was to have complete control over every department, excluding every objectionable advertisement, the management simply to stand behind and pay the bills. For a half-hour the proposition was urged, and then Mr. Moody said: "I wouldn't touch it any more than I would touch tar. The Bible is the best Sunday paper ever made. I wouldn't displace it with anything, however good. You need no other publication." In one of his meetings he called upon his audience to promise that they would never again read a Sunday paper.

CONVERSIONS.

The uppermost question in all such campaigns is concerning the number of conversions. No attempt has been made to keep any record of them. In the Cooper Union meetings there have been frequently 100 inquirers, sometimes 200, never less than fifty. It is a sight to stir your heart. The marked feature in Cooper Union is the commingling of classes. Rich and poor, the tramp and the millionaire, the woman of the street and the woman of fashion, stand together with bowed heads as prayer is offered to a common Saviour.

A young man drifted in one day, forlorn, bankrupt in hope. He had lost his position through drink. He was tall and of striking appearance. Mr. Moody announced his text: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you." He urged men to get right with God and then all would come right. At the close of the service the young man gave himself up, and when he had found peace with God his next prayer was that he might be reinstated in his old position. While he was praying, the firm in Chicago was writing him a letter and offering him his old place. Two days afterwards he read the letter to Dr. Dixon, and begged him to assure the people that God would answer prayer.

The conscience fund must not be forgotten. Mr. Moody's preaching stirs in men the desire to make restitution. The comptroller of the treasury soon found on his hands a conscience fund, men sending back money that belonged to the city. Probably there is no other man in the country besides Mr. Moody to whom so many people bring their burdens and tell the story of their sins. He encourages this by assuring them that no secretary opens his mail, but that every letter is opened and read by himself and that every confidence will be respected.

CARNEGIE HALL.

Carnegie Hall, the scene of great triumphs, has seldom witnessed anything like these Sunday gatherings. It is not sufficient to contain the multitudes—overflow meetings are held in the near-by churches—platform, floor, boxes, balconies, four tiers of them, crowded to the utmost. Where else can such an audience be assembled? Magnates of Wall Street, leaders of fashion, the best of the men and women of the churches. In that box sits a financier whose bid more than once has disturbed the money markets of the world. He is in his place every Sunday.

From the topmost gallery comes some sweet refrain—"Saved by grace," is the favorite—Mr. Sankey's voice with its unique timbre distinguishable from all the rest. It falls upon the hushed multitude like music from angelic choirs. Or some appeal is sung that sounds as if a voice from heaven itself were calling the wanderer home. As Mr. Moody speaks there is all of the old-time power. The Spirit of the Lord is upon him and has anointed him to preach the gospel.

THE WORK BROADENING.

Mr. Moody feels with all the intensity of his soul that the church of this country is in a perilous position. It is a question if the world is not affecting the church more than the church is affecting the world. There must come a revival of righteousness or it will be submerged by the social forces that are swirling about it. He is doing as he told me what he has never done before—leaving the work in a great city to return here for the Sundays. New York must be moved and when New York is moved then the country. He has taken Carnegie Hall for the Sundays in January. He has been in conference with leaders in the Episcopal Church, and hopes to see every pulpit an ally in this work.

The Academy of Music has been engaged. Dr. A. C. Dixon will preach there on Sundays at the same hour that Mr. Moody is preaching at Carnegie Hall. Jan. 4 Dr. Dixon resumes the Cooper Union meetings. He has been Mr. Moody's faithful coadjutor. His church, the Hanson Place of Brooklyn, has just honored itself by a generous act in view of his having declined a prominent pulpit in Boston. He believes that people should not go to church twice on Sunday. They should go to church in the morning and go to work in the evening, "a square meal and then exercise." His church now releases him from all parochial responsibility after the sermon on Sunday morning. He is free absolutely. They continue his liberal salary so that he may preach where he will without honorarium from others. This vote was given unanimously in a church of twelve hundred members.

Lest urban dwellers in the North think they alone are up to date in their methods of Christian activity, let the following item from the organ of Southern Presbyterianism be quoted:

> Jackson (Tenn.). The Presbyterian church here is kept open all the time, and the sexton is required to keep it heated and comfortable. At any time one may go there, and he will find a warm, comfortable room.

The Literary Approach to the Old Testament.

I. The Old Testament a True Literature.

By Prof. Frank K. Sanders, Yale University.

That the Old Testament is neither a book nor even a collection of related writings, but a genuine literature, is one of the happy discoveries of the Christian scholarship of today. Many of the data which lead up to this conclusion have been the common property of thoughtful students of the Bible for many generations, but their full significance, and, more especially, their positive, constructive value, are only beginning to be realized.

It is easy to give a reason for the long indifference to the literary character of the Old Testament. The early Christian Church inherited by natural transmission the conceptions regarding the Old Testament which were current among the spiritually-minded Jews of that era. To these Jews, however, the sacred volume had become a manual, or a series of manuals, of patriotism, conduct and theology. They classified it into the Pentateuch, the former prophets or histories, the latter prophets or prophecies proper, and the miscellanea—to coin a word which seems to be the equivalent of their actual title, the writings.

None of these groups seem to have been organized on a strictly literary principle. The Pentateuch and the former prophets were arranged in the sequence of the events which the books narrated. The latter prophets seem to have been arranged partly in the order of size, partly by their chronological sequence. The miscellanea, as arranged in the Hebrew Bible (Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, First and Second Chronicles), do not seem to follow any clearly defined principle of arrangement.

The three groupings known as the Pentateuch, the prophets and the writings are generally considered to represent three stages in the adoption of the Old Testament by the Jewish people as a specifically sacred book. Each group of writings was received as Holy Scripture for religious reasons: the Pentateuch because it contained the regulations to which a life acceptable to God should conform; the prophets because the histories told the story of the ancient glory of their nation and kept alive the flame of patriotism, while the prophetic writings explained the mysterious divine purpose in that national history and pointed forward to a service which Israel was yet to render to the world through the Messiah; the writings because they had voiced the religious longings, the everyday reflections, the later conclusions of the people on these sublime, yet to them practical, themes. In view of all this, we cannot wonder that purely historical and literary considerations dropped out of sight.

The scholars of the early Christian Church accepted this point of view and advanced beyond it. Regarding, as they did, the life and teachings of Jesus as, on the one hand, the fulfillment of Old Testament expectation and, on the other, the setting forth of a new and independent development, they were forced to look upon the Old Testament as a sort of introduction to the New Testament, and they busied themselves to correlate the two from this standpoint. Their point of view has been maintained by the great body of Christian scholars to the present day, the Old Testament being chiefly studied as a manual of Messianic prophecy, or as a manual of religious truth, the historical element in it being kept wholly in subordination.

There were and are sound reasons for this point of view in the study of the Old Testament. That the Messianic hope, under its various forms, gives the scientific clew to the interpretation of the Old Testament is unquestionably true. That these writings from first to last are replete with religious suggestion of the broadest, profoundest type is undeniable. That the New Testament is relatively more important than the Old is admitted. The one who studies the Bible from an historical and literary point of view does not deny these statements, he rather reaffirms them more stoutly than ever. But if the student of the Bible pauses at this stage of investigation, satisfied with his conception of the character and value of the Old Testament, he commits a serious error. His view of the facts is one-sided. He is liable to lead himself and others to lose sight of much that demands the attention of the devout and earnest student of the Bible.

It is his standpoint which makes large portions of the Old Testament unknown territory to multitudes of Christians, because they are obscure and apparently without any bearing on New Testament ideas; which justifies an indiscriminate classification of texts by topics on the assumption that all parts of the Old Testament are of equal religious force and value; which really, though not always professedly, ignores the personal and historical element in Biblical writings—the background so essential to the correct interpretation of all productions of all ages.

To begin to study the Old Testament with an eye open to its historical development and its literary features is to lay a broad foundation for its interpretation. It insures the consideration of every element entering into the production of the Biblical books. Such a method of study lays emphasis upon the human instrumentalities and influences, but without minimizing the divine factor. It seeks to study any portion of the Bible from three principal points of view—the class of Biblical literature to which it belongs, the special purpose of the writer, and the contribution which it made to the growth of Old Testament ideas. It omits no portion of the Old Testament, for under such a method of study all portions become almost equally interesting. It sees in these writings an unfolding of life, a record of the gradual development of a rich religious experience, and they soon become fresh, stimulating, pertinent to the needs of the man of the present day.

These writers struggled with problems that are vital problems still. Their environment was different from ours; to their conclusions we may, or may not, be impelled; but the spirit which they displayed is a spirit of eternal earnestness, quickening the sluggish soul. This one result—that the student of the Bible as literature learns to put himself into the place of those who wrote the various books, kindling with religious patriotism as he catches the dominant motive of 1 Samuel, rising to the climax of the "everlasting yea" along with Job in his struggle to know God aright, throbbing in sympathy with Amos in his ringing denunciations of those who "trample upon the poor"—is enough to justify insistence on the method.

That the Old Testament is a literature and should be read and studied as such by the one who would explore its inmost recesses is not a matter of mere assertion. It is capable of proof. The Old Testament answers all the tests which we impose upon any literature. When a person of good taste and education refers to the literatures of Greece or England or Germany he does not refer to all the writings in either language, but to such only as conform to certain unwritten standards and represent faithfully a national development.

These standards may be loosely expressed in five propositions: (1) The word literature implies a number of writings, choice in form and expression. An infinite number of dime novels would not make a literature. A few choice works, on the other hand, would form a collection but not a literature. The term presupposes a selection of works representing an extensive literary activity. (2) The term also implies a variety of subject and form which corresponds to the manifold activity of the human intellect. No one set of ideas, however good, creates a literature. Not even a series of histories, taken by themselves, could constitute itself as such. They might be records, but never a literature. (3) A third element in true literature is a faithful and many-sided picture of actual human life. At least it must be in touch with life. Textbooks or scientific treatises are not literature in the accepted usage of the term. (4) It implies a long historical development through which can be traced the unfolding of its dominant ideas. A literature is a sort of register of the changing ideas of a people, an indicator of their progress in national development. It represents not one but many periods, and increases or decreases in value as the nation pushes forward or decays. (5) The last criterion is a crowning one. A real national literature embodies in literary form the national ideals. It is sure to express the creative element in the national character, the distinctive keynote and motive of national progress. Maintaining a lofty standard, it incites no less than pleases.

The Old Testament meets these criteria naturally and successfully. It includes at least twenty-nine distinct works, some of them, such as Proverbs or the Psalter, having a literary history of their own. This classification is arrived at by bunching the Hexateuch, and 1 and 2 Chron., Ezra., Neh. These last four were an original historical whole. The majority of these works are on the highest literary level. As classics they are unrivaled. Their variety of literary form is remarkable. The "divine library" includes religious history, lyric, dramatic and liturgical poetry, elegies, speculative and practical reflection, public oratory, legal codes, etc. Dr. Driver says: "It is probable that every form of literary composition known to the ancient Hebrews was utilized as a vehicle of divine truth and is represented in the Old Testament." These works reflect in myriad ways the history of Israel's toilsome study of the problems of God and man and the universe, and show us every step of the progress. They appeared by degrees during almost a thousand years, each century representing some advance. During all this time they retained a remarkable unity of conception and purpose, because the Hebrew nation was working away at a great national ideal—a religious conception of God and man and the universe. Since the Hebrew viewed everything from this moral standpoint, the Old Testament writings abound in ethical stimulus.

If the Old Testament is a true literature, our study of it should recognize and utilize the fact. It is a great pity that so many are content to ignore it. They thereby lock up the Old Testament and throw away the key. The doctrine of the Messiah is not the key, as many affirm, but the golden thread which leads us to the hidden treasure stored away within.

The reverent literary and historical study of the Bible has three magnificent results: it accustoms one to the thought of the development, growth, unfolding of truth; it gives reality and, in consequence, helpfulness to the record of that growth; it helps the student to form a constructive view of the revelation of truth by God to man.

It is not to be assumed that the Old Testament is nothing but a literature. There is a limit to its consideration as a product of the Hebrew mind. Riehm has justly remarked, speaking of the Pentateuch as a record of revelation, that "every one who so reads the Pentateuch as to allow its contents to work upon his spirit must receive the impression that a consciousness of God, such as is here expressed, cannot be derived from flesh and blood." There are many literary phenomena throughout the Old Testament, co-ordinate with religious facts, which are not wholly explainable on ordinary grounds. In this series of articles, however, we will turn our attention to the facts explainable in natural ways. They are the prevailing facts. A judicious attention to them will enable the student better to understand and interpret the supersensual, definitely divine element in the Old Testament.

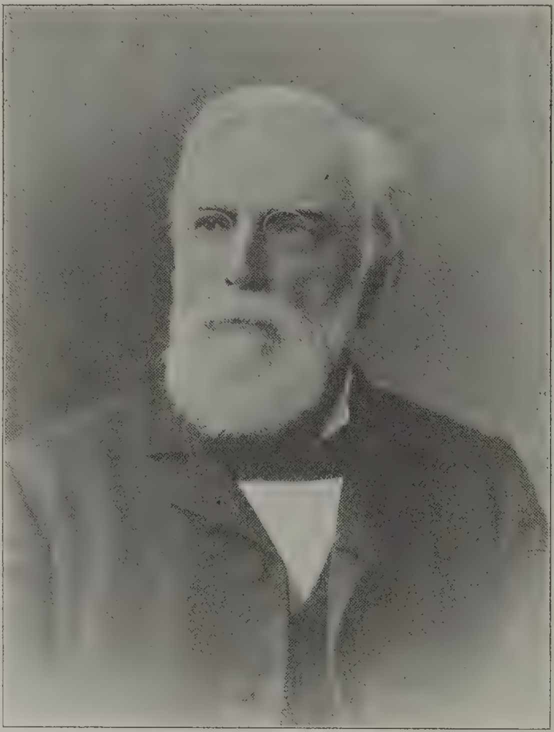
The Western Christian Advocate, disturbed because we said that Bishop Vincent had fled to South America till newspaper attacks on him had subsided, thinks our wit is malicious. That was farthest from our intention. We had already announced that the bishop had gone to South America under appointment of the Board of Bishops to discharge episcopal duties. He does not lack defenders and does not need them. His life and work are a sufficient defense against any accusations questioning his orthodoxy or his sincerity. He is as much honored among Congregationalists as in his own denomination, and the absurdty of supposing that he would fly from any such charges ought to be patent to every one who knows him or his history.

AN UNCOMMON CAREER.

BY REV. JAMES L. HILL, D. D.

"He was the cleanest, purest, whitest man I ever knew," was the utterance that came from the banks of the great Father of Waters with the earliest announcement of Dr. Alden B. Robbins's death, occurring Dec. 27. In his epitaph ought to be the words, the white-souled minister. Here is a life which has no spots to be covered. Here is our latest volume on the evidences of Christianity. This is what the gospel of Christ can do for human character. His conversion at the age of seventeen was so definite and marked that it could be called an illumination. He was well-born and delicately reared.



REV. ALDEN B. ROBBINS, D. D.

During all his pioneer associations he never lost the touch and gentility of his fine New England parentage. A vote of thanks was once passed by the Roman senate to a certain prominent man and public servant because he did not despair of the city. So Dr. Robbins's faith in the most trying hours was like the arbutus in our northern woods, blooming and fragrant in the chilling atmosphere of a tardy spring. He was one of those who went to Chicago and selected the cloth for the uniforms of Companies A. and C. of the First Iowa Infantry in the Civil War. The raciness and humor which lay but little below the surface of his nature, and which sometimes bubbled out in his occasional addresses, revealed itself to one of the soldiers in the Thirty-fifth Iowa Regiment, who found this verse marked in a copy of the Psalms given him by the genial doctor, "He teacheth my hands to war and my fingers to fight."

"I cannot play on any stringed instrument," said Themistocles, "but I can tell you how of a small village to make a great and glorious city." So could Dr. Robbins. The chilly November winds made the barren bluffs in a bend of the Great River look desolate where stands the little hamlet of Bloomington, near Muscatine, and where not a soul came to the boat to greet this young divine, born in Salem, Feb. 18, 1817, ordained in the Tabernacle Church after graduating from Amherst and Andover. He was one of the justly famed Iowa Band. After fifty-three years that man with abundant silken, snow-white hair was the oldest resident Protestant pastor of any denomination west of our great unsalted seas or for some distance east of them. For seventeen years he was president of the board of trustees of Iowa College. He was a corporate member of the American Board. He held a vast array of similar offices. If you would see his monument, look around. Mark Iowa itself. It is a Puritan State on the sunset side of the Mississippi, employing more teachers than any other State in the Union with the single exception of New York. It has the highest average intelligence of any State in our American nation. It supplied the largest proportionate number of soldiers in defense of our Union. The very name Iowa, being of Indian origin, signifies, This is the land.

But it is men like Dr. Robbins who make history like this. Their moral qualities have caused the garden State of the world to become the new Massachusetts. Brave, clean, bountiful Iowa is a fine instance of getting just the right initiative at just the right time. Her history can never be repeated between these seas. What undergraduate will take up the fallen mantle? Who will be baptized for the dead? Do we comprehend how beautiful a thing it is for the pure in heart to die? Lacking but six weeks of the outer limit of a man's years as laid down by the Psalmist, his watchers saw him drop into a quiet sleep and the peaceful end approached as quietly as a spent candle goes out when its mission of light is accomplished. His daughter Anna is the widow of the heroic President De Forest of Talladega. His son Horace is the honored secretary of Iowa College. His son John Alden has been his father's host during these last years and his daughter Esther is the wife of one of our ablest young missionaries, Rev. George E. White of Marsovan.

The world moves. Think of a Jewish rabbi —Dr. Emil G. Hirsch of Chicago—saying to his flock in a sermon preached on Christmas Day evening:

> We of the liberal church of Jews have no reason to protest at the name of Jesus. The name of him made it possible for a daughter religion to conquer the world. We Jews are religion poor and race proud. I would have the Jews enter into the spirit of this day as a day of peace on earth and good will toward men. The birthnight of Jesus was a night of persecution to the Jews, and this fact has caused us not to celebrate Christmas Day. But woe to a generation of Jews which turns that night to a night of frivolity and scoffing. If we cannot welcome, let us at least be silent on a day so sacred to others. It is a human day to men. It is the dawn of union among men.

The New York Presbytery's recent reflections on the Jewish people do not compare favorably with this in charity, do they? Yet it must not be forgotten that the Presbytery disclaimed any intention of discourtesy.

Over 100,000,000 copies of Spurgeon's sermons have been circulated, and another order for 1,000,000 sermons was recently given to the publishers. Yet people say the power of the pulpit is declining.

The Home

LOVE.

If suddenly upon the street
My gracious Saviour I should meet,
And he should say, "As I love thee,
What love hast thou to offer me?"
Then what could this poor heart of mine
Dare offer to that heart divine?

His eye would pierce my outward show,
His thought my inmost thought would know;
And if I said, "I love thee, Lord,"
He would not heed my spoken word,
Because my daily life would tell
If verily I loved him well.

If on the day or in the place
Wherein he met me face to face
My life could show some kindness done,
Some purpose formed, some work begun
For his dear sake, then it were meet
Love's gift to lay at Jesus' feet.

A practical resolution for the new year would be not to pass on vexation and fret. Why, because we have had an unpleasant encounter with one person, should we communicate our annoyance to the next friend we happen to meet? Why grieve our companions by mentioning petty worries and discouragements? It requires self-control to refrain from inflicting our physical distresses upon the members of our family, but talking about the headache or the toothache does not make it any easier to bear and will unintentionally bring discomfort to others. Close friends claim the privilege of sharing our confidence in genuine tribulation or perplexity, but have we any right to allow passing moods to make a needless demand on the sympathies of our companions and fellow-workers? To them and to ourselves we owe it to cultivate a serene, sunny nature, determined to bear in patience and silence the little daily crosses and by radiating cheer to add to the harmony and happiness of our small world.

A suggestive comparison between woman's relation to man in Shakespeare's time and at the present day was recently made by a distinguished Boston lecturer. "The province of mediæval woman," he said, "was to charm, cheer and comfort; that of the nineteenth century woman is to admonish, impress and edify." The ripple of amusement which passed through his audience made the speaker hasten to give assurance that he meant his words to be taken in all earnestness, as a tribute to the modern woman who seeks primarily not to please and indulge the other sex, but to aid men to do right and be true to the best that is in them, at whatever cost. The founding of a Christian home frequently calls for such a resolute stand on the part of the home-maker for principle and lofty ideals. Sometimes it takes courage and tact, as well as firm determination, for a young wife to help her husband conquer habits of sloth or indulgence, to insist on family worship and regular church attendance and to hold him up to her conception of Christian manhood, but verily she hath her reward. Her children shall "arise up and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praiseth her," for "she will do him good and not evil all the days of her life."

When God is pleased and wishes to bless the men he loves, his hands have other gifts than silver and gold.—Ian Maclaren.

"FOR TOM."

BY HARRY HEMAN MALLORY.

The streaks of gray on Farmer Belden's head were fast turning to white and his figure was bent with toil, but his sunburned face wore an expression of purpose as he came into the kitchen where his wife was preparing supper and sat down by the fire.

"Martha, I'm going to Chicago."

Mrs. Belden dropped the stick of wood she was about to put into the stove and stared at her husband in amazement.

"What in the world are you going to Chicago for?" she exclaimed.

"To get work. I might as well tell you, wife; I've been to see Squire Scott today, and I can't get another dollar on this place. It's either that, or—or Tom comes home."

Mrs. Belden wiped away a tear with her apron, and then mechanically commenced her work again. She couldn't speak. For more than a score of years they had worked and saved that they might have a little home of their own, and how thankful she had felt when, three years ago, her husband brought home the last mortgage, redeemed! It was for Tom, their only child, that they had sacrificed so much.

"O Henry, I don't know what to do or say!" Her voice trembled, but her husband knew how she loved Tom and knew that she would consent.

Mr. Belden had done everything in his power to raise money that Tom might go to college, but times had been hard and it was necessary to mortgage the place again. Crop after crop failed until he had drawn all the money that Squire Scott would advance on their place, and a crisis had come. Mr. Belden was a good carpenter and he felt confident of securing plenty of work in a big city like Chicago, though there was none about home.

"You know the elder says Tom is so bright and ought to have advantages," said Mr. Belden, after a moment.

"Yes, the Lord has been good to give us such a son," replied his wife, solemnly; "there aren't many like him, and such are created for something special, I believe. We're held responsible for the way we bring him up, and we ought to do our best by him on that account, even if we didn't love him enough to do it just for his own sake. The Lord knows how we've struggled to educate that boy, but now," her voice was broken with sobs for a minute, "but now—no, it's the last thing on earth we can do, and I sha'n't oppose it; maybe it's the Lord's will—at least, no one shall ever say we left a thing undone we could do—for our Tom."

A group of Milton College boys were lounging around the smoking-room of their fraternity house.

"I say, fellows," said one, "this term is half over and we haven't had a good out-of-town lark yet. Who's got something to propose?"

"Here's a scheme, Tom!" cried "Rusty" Brown, who had won his title by the passive virtue of possessing red hair. "Let's take a trip up to Chicago! The express makes the run in three hours, and we can catch the midnight train back so as to be in bed by 3.30. What do you say, boys?"

"What's the tariff?" asked a conservative.

"O, it won't much more than spoil a tenner. I say, boys, let's go in and have a time."

No one in that noisy group was more anxious for the trip than Tom Belden, but this was not just the kind of lark he meant. He was eager enough for the fun; it was the money that made him hesitate now. Something in his last letter from home had set him to thinking. How earnestly he had promised to work hard and to be saving if his parents would send him to college! He had undergone the usual evolution of a bright country lad in college. Unsophisticated, fresh and awkward upon arrival at Milton, development began at once. Natural ability gave him a good standing in class, muscular prowess made him prominent in athletics and college sport. In short, he became desirable fraternity material, and two or three of those Greek letter societies turned their attention toward him. Tom knew that he could not afford to join a fraternity, but he had sorely felt the chilly atmosphere that a "non-frat" or "barb" is so often made to feel in college, and the luxurious clubrooms of the chapter house, the music, the tennis and, above all, the persuasive manner which fraternity men know how to assume toward a man whom they "rush," overcame his opposition.

The attendant extravagances of his new life increased his expenses largely, but never had a complaint come. Little did Tom know the sacrifices that were made in that humble home while he enjoyed himself at college. Little did he suspect the prayer that went up as his mother, with a cheerful tenderness of which only mothers are capable, suffered hours of extra toil for the want of kitchen conveniences that a few shillings would buy. Tom had money to make the trip to Chicago, yes, the last letter from home had brought twenty-five dollars, but in that letter was a sentence which made him sad, for it was the first time that his mother had ever said a doubting word. "Dear Tom, please be careful, and make this go as far as it will." That was all, but it meant a great deal. However, Tom had never visited Chicago, and the boys, arguing that it is a part of a man's education to see the world, finally persuaded him to go.

The next day a jolly group of boys boarded the Chicago train. They joked and laughed and sung, as a group of college boys always does on a train, excepting Tom, who had a worried air.

"Come, cheer up, old fellow. What's the matter with you tonight, Tom?" said Brown, who had taken his seat beside Tom.

"I don't feel just right about this trip, Rusty. I haven't as much money at my disposal as you have, and I really cannot afford it."

"O, that's it, is it? Another economical attack. I was afraid you'd been caught ponying at the quiz this morning. You'd better go down and get that office job at Lawyer Cox's. He ran an ad in the paper tonight—$6 a week and not many errands either."

Tom had read this advertisement, but he smiled at the suggestion that he, a Junior in college, might take such a position. However, it was not his nature to be quiet long, and soon he had resumed his usual post as leader of the merriment and did his best to make the trip a pleasant one.

A few hours later the boys emerged from one of the largest theaters in Chicago, filled with raptures over the success of grand opera. Tom Belden for nearly three hours had felt himself living in the triumph of the music, and now he felt like going home and thinking about it all over again, but it was not train time. After luncheon there was still an hour which must be utilized, and they started to walk about the streets, gazing at the show windows, so brilliant in their holiday decorations, and stopping often for a warm drink at some soda fountain, for the night was cold.

After a few minutes they left State Street, and, winding through the maze of the great, dark city, they walked about until they began to get tired, and, although not one of them would have admitted it, the black alleys, the strange noises made by the wind around the high buildings and the other unaccustomed circumstances produced a feeling of timidity very unusual to them. There is something mysterious about a sleeping city, and at the midnight hour, when the great, struggling mass is approaching its quietest tranquillity, the clanging of a cable car, the suspicious glance of a burly policeman and the sidewise look of some questionable prowler give to a stranger a queerly uncomfortable feeling.

"Well, boys, I'm about ready to go home," said Rusty. "Let's steer towards the station."

"There's a half-hour yet," said Tom, looking at his watch. "O, look at this coming," he cried, suddenly, pointing up the street. "What is it?"

The object of their surprise was a tottering, half-drunken wretch coming toward them, incased in about the worst collection of rags they had ever seen. A short distance away he turned, crossed the street and staggered up the broad steps of a magnificent building.

"Well, this is queer. Let's investigate," said Bob Hunter. "That's what we are here for." And the boys followed the tramp.

At the inner doors of the great building a guard stopped them, demanding their business.

"We are from Milton College," replied Tom, "and are just looking about town. What building is this?"

"Well, ordinarily," said the policeman, shifting the tobacco to the opposite side of his mouth, "it's the City Hall, but the mayor has turned it into a poorhouse now, I guess," and his tone expressed hearty disgust. "Go on in and see for yourselves," and the boys entered.

Two hours before these college boys had been seated in the midst of the wealth and fashion of the city. Nearly every one about them wore evening dress, and on either side were boxes filled with diamond-studded, pearl-bedecked leaders of society, while they listened to the most celebrated singers in the world. Now, as they entered the great hallway, the under side of the page of Chicago's story was at their feet. They found themselves in a stifling atmosphere, warm, but charged with foul breath, for, stretched out on the stone floor were hundreds of homeless men and boys, the scum of the streets.

Long will the poorer classes of Chicago remember that hard winter of '93, when the great exposition left them not only unprovisioned for the winter, but multiplied in numbers, when the more destitute of them ate at free soup counters and lodged at the City Hall, or equally uncomfortable places, and were thankful to their benefactors for shelter from the winter night. Tom and his companions gazed wonderingly at the sight before them. With heads to the wall, two rows of men arranged themselves along the narrower lobbies, while they were scattered about promiscuously in the central hall. At the opera Tom had quite seconded the argument that it is part of a man's education to see the world, and now the words struck him with double force. Some of the men lying on the floor had honest looking faces, and some even respectable clothes, but the majority were of the lowest type, filthy, degraded, with faces full of hardship and sin.

"Come on, fellows, I've had enough of this," said Tom, before they had advanced ten yards and the others were of the same opinion, excepting Bob Hunter.

"You're a nervy lot," said he. "We want to be able to tell the fellows something about this when we go back. Come on, let's go through."

Much against their wills, the others followed, and they started down the aisle between the prostrate forms. How horrible and disgusting it all was to Tom. Yet all these creatures at his feet were human beings. Perhaps they had been brought up in homes of comfort, though they were homeless and penniless tonight. And Tom's heart filled with a sense of mingled pity and thankfulness that his lot was different.

Suddenly he caught sight of a patched sleeve that gave him a far deeper pang. It was only a piece of gingham, but by some of the humblest things of life our heart strings are pulled strongest. This poor man's shirt, for his coat was under his head, was patched with cloth of the same pattern that his mother most often chose for her kitchen aprons; and the recollection of her made his eyes moist, for perhaps this man had a wife like her, whose loving hands had so tenderly mended that shirt. Tom pulled out a dollar, and, kneeling down, he thrust it into the man's pocket, that a ray of hope might brighten his life when he awoke and found it there. As he did so, he saw the face, which was partially hidden by the patched sleeve, and the glimpse filled him with horror. The old man's beard was ragged, his hair unkempt and his face soiled, but it was the dear face that Tom knew so well.

"Father!" he gasped, in a tone which caused the other boys, now some distance ahead, to turn about in wonder. Then, white and frightened, he threw himself on his knees and peered into the face of the homeless man at his feet.

"O, my father! my father!" he cried, in a voice of agony. "Dear Lord, forgive me; it is for me that he is here."

The words of his mother's letter came to him again, and now he realized their full meaning. "Father, dear father, speak to me and forgive me." But the old man slept on. Long and wearily he had tramped about the streets of Chicago, looking for work and shivering in the cold. Some pitied him, others cursed him for the annoyance he gave. Tom knew what a struggle it must have been for his father to lie down among this vagrant crowd, and as he looked into his face the thought came to him: "How would father feel to have me find him here? He shall never know it." Pale and trembling Tom arose to his feet.

"Fellows," said he, and even under such conditions there was a touch of pride in his voice, "this is my father. He has come to Chicago to earn money for me, and this is the result."

"We'll send him home," stammered Brown, turning away to hide his tears.

Two or three crisp bills were put into the old man's pocket with a note which Bob Hunter wrote on a note-book leaf, and leading Tom away hastened for the train. That night's experience made Tom Belden realize how the lives of his father and mother were wrapped up in his, and made him resolve that, for his part, no desire for position or enjoyment should cause them further sacrifice.

When Farmer Belden awoke next morning the noise of traffic was beginning to come through the corridors of the City Hall. Stiff and sore from his hard bed, he looked about him in a dazed sort of way before the awfulness of his situation dawned upon him, and then he knelt and offered up the silent prayer, so often repeated, that he might find work to keep himself from starving and to earn money for Tom. As he arose to his feet with an audible "Amen" the tears were running down his face. A stern-looking policeman, who had been watching him, brushed his handkerchief across his face and, directing him to a free soup house, watched him with a pitying air as he picked his way out between the prostrate rows of unfortunate humanity.

At the outer doorway the biting morning wind made him thrust his hands into his pockets. In amazement he pulled out the crumpled paper, a five-dollar bill, three twos and a one, and neatly folded with them a slip of paper, on which he read: "From friends who see in yours an honest face. Please use this money to go to your home." The good man's perplexity was almost pitiful. Stepping into the shelter of a big column he examined the bills carefully, reread the note and then, raising his eyes, said, fervently, "I thank thee, O Lord."

After a warm breakfast he bought a ticket for home. His plans had failed miserably, yet somehow he did not worry now, for he felt that the overruling hand which had directed that money into his pocket would take care of Tom. Yes, it had already cared for Tom, and with infinitely greater wisdom than the pious farmer had conceived, for Tom had been made a man.

Late that afternoon Mrs. Belden was sitting in her little front room trying to knit a pair of mittens for her husband, but she dropped so many stitches that she laid down the yarn at last in despair. She couldn't work, for today the usual postal card from her husband had failed to come, and her heart was filled with misgiving. As she sat by the window thinking, a neighbor drove up, and saying that the station agent had asked him to leave it as he went by, handed her a yellow envelope. A telegram! Mrs. Belden sank into her chair, trembling with fear, as the neighbor turned to go, expressing the hope that it contained no bad news.

"Henry is killed, I know he is," she said to herself, not daring at first to break the seal. Finally she gathered courage and tore open the envelope.

"Have found work in lawyer's office for my spare time. Shall need no more money from home. Tom."

The mingled feeling of scattered fears and new joy brought the glad tears of thankfulness and her wrought up senses found relief in a good, hearty cry. Just then she heard a step on the porch, and as she looked up through her tears she saw her husband coming through the door, a glad smile on his face as he held out his arms toward her. After a moment's embrace, she hastened to show the telegram from Tom, which the mails had been thought too slow to carry, and the good man shed tears of thanksgiving too.

"After all, Henry, you didn't really need to go to Chicago, did you?" she said.

Mr. Belden was not so sure, and explained his experience and the strange gift of money.

Then, raising her eyes heavenward, with that loving trustfulness which had made her life such a happiness to her husband and son, she said, "The Lord has answered our prayer, because we did what we could —for Tom."

STEPMOTHERS AND MOTHERS-IN-LAW.

BY KATE UPSON CLARK.

One of our modern novelists makes her heroine say, "Liking stepmothers is a cultivated taste." There is a mine of wisdom in this sally, which it is doubtful whether the writer herself fully appreciated. The thoughtful student of our social customs must have been struck with the vast amount of trouble, real or imaginary, which is caused by the advent of stepmothers. Next to the great disturbers of our peace, death, insanity, crime and bodily illness, the stepmother is perhaps the most frequent cause, innocently and unintentionally oftentimes, of family misery. An unprincipled or ill-balanced woman, when placed in this delicate and responsible position, necessarily creates distress, but in many cases an excellent stepmother, even when of proper age, high qualifications and the best spirit, is received by her young charges so unkindly that the home never becomes happy under her management. It has often been observed that the younger the children are when placed under her care the more likely a stepmother is to succeed with them, This shows that the difficulty arises largely from the acquired attitude of the children's minds. If they have become permeated with the wicked old fairy tale theory that the stepmother is an ogre, or if mistaken friends have told them that loyalty to their own mother makes it necessary that they should ill-treat the newcomer, then it is plain to be seen that the best stepmother has little chance of success with them.

Now, since the stepmother, as we say of so many institutions, has "come to stay," since she is a recognized and legitimate necessity of modern society, and since peace and righteousness should be the aims of every Christian, should we not understand that we all have a responsibility regarding the mental attitude of the community toward this question? One mother recognized that she had such a responsibility. Her young daughter came in one day and remarked, "O, mamma, isn't it dreadful! Susie Bell has got a stepmother. She is coming home next week and Susie says she knows she shall hate her and she is going to be just as mean to her as she can be."

"Why, Helen! How can she be so wicked?" exclaimed the mother. "If you have a chance to speak with her about it, do try to say something which will make her change her mind. Her mother has been dead some years now, and Mr. Bell has had great trouble in getting persons to superintend his family. I am sincerely glad that he is to have a wife again. I hope she will prove to be a good woman, and that the children will try to love her, and that they will have a happy home. But they never will have unless Susie alters her attitude. It is going to be hard for the stepmother to get used to her duties there under the most favorable circumstances. If the children oppose her it will be trebly hard. Make it a point, my daughter, always to fight this sentiment as long as you live. If you ever should have a stepmother yourself I hope that you would treat her like a lady and a Christian, and would reprove and labor with your brothers and sisters if they did not do the same."

Those of us who have known the saintly lives of some stepmothers, and the great work which they have done, will echo this brave woman's words. They should be spoken by every mother to her children whenever opportunity offers. If sensible people would unite to make this view prevail, an enormous amount of unhappiness might be prevented. There are plenty of causes for sorrow in this world without allowing those to operate which might as well be banished. Children will seldom act right under new circumstances unless they have been explicitly taught beforehand. They should be carefully instructed during all their lives in the matter of stepmothers. Their story-books will usually afford texts enough for the purpose.

The same thing may be said of the abused mother-in-law. All women who have children expect sometime to become mothers-in-law, and all wish to be well treated by their prospective sons and daughters-in-law. But how many mothers, as their children approach maturity, ever take pains to instruct them as to the proper treatment of a mother-in-law? On the contrary, most mothers laugh with their young people over the vulger jests on the subject which fill the "funny papers," and never think to say anything serious upon it. There are certain duties which pertain to every relation of life. We are too apt to take it for granted that our young people are so well informed and so reasonable that they do not need our personal advice in such a matter as this. But duty cannot be made too clear to any of them, especially when it is so vague and so obscured with mistaken fun as the treatment of the mother-in-law. All of us have seen mothers-in-law treated abominably by young popinjays who were not worthy to unloose the latchets of those good women's shoes. There is often an ethical stupidity on matters like this which requires enlightening quite as much as intellectual stupidity, and it is often forgotten, also, that the rules of the Christian religion are just as binding in the relation of the stepmother and the mother-in-law as in any others.

THE RELATION OF FOOD TO HEALTH.

In an able paper on this important topic a writer in the American Kitchen Magazine says:

> It has been estimated by reliable authorities that ninety per cent. of all disease may be traced, directly or indirectly, to dietetic indiscretions or to an ill-balanced or one-sided diet. This is not surprising when we consider how long man has treated his stomach as a convenient receptacle for the gratification of his palate. There is, however, no need to decry the pleasures of the palate under proper restrictions. The sense of taste is not the least of the many blessings conferred by a wise Creator, and how to please the palate without giving offense to the stomach is a problem worth studying. If no pleasure were attached to eating, man would soon suffer for lack of suitable nourishment; the satisfaction of hunger would not be sufficient incentive for civilized man either in the production or preparation of his food products. Undoubtedly the human body possesses great adaptability and may survive upon a very limited dietary, yet the fact remains that the highest mental and physical vigor can only be attained by nations who have a liberal food supply.
> As to the best diet for man, authorities differ. Whether it shall be vegetable, or mainly animal, or composed of fruits and nuts, has excited wide discussion and each has its advocates, with the preponderance of evidence in favor of a mixed diet. Certainly the anatomical structure of the teeth and stomach favors a diet of both animal and vegetable food for man, and places him, in his dietetic habit, as a mean between the graminivorous and carnivorous animals.

Closet and Altar

No life is complete which does not some times sit trustfully waiting to be fed by God.

We have passed over the threshold of another year. After the week of prayer may it be a year of work. May the year not be just the same old round of duty and care. May we be more true to thee.—C. L. Goodell.

No man ever yet asked to be, as the days pass by, more and more noble and sweet and pure and heavenly-minded—no man ever yet prayed that the evil spirits of hatred and pride and passion and worldliness might be cast out of his soul—without his petition being granted and granted to the letter. And with all other gifts God then gives us his own self besides. He makes us know him and love him and live in him.—F. W. Farrar.

Happy the heart that keeps its twilight hour,
And, in the depths of heavenly peace reclined,
Loves to commune with thoughts of tender power,
Thoughts that ascend, like angels beautiful,
On shining Jacob's ladder of the mind.
—Paul H. Hayne.

Love is the only atmosphere in which God can reveal himself. Love alone has eyes to see God and ears to hear him. He that loveth not, knoweth not God, for God is love. If the presence of God is not known to us, if God's power is not proved in our lives, if God's favor is not resting upon our work, let us be sure that somewhere there is a hindrance. And if we seek God simply and earnestly, he shall meet us and reveal himself to us.—Mark Guy Pearse.

Is the work difficult?
Jesus directs thee.
Is the path dangerous?
Jesus protects thee.
Fear not, and falter not;
Let the word cheer thee!
All through the coming year
He will be with thee!
—Frances Ridley Havergal.

Lord of heaven and earth, we bless thee that heaven and earth are always named together in thy Book. In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth; and Jesus said, Father, Lord of heaven and earth. Teach us that we belong to one another, and we belong to God; give us the joy of fellowship; deliver us from the idea of self-completeness; give us to feel that all thou hast made is one. Thus shall our lives be godly; thus shall we live the Christ life. He saveth others, himself he did not save. He liveth for men and women and little children, and he made all the poor his friends, and sent the rich empty away as they came. We bless thee for this Son of Man, God the Son, the Eternal Wonder, the Unspeakable Joy. He promised to give us rest if we would come to him, and he promised to give us strength wherewith to come. So all things are of grace. We bless thee, therefore, that though we can do nothing, we can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth us. May we always await the incoming strength, and thereby glorify thee, through Christ our Lord. Amen.

Mothers in Council.

O thou who "setteth the solitary in families," we bless thee that thou hast permitted us to know the love of children. We thank thee for the privilege of motherhood. May we think more of the comfort and less of the care which it involves. Help us to walk gently before thee, our God, and before those whom it is our pleasure to serve in the daily life of the home. May we ever remember and gladly follow him whose glory it was that he "came not to be ministered unto, but to minister." Give us serenity and patience, even in the midst of perplexing cares. We would wait upon thee, O Lord. We would be of good courage knowing that thou shalt strengthen our hearts. Be with us, as thou wast with our fathers, and make us all—parents and children—grateful for the goodly heritage into which we have entered. We thank thee for the precious memories which enrich our past. We bless thee for present good. We trust thee for future guidance. Our times are in thy hand. Lead us through all the devious paths of our pilgrim way until we shall pass through death into the fullness of life. O thou who didst die that we might live, prepare a place for us, and all dear to us, in the Father's house. Forgive, O God, whatever is wrong in the ordering of our earthly homes, and fit us day by day for that home of the soul where thy servants shall serve thee day and night. For Jesus Christ's sake we ask it. Amen.

THE MOTHER'S WIDER OUTLOOK.

At times it may seem to the busy mother of a young family that her home duties may well claim her whole time and thought. Yet who can so ill afford to narrow her life down to the bare practicalities of everyday life as she who has immortal souls intrusted to her to train and develop? Who so needs the wider outlook, the higher uplift, that comes from a wise course of reading, or Christian work that brings her in contact with all lands and peoples as well as with the needs and suffering at her own door?

I give an extract from a letter written by a most practical business man, whose wife was the energetic housekeeper in a family of ten: "My wife returned from T—— last night, full of missionary zeal and the work of the Woman's Board. If the heathen are ever benefited by these meetings I am sure the women who attend them are doubly so. The brief respite from household cares, if nothing else, is a blessing to them. Africa, India, China and the distant isles of the sea have become household words."

Another, who had been an interested worker in church and temperance, the mother of six young children, four of them under five years of age, said to me, in reference to the W. C. T. U.: "No, I cannot attend very regularly just now, but my heart is in the work more than ever now that I have three boys, and I am anxious in any way that I can to help to make the world better for them. Then my heart reaches out more than ever to all the mothers and the boys and girls who have not the privileges of a Christian home that mine have. I hope, when at liberty, to be fitted to do better work for God and home and humanity."

That mother lives far below her privileges who does not find her sympathies enlarge, her unselfishness grow, her interest in all humanity deepen because she has those dearer than life dependent upon her. On the other hand, the true mother will daily find the need of bringing to bear upon her work all the inspiration and real enthusiasm that come from reaching unto the highest ideal and viewing her homely duties in their true relation to the great world outside. I know a mother who, living in a country district, with but little educational facilities, strove to help her young daughter with her studies, saying: "It means extra work for me, which often tires and makes my head ache. Still, as we read together in history, or dip into the scientific truths taught in physical and astronomical geography, I realize the most pleasurable enlargement of thought and feeling, a true recreation, as I live over again my old days of study. I don't want my children to go ahead of me mentally, but if I can read with them I hope to keep younger in mind and thus hold them in my confidence and companionship."

But how can this be attained? How can time and energy be found for all this by the busy mother without "burning the candle at both ends"? I would make suggestions on three different lines. First, by greater simplicity in our daily lives, so that the true interests of home, its health and happiness, shall overrule the dictates of fashion in regard to food, dress and house furnishings. Next, there might be united and systematic effort to make more effective domestic service in our families. This should be forwarded by regular industrial training in our public schools, as well as by evening or Saturday schools in towns and cities. Our W. C. T. U. and other women's associations are doing a good work in this line, but there is room for much greater endeavor in this truly Christian effort. It is one of the keys to the solution of some of the social problems of the present day.

The third point I would emphasize is the need of greater unity and co-operation between father and mother in seeking the highest interests of their family. In this present day too much is expected of the mother, and the true ideal of the Christian home as laid down in Scripture is largely lost sight of. The father, immersed in business or busied with various clubs or societies, sees little of his children. The young people themselves, between the claims of school and society, or even church engagements, are almost lost to the home. It should be the aim of both parents to make the home the center of all Christian and educational influences, and by each sharing the duties, the mother may have with the others her God-given right of time and opportunity to cultivate her mind and soul. It should be her earnest resolve that neither the demands of society nor the domestic needs of her family should so engross her that she is too tired and nervous to give her real self to her loved ones, or join with them in outside interests. A little thought and sacrifice on the part of the father or older members of the family will help much in this and be "twice blessed." A. L. C. M.

THE BIRTHDAY OF MY BOY.

The time rolls on and brings my weary feet
Across the threshold of another year.
Ah! I shall never more this season greet
As in the days when my dear boy was here.

My grief seems almost more than I can bear.
I see no cheering ray of hope or joy.
Each dawning day of sorrow has its share,
And nearer brings the birthday of my boy.

O! how we loved to watch his childish glee
As eagerly he welcomed in the day
When gifts of love were lavished, full and free,
To make his little heart so blithe and gay.

Still not content, his generous spirit sought
That others, too, might share his mirth and joy;
And little friends and playmates oft were brought
To celebrate the birthday of our boy.

O mother heart, look up and let one ray
Of heavenly light illumine all thy woe.
If love of earth could make so bright a day,
Much more then can "our Father's love" bestow.

Think of the beauties of the heavenly land,
Its treasures rare and gifts of wondrous store,
The raptures of that joyous angel band,
Who dwell within his presence evermore.

With sweet accord they strike their harps of gold,
And in exultant strains forever sing.
O joy supreme and happiness untold!
A birthday in the palace of the King.

Near to the Saviour's side one well-known face
All radiant with seraphic joy I see,
And lo! he asks with eager, pleading grace
That thou this day shalt not forgotten be.

'Tis granted, and an angel speeds afar,
Fulfilling the sweet wish inspired by love,
And sets the golden gates of heaven ajar
That thou might'st catch the echoes from above.

So as this day dawns comfort thy sad heart,
And let sweet thoughts of heaven bring thee joy.
God knows thy grief and will his strength impart,
To lead thee through the birthday of thy boy.

PRETENDING TO BE WICKED.

Here is one of Gail Hamilton's pithy utterances on a matter that touches closely every Christian life. We quote from an article in The Congregationalist, July 7, 1861:

> A man must have a pretty good opinion of himself in private to risk the defamation of his character in public. People do not generally hit the nail of their sins on the head on public occasions. You do not hear a miserly Christian calling himself stingy in the prayer meeting, nor will an untrustworthy church member calmly accuse himself of lying, or a gossiping sister affirm that she is a common tattler and mischief-maker. But a man may confess himself in general terms a worm without hurting anybody or meaning anything in particular, and at the same time soothe his conscience and perhaps really believe that he is devoutly and sincerely humble, or at any rate not suspect the contrary. Let, however, his partner in the shop, or his political friend or rival, intimate to him in a secular and special way that he is a little weak in mind or morally unsound and he will soon discover that, unlike worms, he has bright eyes, well-defined lungs and tongue, not to say fists and feet.
> God requires no morbid humiliation, even when sincere. Job was undoubtedly sincere, yet the Lord answered him out of the whirlwind: "Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge? Gird up now thy loins like a man!"

Visible religion must have pillars to rest upon and without visible religion there cannot be invisible religion.—British Weekly.

The Conversation Corner.

I INTENDED to wish you a Happy New Year last week, but the "white old hen" and her admirers took up all the room, one letter about her (from Iowa) being left out even then. Confidentially I think that D. F. would prefer one wild goose which he could bring down on his North River flats, or a dozen "yellow legs" sandpipers, such as Kingsley B. and I had for dinner at his cabin on the occasion of our visit there, than all the "white old hens with yellow legs" which "the whole boundless continent" should report to us! Well, I send you my hearty wish as to your next year now, and will add this simple suggestion—not to depend altogether upon others to make it happy. You can make it happy yourself—and one good way to do it is not to think anything about it, but try to make somebody else happy!

Several of you have tried it already—and you may be sure that the little Armenian orphans to whom you have given a home will be happy all the winter long. I am just sending thirty dollars ($30) more to the publishers, making seventy dollars in all—that is seven children cared for. And there is more to follow! These gifts—all of which are acknowledged personally (except anonymous ones!), come from all quarters of the land—from Kingston of the Pilgrim Colony on the Atlantic to the Dakotas in the North, New Mexico in the South and California on the Western shore. In many cases the money is earned by the children or taken from their Christmas allowance. One boy writes:

. . . My father pays me ten cents a week and I put two cents of it in the mite box for missions. My mother would like to know what that "unimportant paragraph" was that D. F. omitted in your account of the children's party at Mrs. Coffin's. I would like to become a Cornerer.

P. S.—The Congregationalist has just come and mother is satisfied about that paragraph.

One Sunday school primary class sends a special offering, although already "sending a little girl in Cumberland Gap to school." Another teacher says:

Three boys in our class told us that in their school is an Armenian boy whose parents were killed in the recent massacres. He and his little sister have come to live with their grandmother in this city. He learns the English language very rapidly and "knows everything else," the boys say. He has an Armenian Bible with him all the time and reads it in school when his lessons are learned and at recess. The boys wonder why he loves it so well and some laugh at him. Then he says, "I have something better than you."

Shame on the boys that would make fun of an orphan boy in a strange land because he reads the Bible which perhaps his murdered parents had taught him to love. Such a boy ought the rather to be encouraged and helped. I have seen several times within a few days a boy who has come to America from the region of massacres in order to get an education. He was led to do it, he told me, from seeing a man who had obtained an education here—I think at Williams College—and returned to Turkey. "Then I thought I would like to become a man, like him, and do something in the world!" I do not see how he is going to succeed unaided, but he is in earnest, and "God helps those who help themselves." I have some sympathy with the boy in New York with whose contribution his grandmother sends this word:

. . . ——, seven years old, wishes that he could kill "that sultan," but he would be a very dead man if wishes would kill him!

I will omit the boy's name, for if the grand vizier should read this Corner and interpret it to the sultan, he might make requisition on our President for this young American rebel! But let the boy be patient—even if the European Powers (Weaknesses!) can find no way to stop these horrors, and our Government cannot protect its own flag and citizens in the Great Assassin's dominions, the Lord is king and will some day avenge "his slaughtered saints"!

Dear Mr. Martin: I am glad to hear about Pomiuk again. I feel as if I wanted to help him and with papa's aid I inclose —— for his benefit, also —— for the Armenian children. I think the bird you inquired about was either the woodpecker or the yellow hammer. WALTER R.

This last is in answer to a ? in the Corner of Nov. 19, as to a hammering sound heard in the woods. Here is another answer:

COUNCIL GROVE, KAN.

Dear Mr. Martin: May not that hammering that you heard in the woods have been the drumming of a partridge? In my boyhood, sixty or seventy years ago, I often heard in my father's cedar swamp [in Worcester County, Mr. A.?—Mr. M.] sounds that I was told were caused by a partridge sitting on a log and beating it with its wings. I never saw the bird going through with the performance, and this may not be the correct explanation. Cyclopedia says that the male of the ruffled grouse (called partridge in New England) makes a peculiar drumming sound, standing upon a log, inflating the body and beating the air with short, quick strokes of the wings.

L. A.

See about this in Nuttall's Ornithology, 2.33; as to the yellow hammer (golden-winged woodpecker), 1.439; also in Stearns's N. E. Bird Life, 2.83; and Miss Merriam's Birds Through an Opera Glass, 49. The tarantula question is also commented upon.

BEYOND THE MISSISSIPPI.

. . . Another thing in the same Corner [as the white old hen query, Oct. 29] is about the tarantula and the blue wasp. I saw a pair in the middle of a Texas village. The fight was over and the tarantula dead. The wasp had hold of one leg and was dragging him in a straight line towards a hole in the foundation of a building ten or twelve yards off. Directly in his way stood a large dry goods box. He apparently belonged to the "middle of the road" faction, and no trifle like a three-foot box could turn him. He went up its perpendicular side backward, lifting the tarantula. Once he fell but did not let go. The second time he got to the top, went across, down the other side, resumed his "bee line," and disappeared under the building.

CARPENTERIA, CAL.

Dear Mr. Martin: Some one asked in the Corner what was to be done with so many thousands of tarantulas that had been shipped from California to Australia. If horned toads had been substituted for tarantulas the item would have been about right, but your correspondent's wonder might have been the same. The horned toads are shipped to Australia to prey upon some insects which were very destructive and did not seem to have any natural enemy at home. So California returned the favor of the black lady bird sent from Australia by sending the toads to them. They are about as frightful looking creatures as the tarantulas but are perfectly harmless and are often kept as pets. T. W. W.

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK.

What Is a Jackaroo? An English tutor in Australia describes in an English magazine his adventures while on a trip with a sheep drove in that country. The story is full of strange words as well as strange experiences. The drove is called a "mob"; the writer rode "a black bobtailed cob"; on one side of his saddle "hung a billycan, on the other his pannikin"; he tells how that "hanging up their horses they adjourned to the humpy for refreshment," etc. A "new-chum" is a new recruit in the cattle business, and a "jackaroo" is a young fellow from England or from the towns who is apprenticed at a squatter station to learn the business. Two "new-chums" who were out kangaroo shooting overheard a man at a bush house say that there were "a couple of jackaroos in the five-mile tank." Supposing it to be some wild animal, they snatched their rifles and hastened away to the dam. Only finding two fellows bathing they shouted out to them, "Hi, you fellows there, have you seen any jackaroos about? We want to shoot one." The writer gives specimens of aboriginal names of places, such as Budda-buddah, Eenaweena, Weeboolaboola, and Upotipotpong.

A Bright Pony. The Scrap-Book had a few weeks ago instances showing that horses could both reason and play jokes. The Animal World has a story of a British horse which combined intelligence and a sense of humor. It was raining hard and everything was soaked. The poor horse looked in vain for a dry spot to lie down. At length he deliberately went to a cow which had been quietly lying for a long time in one spot, and kicked her until she felt obliged to rise and get away from him, whereupon he immediately lay down in the dry place she had vacated! Bright? Yes—but should you not think he would have felt just a bit ashamed to have played such a selfish trick on a poor, innocent fellow-creature?

Dogs and Bicycles. The R. S. P. C. A.—which of course means the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals—has publicly protested against the injury done to dogs by bicycles. It is not that they themselves ride the fascinating wheel, nor that they are run over by it, but that in attempting to keep up with their masters who are on the wheels they are obliged to run at high rate of speed for long distances, and either die in the attempt or, stopping, get astray and are left without visible means of subsistence. Official cautions have been issued to bicyclists to leave their dogs at home or to ride at a speed attainable by them.

Cats in the French Army. Great numbers of them are used in the military magazines to keep down the rats and mice. Their food is regulated by official decree—two and one-half centimes per diem per cap. (that is, per cat). But that does not buy them enough and they are reported as growing very thin, so that a commission of specialists was appointed by the French Ministry to investigate the matter, and they gravely reported that "the cats of the army are very slow to accustom themselves to the diet prescribed by the government circular. They seldom eat bread," etc. Perhaps when the societies and governments have cared for all the tired dogs and dainty cats, they will inquire into the condition of tens of thousands of homeless, starving children in the dominion of their cherished ally, Abdul Hamid II., G. R. A. E.!

A Bird's Protest against Man's Inhumanity. Mr. Puddefoot—I do not at this moment recall his full name or titles, but you all know who Mr. Puddefoot is—told me the other day of a deserted oriole's nest in which were found two bits of paper: on one were the words, Man around, on the other, Dangerous service.

The Sunday School

LESSON FOR JAN. 17. Acts 2: 32-47.

A MULTITUDE CONVERTED.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D. D.

Whitsunday—or whitesunday—has been as long observed as a festival in the church as Easter or Christmas. It commemorates the descent of the Holy Spirit and the beginning of the Christian Church. It deserves as wide recognition as any festival in Christian history. Our attention in this lesson is especially directed to the organization of the church. We find here:

I. The preaching which makes converts. This first sermon, preached by Peter, is a worthy model. Its theme was Jesus Christ. It declared the wickedness of those who crucified him. It affirmed and emphasized his resurrection, of which the preacher and his fellow-disciples were witnesses. It proclaimed that the Holy Spirit, whose signs had brought together the hearers, was the gift of Jesus. It included extended quotations from the Scriptures. Prophetic writings and psalms were cited to prove that the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ and the gift of the Holy Spirit were according to the purposes of God. It asserted that the ascension of Christ to the right hand of God had been foretold in the Scriptures, and that he, whom Jews had crucified, was both Lord and Christ.

The effect of this sermon is itself a powerful proof of the facts on which the Christian Church rests. Almost on the spot where Jesus had been crucified and buried seven weeks before, he was proclaimed as risen from the dead, ascended to heaven, and the giver of the Holy Spirit. At once 3,000 people so fully believed these facts that their whole lives were changed and they joined themselves together in an organization to spread these facts through the world. On these facts concerning the death, resurrection and ascension of the Son of God, and concerning the Holy Spirit sent by him, the church was built. Through the preaching of these facts converts are made to Christ, and through the agency of this same Holy Spirit hearts are renewed and the power of the church extended through the nations. The church itself is thus an argument for the truth of these cardinal doctrines which it is hard to resist.

This Jesus, exalted and enthroned, Peter said to his audience, "Ye crucified." Yet many of his hearers came from distant lands and spoke the languages of these lands. They probably were not in Jerusalem when Jesus was crucified. How were they made to feel responsible for this crime? The abstract given of the sermon indicates the preacher's argument. The Son of God had come to redeem the world, and the Jewish nation, through its leaders, had condemned him to death. It was a shame to every Jew that his nation had done this, and when the Jews were made to realize this by Peter's preaching of the facts they were pricked in their hearts. Sin slew Jesus, and is such a cruel foe to him that every sinner shares in the crime which crucified him. Every sinner who realizes the meaning of the gospel which Peter preached, and which Christian ministers now preach, will say, as those Jews said, "What shall we do?"

An inquiry meeting followed the sermon, in which the other apostles took part [v. 37]. The inquirers called on them as brethren for help and guidance. Peter, and no doubt the others also, showed them:

II. How converts may become church members. There are four conditions to be insisted on for entering the church. In its organization no others were imposed, nor has any one a right to impose others now. They are:

1. Repentance. These first converts were pricked in their hearts when they saw how sin had crucified the Son of God. The knowledge of what he had done and suffered to deliver mankind from sin made them recoil from sin. They felt the burden of the guilt which they shared and which they condemned. To look thus at sin, at one's own sins, and to resolve with full purpose of heart to change one's principles and practice so as to be in harmony with Christ, is to repent.

2. Confession of loyal service to Christ. "Be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ unto the remission of your sins." Baptism is the seal of allegiance to him, the public renouncement of sin and adoption of Christ as Saviour and Lord.

3. The gift of the Holy Spirit. God has promised the gift to all who repent of sin and believe on Christ [v. 39]. The evidence that we possess this gift is found in the life of obedience to him. No one need be in doubt as to whether he has received the gift. "No man can say, Jesus is Lord, but in the Holy Spirit."

4. Entering into covenant with believers. This act completed the organization of the church, made it a body fit for the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, for the inward development through which its members grow more and more into the likeness of Christ, and for its influence over the world in bringing it into obedience to him. These four were the only conditions to church membership made by the apostles. There seems to be no warrant for us to add others.

III. How converts live in church fellowship. Christians were distinguished from others by:

1. Constant study of Christ. They were not examined as to their knowledge of him when they entered the church. It was a school in which they were to learn of him, not a society for graduates from such a school. "They continued in the apostles' teaching." They listened eagerly to fuller statements from their teachers day by day concerning what Jesus had said and done during the years he had been with them. All true disciples constantly seek to learn more of their Master's mind and will. The church is appointed to teach these things through its ministers and others by the Holy Spirit.

2. Regular observance of worship and ordinances. These new disciples had, apparently, daily meetings. In these they partook of the Lord's Supper. They gathered daily in prayer. They continued also for a time to join with Jews in the daily sacrifices of the temple. The new church would soon have died if its members had not joyfully maintained regular habits of united worship. A minister wished to remind one of the members of the church of what he was losing by keeping away from the prayer meeting. He took a live coal from the grate and placed it by itself on the hearth. The red glow faded and it soon became black and dead. The parishioner understood. "I'll be at the next meeting," he said.

3. The spirit of brotherhood. As they grew in love to Christ through greater knowledge of him, and as they joined in commemorating his sacrifice for their sins, of course they drew closer in sympathy with one another. Their mutual helpfulness, their enjoyment of life and their grateful trust in God gave this first church at once a great impetus. They won the esteem of the community, they constantly added to their numbers and made important steps in preparation for the conquest of the world.

The principles of the early church are still the same. The preaching which brought men into it is still powerful to save. The holy Spirit still dwells in his church, and the same exhibition of love to Christ and of fellowship in him will now fill the lives of believers with gladness, and win the favor of men to accept the crucified and risen Jesus as Saviour and Lord.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF BEEF

Genuine only with this signature in blue.

The first in the field and still unrivalled

The great chemist Baron JUSTUS VON LIEBIG made the first scientific effort to produce an extract of meat. The result of his efforts he gave to the world under the name of Liebig COMPANY'S Extract of Beef, and to attest its genuineness he authorized this company to use his signature, now familiar to all the world, on the jars of this famous product. PROGRESS OF THE KINGDOM.

PLANS FOR MISSIONARY MEETINGS.

A letter was recently received by an official of the American Board, stating that the writer's church intended to have a home missionary meeting and asking for "what material you can spare on this subject." This is not by any means an unprecedented example of the deplorable ignorance, indifference and lack of forethought concerning missionary meetings. We should not expect the church to make a brilliant success of this particular occasion. But there never was less excuse for a stupid missionary meeting than there is today, in view of the wealth of missionary literature and the helpful and suggestive lists of missionary topics which have been prepared by various organizations. It is not necessary to urge at length the exceeding importance of the church missionary meeting. We cannot afford to allow it to be superseded by the meetings of the women's auxiliaries and the occasional hour devoted to a missionary subject in the C. E. Society. On the contrary, these organizations, which appeal to only a limited portion of the congregation, should be made to pass on the knowledge and enthusiasm they have gained. This is done in one church of our acquaintance where the responsibility of the monthly missionary meeting is laid in turn upon the Y. P. S. C. E., the Woman's Home Missionary and Woman's Board auxiliaries and a group of its deacons.

There are many indications of a revival of the old "missionary concert." Now comes the question, How can it be made most valuable and most interesting? It seems to us largely a question of careful planning and intelligent preparation. How many churches will plan for their year's missionary campaign and how many will enter on it at haphazard? If the pastor or missionary committee has no original ideas, why not at the beginning of the new year adopt one of the excellent lists of topics for 1897 or choose some subjects from each? It is a sign of the times that the conservative Presbyterian organ, The Church at Home and Abroad, has abandoned the old plan of taking up the various countries in rotation and presents in its December issue a fresh and suggestive outline of study. Our own American Board has published a little pamphlet containing not only foreign missionary topics for the coming year, but also valuable suggestions in regard to missionary literature. The Woman's Board always prepares an excellent set of foreign topics, and the list of the Woman's Home Missionary Association deserves careful attention. In The Congregationalist Handbook for 1897 will be found a set of topics and sub-topics which has the advantage of including in the plan of study, foreign, home and city missions, as well as some general phases of missionary activity. As in previous years there will appear in Progress of the Kingdom a suggestive and comprehensive article bearing on the topic for the ensuing month, and mentioning sources of further information. This article will be published the second Thursday of each month.

OUR OWN WORK.

Encouragements in Japan. Some of our missionaries in Japan have been making evangelistic tours into the country and the same cheering tale of cordial welcome, large opportunity and eager listeners comes from each. Dr. Davis reports a trip of 1,500 miles in the northern provinces. He was gone thirty-two days, spoke thirty-two times, lived for the most part upon Japanese food in Japanese hotels, sleeping often but three or four hours a night, yet he returned to Kyoto in good health and spirits. The impressions left by this tour are that the official classes are more favorably disposed toward Christianity and the masses are more ready to hear the gospel than at any time before since Japan was opened, that the era of doubt and rationalistic discussion has passed its zenith, and that wherever earnest men are preaching a positive gospel churches are alive and souls are being gathered into the kingdom. Dr. Davis emphasizes particularly the need of workers in the great Aidzu Valley, with its 300 square miles of villages, which has no missionary and only three Japanese evangelists. Drs. DeForest and Gordon and Mr. White write in an equally hopeful strain, and Christians at home are implored to pray that Japan's force of workers may not further be depleted but restored to its former strength.

THE WORLD AROUND.

Theories of an African Traveler. A Montreal paper reports an interesting conversation with Dr. James Johnston, author of Reality versus Romance, who is on his way to the United States to deliver a course of lectures on his African travels. Recalling his cutting criticisms of certain missions in Central Africa, we may not place entire confidence in all his views, but some of them are worth noting. Dr. Johnston strongly disapproves of the "faith alone" principle in conducting missions, and says the results are only graves in the part of Africa he has visited. He deprecates the extension of denominational work and the sending out of fragile young men from college. "Sanctification is indispensable; so is brawn. You want the strong and robust, not the delicate. It is madness, it is a crime, to send such to Central Africa." Especially does the traveler discourage the sending out of single women to work in Central Africa. Apart from the hardships which must be endured and the fevers which are a constant menace to life, there are certain primitive conditions to be encountered which produce an inexpressible sense of shame and humiliation in the mind of a modest woman.

Missions and Temperance. Miss Jessie A. Ackerman, the round-the-world missionary of the W. C. T. U., has probably visited more foreign lands and seen stranger sights during her eight years of traveling and two journeys around the world than any other young woman living today. In an interesting interview reported in The Ram's Horn she expresses emphatically the convictions founded on her observation and experience. When questioned in regard to missionary enterprise she replied: "I take a very cheery view of missions and their outlook for the future. After the nations have been steeped in heathenism for centuries, the conversion of a single person means more than lips can express. The greatest hindrance today to the spread of the gospel in foreign lands is the attitude of Christendom toward the heathen world concerning the vices that are a part of our civilization. The missionaries will ever fail to reach the thinking men and women in heathen lands until the liquor traffic is overthrown in America and the opium traffic in England, until foreigners can see the principles of Christianity exemplified in our governments." Miss Ackerman avers with intense earnestness that for every heathen converted to Christianity by our missionaries English opium makes 1,000 opium smokers and the liquor from other lands makes 100 drunkards. She also relates a telling story of a conversation with a British soldier in India, who, when asked why he was not a Christian, answered, "It is because my government makes it easier for me to do wrong than to be a Christian." "That young man's reply," said Miss Ackerman, "summarizes the situation in heathen lands today. Christian governments make it easier to do wrong than right."

THE CHURCH PRAYER MEETING.

Topic, Jan. 10–16. Promises for the Opening Year. Matt. 28: 16–20; 7: 7–12; John 14: 12–28.

Upon what is our confidence founded? How shall we make these promises available for our own need? For the church? For others?

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN.

Topic, Jan. 17–23. Revivals at Home and on Mission Fields. 2 Chron. 30: 13–27.

This topic may well take us to a survey of the world as it is today to discover evidences of the special activity of God's Spirit. If with this in mind we read the missionary magazines and other religious periodicals, our search will doubtless be rewarded. There are always, somewhere in the world, unmistakable tokens of the quickening influence of God's Spirit as it moves upon men in the mass and as individuals. Perhaps we need not go so far away as the Foochow mission of the American Board, or even to New York city, to find revivals. If there is one in the next town or in a neighboring church we ought to know about it and to be glad in it.

There is a philosophy in revivals, though we need not spend much time in setting it forth. The spiritual life, like the physical, is subject to ebbs and flows. We may not always remain upon the mountain hights. God touches us in marked ways at certain periods of our lives—when we go from home to college, when our friends die, when some heroic life comes close to ours, when we sit in quiet meditation at the close of some restful Sabbath day, when we attend some great religious convocation and are caught up and swept along by the tides of feeling there in motion. It were a pity if our Christian lives could not, now and then, recuperate themselves and take a fresh start forward.

Certainly the best revival is that which begins in our own hearts. We make a mistake when we think we have to wait for this revival until some noted evangelist comes, until others are going forward for prayers, until the atmosphere of the town is subdued. God waits constantly to revive us as individuals. One man quickened by the Spirit can start a revival. It is often the way in which they have come about historically. Perhaps a revival in your community this winter depends upon your present responsiveness to the Holy Spirit.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

MRS. MARY EMERSON HAVEN.

Mrs. Haven, widow of the late Prof. Joseph Haven, died in Chicago, Ill., Dec. 31, 1896. Christmas she was able to dine with a brother several miles from her home, but the exposure brought on an attack of pneunomia from which she did not rally. She was the daughter of Rev. Ralph Emerson, professor of church history in Andover Seminary, and was born Nov. 22, 1819, at Norfolk, Ct. Her husband in 1858 was chosen to fill the chair of theology in the new Theological Seminary at Chicago. Here he remained till his death in 1874. Since that time Mrs. Haven has resided in the house which he built, devoting herself to the welfare of others and taking special interest in the work of the Union Park Church, of which she was one of the oldest and most faithful members, and in the work of the Woman's Board of the Interior, of which she was one of the vice-presidents. She has devoted herself largely to the promotion of intellectual culture among the women of the West Side. She was a sister of Ralph Emerson, the manufacturer of Rockford, Ill., of Prof. Joseph Emerson, so long professor of Greek in Beloit College, and of Mrs. S. J. Humphrey, Oak Park, and the mother of Miss Ada Haven, missionary in China, Mrs. Alice H. Danforth of Philadelphia, Dr. Joseph Haven of Chicago and Ralph Haven of the same city.

REV. ENOCH F. BAIRD.

Mr. Baird, for more than twenty-three years the pastor of the Congregational church in York, O., died Dec. 14, in that place. He was born March 1, 1817, in Pennsylvania. Until middle life he was a teacher. In 1854 he was ordained in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, but later was called to the Congregational church in Plymouth, O., going thence to Martinsburg where he served until called to York. For seventeen of the twenty-three years' service at York he supplied also the church in Lafayette, O.

BOOK REVIEWS.

PHILIP GILBERT HAMERTON.

The portrait of Mr. Hamerton, which serves as the frontispiece of this book, prepares one for what is to follow. It is that of a thoughtful, sensitive, retiring man, evidently possessing noteworthy ability but also evidently shrinking from everything which can be interpreted as catering to fame, and even from needless publicity. It is an attractive face, but not that of one of the men who move the world except in minor departments of action. The volume is an autobiography for the first twenty-four years of its subject's life, at the end of which he married. It is a memoir so far as the balance of his life is concerned, his wife being the author of the latter portion. It is a book of unusual interest for readers acquainted with Mr. Hamerton's literary work, and for the larger public which enjoys well-written biography in general.

Mr. Hamerton attempted to be a painter, but it is no harshness to say that he failed. He also strove strenuously to become an etcher, but here, too, he never attained high excellence. His successful specialty at first was the criticism of art. He also was one of the founders, and for a time editor, of The Portfolio, to which he always remained a frequent contributor. Little by little he found his way into literature and became an essayist and novelist. He wrote several novels, but they did not make him famous, although they were well received. His principal works are The Intellectual Life, Thoughts about Art, A Painters' Camp and Etching and Etchers, but he wrote a dozen others at least. The story of his life is one of struggle both for artistic and literary recognition, and also for means of support.

The character of the man as herein revealed is highly attractive. He often was eccentric, but always was agreeable in his quiet way. His aims were the highest and his spirit was always noble. His sense of responsibility and conscientiousness in work were peculiarly keen, and he was a fine example of diligence animated by the loftiest purpose. His comparatively uneventful life was so ordered as to possess much beauty and interest, and he fairly won distinction as an exponent and teacher of the more intellectual side of art and was recognized as a peer by many of the leading thinkers of his time. On the whole, the biography, which is a simple, graphic narrative, may be termed one of the most interesting of recent years. Mrs. Hamerton has displayed superior qualifications for the continuation of the work which her husband had well begun. [Roberts Bros. $2.00.]

STORIES.

One of the most realistic and picturesque narratives of American colonial life is John Littlejohn of J. [J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.25], by George Morgan. It treats of the very latest colonial days and of the period of the Revolution itself. It presents spirited pictures of the plantation life of the great Virginian families, of the terrible sufferings of the patriot army at Valley Forge, of the intrigues against General Washington, of sundry campaigns and battles, and of many individuals of historic distinction. It is intensely interesting and full of dramatic incidents. It also is a charming love story. It stands in the front rank of historical novels.

Palladia [Macmillan Co. $1.25], by Mrs. Hugh Fraser, is a pathetic and tragic story, chiefly of events in southeastern Europe, but also including scenes in Italy and England. The author has allowed herself considerable freedom in the construction of her plot, but it is not unskillful, although many somewhat unexpected elements are interwoven with its course. The best features of the book are the representations of individual characters, some of which, like the heroine herself, are drawn with exceptional power. The story is long, but the interest is great and growing, and the book fully deserves a place among the best specimens of that class of novels which is certainly sensational but not unwholesome.

In A Puritan's Wife [Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.25], by Max Pemberton, the political adventures of a young Englishman at the time of the great plague in London are narrated. Proscribed as a traitor and sharply pursued, the hero has many hazardous experiences, but by the appeals of his wife, whom he had met in an unusually romantic fashion, he gains the royal favor and subsequent prosperity. The story is told with much naturalness and spirit and is enjoyable reading.——In The Joy of Life [A. C. McClurg & Co. $1.00] Emma Wolf, the author, teaches the supremacy of genuine love above all other earthly satisfactions. The book has little plot, its background of circumstances being simply sufficient to throw out in bold relief the several contrasted types of character. The principal ones are very sharply opposed and are drawn with somewhat unusual clearness blended with much delicacy, and in more than one way the story is decidedly above the average.

Mrs. Rebecca Harding Davis's latest story, Frances Waldeaux [Harper & Bros. $1.25], does not represent her best work but nevertheless is vivid and entertaining, having some striking features. The strongest impression which it makes is that of the immense tenderness and power of maternal love and of its sometimes misdirected aim and possible mischievousness, but all turns out well in the end and many readers will like the book.——The Mistress of Sherburne [Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.50] is another in the growing series about Sherburne House and its people, by Amanda M. Douglas. It is characteristically intricate, entertaining, sentimental and religious and a large class of readers will enjoy it very much indeed. It does not belong to the highest order of novels, but it is an excellent book in certain respects, superior to some which the reading world in general probably would rank above it. Miss Douglas's admirers will know exactly what to expect and they will not be disappointed.

A Golden Autumn [J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.25] is the most recent production of that prolific novelist, Mrs. Alexander. It is a story of matrimonial distrust and separation, followed by reunion. The actors are English society people and the story is well told. One cannot help feeling, however, that only in exceptional circumstances would misunderstandings no more serious than those here described have resulted in so grievous a catastrophe. But the novelist might reply that the real cause of the trouble was the lack of sufficient mutual affection at the outset, and that her purpose was to emphasize the truth of the old proverb about marrying in haste and repenting at leisure, and this would be a fairly successful defense. The book undoubtedly will be read with a good deal of interest.——In A Virginia Cavalier [Harper & Bros. $1.50] Molly Elliot Seawall has described the early life of George Washington. The book is not a novel but a biography, yet it is skillfully presented to the reader in the form of a story. It presents the ideal Washington rather than the actual man whom Mr. Paul L. Ford recently has set before the world, yet the actual and ideal do not vary as much as is usually the fact. The author has told her tale charmingly and the young people will prize her pages although the book is not especially intended for them. The spirit and manner of colonial life seem to be represented most successfully and excellent illustrations add attractiveness to the narrative.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

Mr. J. M. Barrie's mother evidently has been to his own consciousness the inspiration of his conception of the women in most of his books, and now with reverent affection he has written a book about her. It is his Margaret Ogilvy [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25] and her picture is its frontispiece. It is seldom that a picture means so much to a book as in this case, but as one reads one finds one's self continually turning back to it in order to imagine its expression when this or that remark was uttered. Evidently the heroine possessed a positive character and a lovely one and the picture of the love of father, mother, sister and brother for each other, the quaint oddities of their intercourse, their plottings and schemings for each other's good and the pride of the mother in the literary success, are as touching as they are entertaining. Mr. Barrie also has revealed with rare success the delight of his mother in believing herself to have been in his mind during so much of his authorship, as the foundation of character after character, her intensely amusing abhorrence of Stevenson's works and her gradual surrender to their charm, accompanied by her more or less genuine distrust of Stevenson himself, and his own intense amusement at being informed about it. We are not at all sure that this book, short and far from biographically complete although it is, in fact a mere picture, is not the crowning work of Mr. Barrie's life thus far. And should it prove to be so regarded, we are convinced that no one will be more delighted than he.

It is quite true, as Mr. Paul L. Ford has remarked in his preface to The True George Washington [J. B. Lippincott Co. $2.00], that a tendency exists in every country possessing a history to regard its great leaders as superhuman, and Washington has been regarded by many of us Americans as something more than a mere man. In this volume Mr. Ford undertakes to set forth the truth, and he has done so with skillful pains. The result is a Washington whom one does not respect or admire the less, but who in some particulars will strike the reader as more lifelike and natural than the stately vision of his childhood. In some respects the real Washington was not what he has been credited with being, and it is probable that he was neither a conspicuously religious man, or even a very regular attendant at Sabbath worship, although he always was reverent and respectful toward religion. That he was illiterate, even so far as to be very weak in grammar and spelling, is no new revelation, but the fact is here made evident afresh. Yet he was aware of these defects, and took much pains to counteract them. So far from being the reserved and cold-blooded mortal which many of his biographers have represented him to have been, he was decidedly gay, being very fond of balls and parties and society in general, quite a ladies' man—in fact, very much of a beau. But the strong and noble elements of his character do not appear to have been overdrawn in the past, and Mr. Ford justly emphasizes them afresh, and brings out with great clearness the somewhat unusual affection and interest which Washington displayed not only toward his step-children, but a very large circle of relatives and friends. He took trouble and went to expense, and in every way sacrificed himself for others, to a degree which must have been as unusual then as it would be now. It is the private rather than the public man who is the subject of this book, although there are chapters on Washington as a soldier and civilian, but the same conclusion is inevitable from whatever point of view his life is examined, namely, that he was a great and good man who merited his pre-eminence and deserves to remain what he always has been, one of the two or three foremost figures in American history.——Mr. G. Barnett Smith, in General Gordon [F. H. Revell Co. 75 cents], has furnished a graphic and readable sketch of this famous Christian hero, and it gives the main features of his life and of his picturesque and diversified services to the world very pleasantly. It is illustrated.

MISCELLANEOUS.

On the Trail of Don Quixote [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50], by A. F. Jaccaci and illustrated by Daniel Vierge, is a very attractive holiday book of the year. The author has made certain carefully planned and well described rambles in the ancient province of La Mancha, in Spain, and the artist, who had done the same thing previously, bringing away a rich harvest in his note-books, has supplied abundant and excellent illustrations. The author enters successfully into both the spirit of the famous romance and that of the present peasant life in that region, and in text, illustration and the mechanical finish of the book it is charming and more than ordinarily worth attention.——The Story of the Masterpieces [Curts & Jennings. $1.50] is by C. M. Stuart, and contains a series of papers originally printed in the Epworth Herald on Murillo's The Immaculate Conception, Raphael's Sistine Madonna and the Transfiguration, Rubens's Descent from the Cross, Michael Angelo's Last Judgment and several other great pictures, reproductions of which enliven the volume, and the descriptions of which, in reverent, thoughtful style, make up a pleasing work.

Readers of the Pall Mall Magazine are familiar with the department which bears the title of the volume Without Prejudice [Century Co. $1.50], the contents of which have been used to make up this volume, the author of the one, Mr. Israel Zangwill, being the author of the other. The department contains essays, sketches, chats, short and vivacious, about a multitude of literary, artistic and social topics, all blending to form that sort of literature which is best described by the French term causerie, for which we have no exact equivalent in English. Mr. Zangwill is one of the brightest of modern writers and has done masterly work in his novels. This kind of writing illustrates a different side of his ability but one no less real. The book is immensely suggestive, but it is one to be dipped into rather than to be read continuously. Not everything in it will please all classes of readers, but there must be few who cannot find between its covers a great deal which they would be sorry to miss.——Dr. H. W. Mabie has added a volume of twenty-four short papers, entitled Books and Culture [Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.25], to the growing library of his writings. It illustrates, as was to be expected, a somewhat broader and deeper intellectual range than its predecessors and its technique is not less admirable. It is a book which the reader will do well to keep within reach for those odd moments during which so many of the most potent influences, those which shape our lives, are absorbed.

The Spiritual Sense of Dante's Divina Commedia [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.25] is an essay by Dr. W. T. Harris, which was published seven years ago and is now reissued. It is a remarkable presentation of the interpretation of the poet by one of the most acute, profound and reverent of modern critics.——Wordsworth's The Prelude [Macmillan Co. 50 cents] is out as one of the Temple Classics, a very tasteful and attractive series, and is printed with singular clearness, although a little book. The poet's admirers will be glad to have it.

New England's Struggles for Religious Liberty [American Baptist Pub. Society. $1.00], by Rev. D. S. Ford, is a series of studies of the relations of the Pilgrims and the Puritans to the Anabaptists and Quakers, and of several kindred subjects. It is not exactly a continuous work, yet there is enough in common to its successive parts to give it a certain unity. The author has labored hard upon his task, and generally exhibits a temperate and candid spirit.——In Welcome, Englishmen, or, Pilgrims, Puritans and Roger Williams Vindicated [Arena Pub. Co. $1.25], Rev. T. M. Merriman has discussed many Pilgrim or Puritan matters with some knowledge and more zeal. He is not always accurate and less often well balanced in judgment. A special purpose is to plead for the revocation of Roger Williams's sentence of banishment. The style sometimes is almost hysterical and in respect to punctuation the book is the worst which we ever have seen.——Rev. Cyrus Pickett's tasteful little sketch of Mt. Holyoke College and Mary Lyon already has reached its second edition and is as serviceable as it is pretty. Dr. Munger, among others, has commended it highly. ——Hear, then, the Verdict [Everett Press Co. 10 cents], by Lorin Ludlow, is an unpretending poem, nobly aiming to promote social purity but based upon a needlessly morbid assumption.

THE JANUARY MAGAZINES.

A fine portrait of Prince Bismarck is the frontispiece to The Century [$4.00], and introduces a sketch of Lenbach, the painter of Bismarck, by Edith Coues. Gen. Horace Porter's Campaigning with Grant, the third paper of which appears here, of course is one of the significant features of the number, and is of exceptional importance. Another striking paper is about Napoleon's Interest in the Battle of New Orleans, with a description of the battle by General Jackson, furnished by W. H. Robarts. Captain Mahan, U. S. N., writes about Nelson in the Battle of the Nile, with graphic diagrams. Our American composer, Edward A. MacDowell, is described by H. D. Finck, and his portrait is furnished, and Mr. E. L. Godkin sets forth the Absurdity of War. Public Spirit in Modern Athens, by D. Bikélas, a poem by Mr. Gilder on the Parthenon by Moonlight, and one by Sarah Piatt, entitled A Woodbird's Whim, also are noticeable features of the number. But the other contributions are by equally well-known writers, and are equally valuable in their way. The story element is as abundant as usual. We call especial attention to the editorials at the end of the magazine. That entitled A Call for Home Patriotism is especially timely and worthy of heed.

In Harper's [$4.00] Mr. Poultney Bigelow's White Man's Africa and the late George Du Maurier's The Martian are continued, and there are short stories by Brander Matthews, Mary E. Wilkins and others. Prof. F. N. Thorpe's paper, A Century's Struggle for Franchise in America, is instructive historically, and Dr. H. S. Williams's Science at the Beginning of the Century appeals to an audience quite as intent, if not equally large. Indian Giver is a comedy by Mr. Howells. Mr. G. W. Smalley's A Study in English Society and Mr. Lawrence Hutton's Literary Landmarks of Rome, Rev. Henry van Dyke's poem, The Lily of Yorrow, and G. E. Woodberry's Love's Rosary also deserve mention. The illustrations are as good as ever.

Turning to Scribners [$3.00], Mr. S. H. Adams's The Conduct of a Great Business: the Department Store, is a minute and interesting picture of one of the most characteristic features of modern commerce, the details in regard to which everybody will be glad to read. Yvan Troshine furnishes a thrilling paper about The Slaughter of the Armenians in Constantinople. Thackeray's Haunts and Homes is a pleasant descriptive contribution by Eyre Crowe; Victor Hugo's Home at Guernsey is described by G. Jeanniot; Mr. R. H. Davis begins a new story, The Soldier of Fortune, and several excellent short stories and poems complete what is, if possible, a better number than usual.

The Pall Mall Magazine [$3.00] has an exceptionally distinct literary individuality and its art work is of the highest order. Its lighter reading is not only interesting but is in some sense picturesque and striking, while its more serious papers are always worthy of close attention. The Countess of Warwick has contributed to this issue an account of her husband's famous castle and its treasures; there is a symposium by the Countess of Cork and Orrery, Sir Evelyn Wood, Archdeacon Sinclair and Mr. R. W. Lee, a working man, on The Sixtieth Year of the Queen's Reign and How It Was Celebrated. The Lord Advocate of Scotland furnishes a sporting article on Curling, the famous Scotch game. The late Robert Louis Stevenson's story, St. Ives, the adventures of a French prisoner in England, goes on as entertainingly as ever, and the other contents of the number are all worthy of cordial commendation. We have been informed that few of the other magazines equal this in popularity.

McClure's Magazine [$1.00] is as bright and enjoyable as ever. Hamlin Garland tells the story of General Grant's Cadet Days. Henry Muir describes the Making and Laying of an Atlantic Cable. There are two articles about Franklin, one of them, by W. P. Treat, describing him as one of the makers of the Union, another containing fifteen original portraits, edited with notes, etc., by C. H. Hart. Rudyard Kipling's Captains Courageous is continued with characteristic spirit. The detective story this time is the Martha Washington Case, by Lida R. McCabe.

Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly [$3.00] opens with a pleasant account of the King's Daughters and Sons by Louise S. Houghton. Gen. T. L. Rosser describes the personal traits of Gen. Robert E. Lee. In the Universities and Colleges series Bryn Mawr College comes up for description and illustration. The second part of Canoeing Down the Rhine, by Rochefort Calhoun, is enjoyable and the other papers illustrate literature grave or gay, in prose or verse, most successfully.

St. Nicholas [$3.00] is somewhat lighter in quality than usual; that is, there is less of the instructive and more of the merely amusing. But it is a captivating number, not the less, and well worthy of its established position as a first favorite for the children. Tudor Jenks describes mirages under the title Mirrors of Air; Noah Brooks continues The True Story of Marco Polo; and the many sketches, stories and poems all contribute substantially in one or another way to the reader's gratification. The illustrative work also is charming. The correct and complete list of answers to the prize puzzle, Fifty Charades, is given this month with the names of the winners. ——The Pocket Magazine [$1 00] contains four short stories by Stanley J. Weyman, J. L. Heaton, Elisabeth Pullen and H. M. Hoke. They are bright and entertaining.

The Magazine of Art [$3.50] has a portrait and a descriptive sketch of George W. Joy, by Joseph Anderson. The Arts and Crafts Exhibition is the subject of a second paper, and Mr. A. S. Baldry writes about Lord Leighton's Sketches, having selected some of the most striking as illustrations. One of the more important papers is M. H. Spielmann's, on the Revival of Lithography. Adolphe Artz, of the modern Dutch school, and his pictures are the subject of Richard Heath's article, and Messrs. G. E. Moira and F. L. Jenkins contribute a study on Novelty in Decoration at the Trocadero. The Notes and Queries and the Chronicle of Art are departments well filled, and the magazine appeals not merely to artists, although their interest in it must be keenest, but also to a large and growing portion of the general public.

The International Journal of Ethics [$2.50] contains five papers, each of which is worthy of special study. One, by Rev. Hastings Rashdall, is a reply to Professor Sidgwick on the Ethics of Religious Conformity; another, by Tokiwo Yokoi, discusses the Ethical and Political Problems of New Japan. Prof. Eliza Ritchie of Wellesley writes about Morality and the Belief in the Supernatural, claiming that if belief in the supernatural were to disappear, as to which the author expresses no opinion, sufficient motives for righteous living would still remain. The Restoration of Economics to Ethics is discussed by C. S. Devas, and Mr. J. B. Warner has supplied a very able and suggestive article on the responsibilities of lawyers. Some of the best book reviews of the month appear in this magazine.

The Homiletic Review [$3.00] supplies its usual miscellaneous assortment of sermons, sermon material, notes, etc. It continues its familiar work with no less attention to the desires of its constituency than in the past, and is the best magazine of its class. ——The Catholic World [$3 00] contains a good variety of miscellaneous material, literary, artistic, religious or practical, pervaded by a Roman Catholic atmosphere. We question the justice of the suggestion by Mr. J. A. Locke in his paper, Rationalism Enthroned at Canterbury, because we have seen it stated more than once, and on good authority, that the new Archbishop Temple has abandoned the somewhat rationalistic views which he held twenty years ago. But there is no intention of unfairness. Good Cooking versus Drinking, by L. A. Toomey, is a sensible paper, and another, important in a different way, is that by Mgr. Charles De Harlez on the Necessity of Studying Languages and Their Monuments.

NOTES.

—— Dr. John Watson, Ian Maclaren, made 117 addresses in America.

—— The late Anton Rubinstein left a volume of reminiscences, opinions on musical subjects, etc.

—— Herbert Spencer is so sincere in his desire to be known, if at all, only for his own merits that he never accepts honorary degrees or titles of any sort.

—— In England a publisher never pays less than fifteen per cent. royalty, says Mr. William Sharp, and many pay authors who have gained repute as much as twenty five per cent.

—— The association of Mr. Page, formerly of The Forum, with Mr. Horace E. Scudder in the editorship of The Atlantic Monthly, is expected to be followed by some modifications of the policy of the latter magazine such as may add to its popularity.

—— M. Zola apparently has exhausted the patience of the French Academy by his persistence in seeking to be elected. Two vacancies, left by the deaths of Alexandre Dumas and Léon Say, were filled some three weeks since and M. Vandal and M. Theuriet were chosen, Zola receiving only two votes.

—— Mr. Junius S. Morgan of New York has given to Princeton University his valuable collection of early editions of Virgil. So far as this country is concerned, this is the most complete collection in existence, and not more than three or four superior ones exist anywhere. It contains 312 volumes and among them are the first edition, of which only six copies are known. The value of the gift is estimated at $50,000.

ECONOMISTS AT BALTIMORE.

BY JOHN HAYNES, PH. D.

The public problems of our day are pre-eminently economic in their nature. In our early history questions more purely political divided our people and engaged the attention of our statesmen, but now nearly every issue before the public is one which in some form or other has to do with wealth, and is, therefore, an economic question. For this reason a peculiar interest attached to the ninth annual meeting of the American Economic Association, which was held at the Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, Dec. 28-31. Among the leading men who participated in the discussions were such teachers of economics as Professors Henry C. Adams of the University of Michigan, Giddings and Seligman of Columbia, Hadley of Yale and Taussig of Harvard, and such men of affairs as ex Secretary of the Treasury Fairchild, Thomas G. Shearman and Horace White.

A feature of the meeting was the appreciation of scientific thought in economic matters evinced by the business men of Baltimore. The members of the Economic Association were guests at the annual banquet of the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association of Baltimore. This was itself a significant fact, but the warm words of recognition for the value of economic science uttered by President Gilpin of the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association, Governor Lowdnes of Maryland and Mayor Hooper of Baltimore, as well as the toast, Public Respect for Economic Knowledge, assigned to Professor Giddings, show a tendency of business men and students to come nearer together—a happy omen for both parties as well as for the body politic.

One of the most interesting things in the meeting was the discussion of the topic, Is There a Distinct Agricultural Question? There was general agreement that there is such a question. It was phrased by one speaker, "Shall the American farmer become peasant as the farmer of every other country has?" Perhaps the speech which commanded most general assent was that of Professor Seligman, who said that in recent years we had been living in a fool's paradise. Our country had enjoyed immense prosperity due to agricultural productiveness. Now we have competitors the world over. We shall never more be the food provider of the world. A long agricultural depression is therefore to be expected. Various speakers suggested that conditions could be improved by better technical education of farmers, more equitable transporation rates, fairer taxation and the adaptation of farm management to modern business methods. It is significant that the currency was not mentioned in this connection.

A whole day was given to the discussion of the present direction of acquisitive investments, the economic effects of these investments and the duty of the government towards the investor. It was clearly shown, contrary to the popular impression, that large deposits in savings banks may be an indication of unfavorable business conditions rather than prosperity, and the question was seriously raised whether our laws do not unduly favor these institutions. For the protection of the investor against the quasi-fraudulent action of managers, Professor Hadley suggested provisions for publicity of accounts, the prohibition of directors' contracts and the imposition on the promotors of new enterprises of a special liability, civil and criminal, for the correctness of their representations.

Other subjects discussed were the Relation of Economics to Jurisprudence, Crime and the Census, The Use of Credit Instruments in Retail Trade, The Quantity Theory of Money, A Decade of Federal Railway Regulation. Prof. Henry C. Adams was re-elected president and Prof. Walter F. Wilcox of Cornell University was chosen secretary.

LETTER FROM CANADA.

Manitoba School Agreement.

When Hon. Wilfred Laurier promised the speedy and satisfactory solution of the Manitoba school question, few doubted his sincerity, but many did his ability to dispose of so difficult a problem. The question is still discussed, but the indications are that it is finally removed from Dominion politics. The people are becoming heartily wearied of its constant recurrence, and no better example of this can be given than the recent by election of Cornwall and Stormont, when a Conservative majority of 325 in a constituency strongly French and Roman Catholic was reversed to a minority of 602. Mr. Laurier is to be congratulated on the settlement, which entitles him to the highest rank of statesmanship, and gives to Canada the conclusion of a long and bitter sectarian struggle.

The Venezuela Dispute.

Next to the settlement of their own school difficulty comes satisfaction to Canadians that the Venezuelan trouble is at an end. After the desire for peace at home is the earnest longing for continued friendship between the United States and the Dominion. The constant communion between the two lands makes war too hideous to contemplate. Many of Canada's best sons and daughters are patriotic, prosperous citizens of the United States, while all over the Dominion are industrious and respected Americans, who have made Canada their home. That concessions were made no true Canadian regrets, and that the darkest crime of the century has been averted will make the new year on both sides of the line one of greater peace and good will than it has ever been before.

United States Tariff.

Canadian interest continues to rest upon American politics, but it is now the tariff question that commands attention. Frequent reference is made to the Dingley Bill, and a good deal of wonder is expressed as to what its contents may be. Canada undoubtedly wants closer trade relationship with the United States, and it is generally felt that the realization of this would be of great mutual benefit to both lands. Eighty-eight per cent. of Canada's foreign trade is with Great Britain and the United States, and the Blue Book soon to be published will show that the exports to the former country amounted to $26,939,052 more than they did to the latter, while the imports from the United States exceeded those from Great Britain by $25,594,282. These figures are sufficient reasons for an interest in the United States tariff, and were it not that a change will soon occur in the presidency a deputation would doubtless have proceeded before this from Ottawa to Washington.

Tariff Matters at Home.

Without waiting to see what Major McKinley may do on assuming the presidency, the Dominion Government has started its promised commission of inquiry on tariff matters at home. Three of the ministers, Sir Richard Cartwright and Hons. W. S. Fielding and William Paterson, have undertaken this duty, and the places already visited are Toronto, Hamilton, Brantford, London and Montreal. Thus far the evidence gathered has been of a very varied character, but if, as a result of the commission, the great mass of people are led to inquire about the tariff, as well as other matters, there will soon dawn upon Canada more prosperous days.

Religious Instruction in Schools.

Interest in the school question is being transferred from Manitoba to Ontario, where is in vogue one of the finest educational systems of the world. An influential deputation from the Anglican Diocese of Toronto lately waited upon Premier Hardy, and through Hon. H. S. Blake and others asked that religious instruction be placed on the curriculum of the schools. The committing of certain portions of Scripture to memory and the use of an undenominational catechism by the pupils were strongly urged. Following this deputation was one from the Jewish synagogues of the city asking that no such instruction be allowed. It will be difficult for Mr. Hardy to satisfy both parties, and, if he moves at all, it may be to find himself confronted with as perplexing a problem as the one which has harassed Premier Greenway of Manitoba for several years.

Quebec Association.

At this gathering at Sherbrooke a splendid keynote was struck by the moderator, Rev. B. W. Day, in his annual sermon, and the communion service was presided over by Rev. F. J. Day, son of the preacher. The reports from the churches were specially encouraging, while the addresses were all good and inspiring. J. P. G.

THE AMHERST "UNION LECTURE COURSE."

BY W. I. FLETCHER, LIBRARIAN OF AMHERST COLLEGE.

I have often been asked to give some account of our rather remarkably successful lecture course, which for the last six years has provided annually ten first-class entertainments and has netted for the town library over $1,000, while the admission fees have been extremely low and the young people have received practically free entrance.

The course had its origin just after the completion of the new town hall (with a good auditorium, seating 800), in a wish on the part of many that something could be done, negatively to keep objectionable cheap shows out of town, and positively to provide helpful and instructive, as well as pleasing, entertainments under proper supervision. A meeting was called of delegates from the faculties of the two colleges, the board of selectmen, the school committee, the Grand Army, the Masonic Lodge and some other bodies, the pastors of all the churches also being invited, this meeting constituting a body fairly representative of nearly all interests in the town. There was a general agreement that it would be a good thing for the town if a course of first-class entertainments could be provided at such rates of admission as practically to exclude nobody, and to underbid and discourage the purveyors of a low order of amusement. The selectmen made the proffer, afterwards ratified by vote of the town, of the free use of the hall for such a purpose, provided any surplus of receipts from the entertainments was turned over to the town library. Members of the college faculties volunteered to lecture in the course without compensation, and so the first course of ten entertainments was speedily arranged, one-half being lectures by "home talent," the other half lectures and concerts by "imported talent."

Tickets for the course were sold at $1 00, and then the feature was added which has been one of the happiest hits of the whole plan, namely, the "family ticket" at $2 00 for the course, admitting "the heads of the family and their children," but necessarily excluding domestics, visitors and relatives outside the immediate family. Under this regulation, as has been intimated above, the children came in practically without charge, as it cost the parents no more to bring four or five of them than to leave all at home. The result has been that every lecturer, except on very unpleasant evenings, has faced a large audience, made up mainly of families, the bright faces of the children, usually absent on such occasions, going far to inspire him to do his best. And who can tell how much excellent reflex influence on the family life in the homes may have come from this habit of going by families to these entertainments?

The course has gone on these six seasons and is now on its seventh, with nearly unvarying success. The "home-talent" feature could not be long continued with so much prominence as it had at first, but it has not been dropped, some of the college men or the clergymen of the town appearing each season. But as the success of the course became assured we had an increasing number of the best lecturers and concert companies in the field. The following have been among the "attractions" presented: Gen. O. O. Howard, P. B. Du Chaillu, W. H. McElroy, Russell H. Conwell, W. Hamilton Gibson, President Andrews, Rev. R. S. McArthur, Col. G. W. Bain, J. De Witt Miller, Charles E. Bolton, Rev. G. C. Lorimer and Prof. H. L. Southwick for lecturers, and the Ariel, Harvard, Lotus and other glee clubs, besides the Fisk Jubilee Singers.

It is a marvel, even to us, how we can have made money as we have, to the great profit of our town library, from such a course with such prices, the average cost per entertainment for each person attending being probably not over eight cents.

But at these prices the sale of tickets has reached annually from $600 to $800 and the expenses from $400 to $600, an average annual profit of $200. The prices of admission might safely be made even lower, except that the town library is so general an object of interest that no one is willing it should be deprived of this income.

Nor is the success of this course due to a compact village population, or anything of that sort. The college students have not been numerously represented in the audiences, nor have the residents in the center of the town predominated. Amherst has a large rural population and it is to the people at the "ends of the town," who come in their carriages, which line the common during the lectures, or club together and come in a large wagon or sleigh, it is to these that the Union Lecture Course has perhaps appealed more strongly than to any other part of the population. But one of its best features is that it belongs to and is enjoyed by all, and represents that union between "town and gown" and between the center and the "ends of the town" which is so desirable a feature of our civic life.

This season, for the first time, we have reserved seats. Heretofore it has been "first come, first served." But while this pure democracy in sittings had its beauties, it has led to a marked development of "squatter sovereignty," which has been trying to those who were unwilling to sit an hour before a lecture in order to have a good seat.

It may be asked, How is the necessary organization maintained? At the close of the course, each season, a meeting of the ticket holders is called, at which an executive committee of five is chosen for the next season, and they generally make most of the arrangements before the summer vacations.

Most of what we have done could probably be done in any town having a good hall, if a strong and united effort is made in the first place, and some persistent work done from year to year as the interest flags or slight obstacles arise.

Mr. Gladstone celebrated his eighty-seventh birthday on Dec. 29. Professor Park of Andover had his eighty-eighth on the same day, and, although in somewhat feeble health, was able to receive the calls and congratulations of many friends.

THE MOODY CAMPAIGN OF 1877.

The opening of the Moody meetings in Boston this week recalls some interesting facts in connection with his campaign of righteousness here twenty years ago. Then the lack of a suitable building was a great obstacle. This was overcome by the erection of a tabernacle on a site at the South End capable of seating 6,000 persons and occupying a whole square between Tremont Street and Warren Avenue. Overflow meetings were held in Clarendon Street Church, Dr. A. J. Gordon's, and in Berkeley Street Church, Dr. W. B. Wright's. In the latter edifice a restaurant was established. Six choirs, comprising 360 voices each, were trained in advance by Prof. Eben Tourjée. The corps of ushers and other assistants numbered 700, and they were drilled with almost military precision.

Joseph Cook was then at the hight of his popularity and Tremont Temple was packed to hear him every Monday noon. At the same hour a prayer meeting in Park Street Church, conducted by Messrs. Moody and Sankey, drew such throngs that the doors were closed fifteen minutes in advance. Miss Willard, who was then just coming into prominent notice, and Miss Sarah Smiley, eminent as a Bible reader, held special meetings for women. Every Friday was devoted to the interests of temperance.

All denominations vied in extending a warm greeting. Phillips Brooks and Dean Gray were especially cordial toward the movement. The picturesque figure of Dr. C. A. Bartol was often seen on the platform. James Freeman Clarke, with characteristic catholicity, said: "I welcome these evangelists. In all such great movements there must be some real divine power. Is it likely that an untaught Chicago layman like Mr. Moody should have shaken by his own power alone the churches of Scotland and England?" Another marked feature was the attention paid to the meetings by the secular press. The daily Globe, Journal and Advertiser published every sermon in full, besides lengthy reports of each day's proceedings.

But perhaps the most remarkable phase of the religious awakening twenty years ago was the visitation from house to house by 2,000 Christian men and women, carefully selected for the purpose. The city was divided into districts, and experienced persons in the employ of the publishers of the city directory were detailed ten days for doing this special work, which was prosecuted as thoroughly as when a census is taken. Nearly every family of the 75,500 then living in Boston was visited, invited to the meetings and supplied with good reading. Copies of a small paper called The Tabernacle, containing one of Mr. Moody's sermons, were scattered broadcast. In the main these visitors were courteously received, and many conversions followed this form of personal effort. The printed directions given to each visitor reflect the sanctified common sense of the great evangelist:

> Search out every family. Have personal conversation whenever practicable. Be courteous to all. Avoid controversy. It would be well to ask some friend to go with you. Keep a record of families you deem it best to continue to visit. Distribute reading and have personal conversation as opportunity offers in stores, drinking saloons and manufactories, first obtaining permission of the proprietors. Consult with your pastor, and report to him all cases requiring the labor of others. Send a brief report of your work to the committee each Saturday, giving any facts of interest.

Not only Boston and its suburbs, but all New England, was moved. Four hundred churches outside of the metropolis responded to Mr. Moody's invitation to join in an alliance for prayer and aggressive work, and turned their church parlors into inquiry rooms. The Tabernacle services lasted three months, and the large accession to the churches at the May communion, and subsequently all through the year, was an index that the community had been profoundly stirred, and that multitudes had indeed become new creatures in Christ Jesus.

F. J. D.

THE FIRST SERVICE IN BOSTON.

It must have been a gratification to Mr. Moody and his co-workers to see the audience which filled the floor and first balcony of Tremont Temple last Monday morning and overflowed into the second gallery. It was five times larger, he said, than the first audience in Cooper Union last November. Ministers were naturally plentiful but the rank and file of church membership was evidently well represented. The choir which has been in training for several weeks led the singing, and the meeting proceeded with the snap characteristic of the assemblages which Mr. Moody manages. He devoted most of his time to setting forth his plan of campaign for Boston. He referred most courteously to meetings going forward elsewhere in the city, under the leadership of Messrs. Murphy and Jones, and later in the morning Mr. Jones himself spoke. Mr. Moody emphasized the good that might come from special effort in circulating the Boston papers containing accounts of his meetings. He was emphatic in disclaiming any disposition to criticise the churches, although reiterating his intention to labor, first of all, to quicken them. Indeed, no one could doubt his sincerity when he said he loved the church of Christ more than any other institution in the world, and would rather have his tongue cleave to the roof of his mouth than do it injury. He expressed himself as pleased to be once more within Tremont Temple, with which pleasant memories were associated reaching back over a period of forty years. He considered it "one of the best fishing pools in the country."

The morning addresses for this week relate to the Bible and the afternoon to prayer. The arrangement for tickets provides reserved seats for all holders of them who arrive at least fifteen minutes before each session. These tickets may be had on application at Room 6, Tremont Temple. Mr. Moody expects to remain in the city for two months.

THE SOCIAL EVOLUTION OF JAPAN.

That the thoughtful and mature judgment of a native of a country in regard to its social progress and tendencies is both interesting and instructive, the small audience at the Boston Ministers' Meeting who listened last Monday to Rev. Tomoyoshi Murai will agree. The speaker is a graduate of Andover Seminary, who has preached for some years in Tokyo and is now in this country to study the social settlement work in our various cities with a view to devoting himself to such work in Osaka, the greatest commercial city of Japan. Mr. Murai said there are now three schools of thought in Japan with reference to social conditions. The radical, which is eager for European civilization and is willing to adopt any and all European customs and modes of thought; the conservative, which sees no good in anything European and clings to the old feudal principles and would gladly return to that system; and the moderate, representing the majority of the Japanese people, who would like to combine the moral principles of the old régime with the competitive spirit of the modern system. He believes this to be an impossibility, because the underlying principles of the two systems are opposed to each other, and feels that the application of Christianity to the individual and national life of his countrymen is the only practical solution of the problems facing them. To hasten such a consummation he believes that the work of the social settlement should supplement the work of the preacher.

Mr. Murai wishes to secure an endowment of $3,000, the interest on which will enable him to establish and carry on a settlement among the laboring people in Osaka. He has prepared a number of illustrated lectures, which are highly commended by many who have heard them, by delivering which he hopes to earn the sum required.

CURRENT THOUGHT.

AT HOME.

The Watchman is quite right when it says: "The adversary the church has most to fear is worldliness in its own ranks. We do not use the term 'worldliness' in any cant sense. We mean by it a complacent satisfaction in the pursuit of physical comfort and pleasure, a disposition that bounds the horizon of the spirit by the narrow arc of what appeals to the physical, the intellectual or æsthetic faculties. That is the essence of worldliness. The purely philanthropic, humanitarian directions in which so many churches are spending their most strenuous efforts are a witness to the truth of our observation. . . . The cure for this spirit of worldiness is not simply the avoidance of this and that and the other, but it is the quickening of the spiritual nature by what used to be called 'a realizing sense' of the majestic realities of the eternal world. We need a fresh consciousness of the worth of the soul, of the heinousness of sin, of the significance of salvation, and of the realities of the eternal world."

The Christian Advocate has been considering the reports of the savings banks of New York, and finds in them great encouragement for the stability of the country. It says: "Wealth is more evenly divided than in any prior era of American history. There is money at interest in savings banks to the extent of more than $100 for every man, woman and child in the Knickerbocker commonwealth, and the average amount is annually augmenting. The 1,732,382 depositors are all creditors at the rate of $412 apiece. More than half the people in the State of New York are directly interested in savings bank accumulations, and they are—almost exclusively—of the common people. Industry, thrift, integrity created these accumulations, and will preserve them at their gold value. Every dollar is an argument for equity, truth and honesty—an argument convincing, conclusive, beneficent."

It is gratifying to find The Christian Observer of Louisville protesting vehemently against the recent outbreaks of mob violence in Kentucky, and saying: "It is obvious that the best public sentiment is ready to sustain effective measures to destroy this evil. But action in the matter must emanate from the governor of the State. If it were to originate with the people the experience would be only a renewal of the same kind of disorder. The responsibility of action rests with the executive authority. When a prisoner yields himself to the custody of the law it is with the pledge of the commonwealth itself that he shall have a fair trial and protection from violence. The yielding of a prisoner into the hands of a mob, as has happened in Kentucky twice lately, is a disgrace which no State can bear and a wrong which the Almighty will not overlook."

ABROAD.

We in this country are not singular in our danger of falling prey to mammon. The Methodist Times (London) asserts that "The old feudal bonds and restrictions are gone; the aristocracy founded upon history and sentiment no longer rules both houses of Parliament. Mere money is omnipotent in England today except so far as public opinion occasionally awakens and asserts itself. Few seem to realize how far the despotism of money is now carried. Notwithstanding all Bribery Acts, seats in the House of Commons as well as in the House of Lords are as openly bought and sold as at any period of English history; and for the first time since the overthrow of the East India Company our foreign policy and our relations to European governments are dominated by the pecuniary interests of financial speculators."

Rev. Alexander McKenzie, D. D., President; George Gould, Treasurer.

PASSING COMMENT ON THIS WEEK'S NEWS.

Probably the reports of accessions which reach us are far from complete, as will be seen when the Year-Book appears. But the reception on confession of the 13,720 new members which we recorded during 1896 means the infusion into our churches of an enthusiasm and devotion whose value cannot be expressed in figures. If each of these, however, engages promptly and earnestly in the work of winning and caring for souls, the result will appear in the figures which chronicle the ingathering of 1897.

A familiar talk on communion Sundays instead of a sermon is a good custom in some churches where the Lord's Supper is a part of the morning service. It avoids the spirit of hurry and the lengthening of the hour which otherwise occurs repeatedly or occasionally. Moreover, an hour and a little more is all too brief a period for a bi-monthly or monthly season of quiet thought and spiritual refreshment.

"All debts are paid at the close of the year and we are now ready to do good work for the Master." Those who have struggled through 1896 with the load of a standing deficit will be reminded by the joyous exclamation above that until other cares are canceled the spiritual element of the work cannot receive fullest attention.

Some of the Boston churches received notably large accessions last Sunday. May each New Year's communion find a proportionately larger number of applicants seeking to identify themselves as sharers in the common privileges of work and worship.

The sisterly act of some Michigan King's Daughters should suggest a plan for adoption now for next Christmas by many other young people.

An efficient instructor might start a new era for Sunday schools which would try the experiment of holding a "model study hour" as it was carried out in a New York church.

From a Jew who has studied the attitude of his brethren toward Christianity the testimony in a Connecticut item is of value.

EDUCATIONAL WORK IN A BERKSHIRE CHURCH.

The institutional work of the church in North Adams, Mass., has assumed proportions hardly anticipated when the pastor, Rev. W. L. Tenney, induced the Men's Sunday Evening Club to appoint a university extension committee. Over 300 persons, including those of all faiths and some of no faith, attend the Tuesday Night Institute. Professor Peck of Williams College has given a course of seven lectures upon Evolution. Dr. Spahr of the Outlook and Dr. Bascom of the Kingdom have discussed the financial problem, and Professor Mears of Williams is now in the midst of a valuable course of lectures upon chemistry, illustrated by apparatus kindly loaned from the college laboratory. Fourteen classes in literature, economics, logic, American history, general history, history of the apostolic church, chemistry, physiology, French and German are in successful operation. The students of Williams College have expressed a desire to co-operate with the pastor, who is president of the Sunday Evening Club, in a work similar to that undertaken by Harvard students in the Prospect Union.

For three months the pastor has been giving a course of Sunday evening lectures upon Epochs and Epoch-makers of the Christian Centuries. The course will occupy six months and has been attended by large and thoughtful congregations, of whom a large proportion have been men. The volume of sermons entitled The Imperial Christ, by the late Dr. Coyle, for nine years the honored leader of this church, is meeting with a large sale in the community. T.

OUTGROWTHS OF IOWA SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

Interesting results of the work of the Sunday School Society are to be noted in the recent recognition by council of a promising church in North Dubuque, and the preliminary organization of another in Gaza, O'Brien County, the latter in connection with the dedication of a house of worship for which Rev. J. K. Nutting has secured funds during the summer. Both these organizations are in unoccupied territory. That in Dubuque grew out of a school started less than two years since near a race course and a beer garden, in a location where Sunday desecration prevailed and where obstacles to Christian work were great. Thanks to the fidelity of the superintendent, and to the constant and hearty assistance of the city pastors, the school has prospered and has led to the formation of a church which will at once take its place among the permanent religious forces of Dubuque. At Gaza the school was organized only about a year ago, in the waiting-room of the railway station, and in the summer was removed to the dance hall of the place. There was no other religious service in the town. Out of it grew an interest which culminated in the erection of a house of worship, and the taking of steps to organize a church and secure a pastor.

ONE HUNDRED YEARS IN A MAINE CHURCH.

The centennial of the First Church, Belfast, was observed on the afternoon and evening of Dec. 29. The audience-room was beautifully decorated. The pulpit was capped and banked with evergreen and flowers; festoons and wreaths and conspicuous dates adorned the walls with artistic effect. The clergymen who took part in the exercises were Rev. Messrs. G. W. Field, D. D., J. G. Merrill, D. D., William Forsyth, J. P. Cushman, R. G. Harbutt, F. S. Dolliff. The pastor, Rev. G. S. Mills, made the first address on Our Church Today. The oldest male member, Mr. Augustus Perry, gave reminiscences and he was followed by greetings from brother pastors of the city and county, in other addresses and in letters from absent friends. Then was held a reception and tea in the parlors. In the evening there was special music by a choir and an able historical address by Dr. Field, a native of Belfast. He characterized the pastors of the past and the history of each period briefly from the beginning. Twelve pastors have served the church. An original hymn followed the address.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.

Hartford.

Rev. Henry M. Field, D. D., editor of the New York Evangelist, an alumnus of the seminary, addressed a chapel full of students and friends last week Tuesday evening on The New England Minister as I Remember Him Fifty Years Ago as Compared with the Minister of Today. The information and comparisons were intensely interesting.

CLUBS.

Mass.—Merrimac Valley Club met with the First Trinitarian Church, Lowell, Dec. 28, and heard with pleasure a well-prepared and discriminating eulogy of Daniel Webster by Rev. Dr. A. W. Moore of Lynn.

Kan.—The Topeka Club celebrated Forefathers' Day with First Church. The program was interspersed with music, and responses were made to the following sentiments: Wanted—A New Puritan, Our Foremothers, The After Children.

Mo.—The Springfield Club observed Forefathers' Day by a banquet served by the ladies of Second Church. The address, by Rev. Wolcott Calkins, D. D., of Boston, was appreciatively received. Dr. Calkins also lectured next day to the students of Drury College on The Origin of the French Revolution, giving a scholarly and fresh interpretation of the spirit of that time.

Cal.—The San Francisco Club commemorated Pilgrims' Day Dec. 21, in the new room of First Church, Berkeley. Professor Clapp read a paper on New England Today, Dr. G. C. Adams spoke on Providential Shaping of Pilgrim Character, and Rev. C. R. Brown on The Puritan in Political Life. Dr. W. T. Harris, U. S. Commissioner of Education, also made a brief address. Resolutions condemning the outrages in Armenia, and calling upon the United States for immediate action, were presented by Rev. W. W. Scudder and unanimously adopted.

NEW ENGLAND.

Boston.

The Congregational Superintendents' Union held its monthly meeting at Berkeley Temple last Monday evening, with the new president, Mr. J. W. Brown, in the chair. After the collation a devotional service was held, led by Mr. J. W. Field. Rev. A. E. Dunning addressed the meeting on How to Make the Most of the Sunday School. The executive committee reported adversely on the proposition to admit ladies to membership.

Old South. The additions last Sunday, 34, were the largest number received at any one time since the organization in 1669. It should be added, however, that for many years communion services were held each month, while now they occur only once in two months.——Shawmut closes a prosperous year, the fourth under the free seat system. The annual meeting, held Jan. 1, showed a healthy condition of life in all departments of work.——Mt. Vernon. At the communion service last Sunday an unusually large congregation gathered. Dr. S. E. Herrick gave his customary informal address, bearing chiefly on the New Year. Several new members were received.——Berkeley Temple opened a temperance campaign last Sunday, to be led by the well-known speaker, Mr. Francis Murphy. Afternoon and evening found large congregations. More than 150 signatures to the pledge were received. The meetings continue every night this week.——Brighton finds it profitable to hold its communion service in the afternoon, and as a rule ninety per cent. of the resident membership are present.

Jamaica Plain.—Boylston. The eighth anniversary of the pastorate of Rev. Ellis Mendell occurred Dec. 27. This period of labor has accomplished and meant much for the church.

Roxbury.—Olivet held an interesting Christmas gathering. About 80 children were present with attendant friends, and largely from homes of poverty. But for articles of clothing given them many could not have been there. Special classes of instruction for boys and girls are well attended, and a system of visitation and relief is in active operation.

Massachusetts.

Everett.—Courtland Street. Revival services, which have continued for over two weeks, have resulted in the quickening of believers and over 22 conversions. Of the latter, most came from the associate membership of the C. E. Society. Evangelist F. P. Greenwood assisted in the services and they were conducted in a wise manner. Rev. R. H. McGown is pastor.

Medford.—Mystic. Fifty persons were received into the church during the year just closed, 35 on confession, 19 being heads of families. All outstanding debts are canceled, over $2,000 were expended in renovating the audience-room. Nearly 200 were present at the preparatory lecture Jan. 1. The present membership is 444. Rev. John Barstow completed the second year of his pastorate Dec. 27. A branch school of over 100 members has been opened at Glenwood, while the average attendance at the home school is larger than ever.

Andover.—South and Free united in special meetings last month under the lead of the Evangelistic Association of New England, services being held every afternoon and evening. Excellent results have already followed in the quickening of Christians and in several conversions.

Boylston reports 11 additions for the year, six on confession. Parish expenses were nearly $4,000, of which $2,500 were expended in thoroughly remodeling the interior of the meeting house and in the purchase of a new pipe organ. All bills are paid. A large chorus adds to the helpfulness of the Sunday evening services. Rev. D. E. Burtner is pastor.

Middleton.—After more than five years of earnest ministry Rev. W. P. Landers resigned last Sunday, to take effect Sept. 1. He has made a strong impression upon the community as a citizen and Christian minister. He is president of the Salem District S. S. Association and of the Salem C. E. Union. He is also a director of the Massachusetts C. E. Union, and is press superintendent in this work for the State. Miss H. S. Thompson has just been elected clerk of this church.

Lexington.—Hancock has just adopted a system of Sunday school grading. The three departments besides the primary are senior, progressive and intermediate. The latter is a five years' course. Its distinctive feature is that the teachers take the same subject year after year, the classes being promoted from one teacher to another.

Concord.—Trinitarian has adopted individual communion cups, the entire service being a gift from a member of the church in memory of his deceased wife.

Newburyport.—Prospect Street. Under the pastorate of Rev. M. O. Patton this church is showing satisfactory growth. The annual gain was 16 members, 10 on confession, with an increase of 50 per cent. in the morning congregation and a good gain in the C. E. and S. S. departments. Mrs. Patton, wife of the pastor, has been seriously ill, but is slowly recovering, to the joy of many friends.——Whitefield. Rev. J. H. Reid, the pastor, desiring to supplement his course at Yale Divinity School, has been granted six months' leave of absence, and is already in Edinburgh for a three months' lecture course. He then goes to Oxford for a like period. In the meantime the church will be supplied by Rev. S. C. Brooks, lately of Fitchburg, who with his family will occupy the parsonage. Mrs. Reid will remain in Newburyport and assist in the church work.——North. Rev. C. P. Mills, having been elected to the legislature, had an opportunity to meet some of his colleagues at a recent supper given by a parishioner. At the annual meeting, the last night of the year, the parish and other friends were welcomed and responses to many toasts were much enjoyed.——Belleville. The fifth anniversary of the pastorate of Rev. A. W. Hitchcock was quietly recognized on a recent prayer meeting night by the people with roses, gold and friendship. At the roll-call, Dec. 31, nearly 200 sat down to supper together, and 238 responses were given from 341 members of the church. The greetings of the senior pastor, Rev. D. T. Fiske, in the words of John the aged, were peculiarly fitting and impressive. A social birthday party for the entire parish, recently held in the chapel, netted $1,250 toward a fund to provide some fitting memorial of Dr. Fiske's 50 years of service. The past year this church has raised over $8,000, mostly in small sums.

Worcester.—Lake View. The council that met to sever the pastoral relation of Rev. J. E. Dodge with this church passed resolutions of high commendation of the retiring pastor, and appointed a committee to secure and present to him a sum equal at least to three months' salary in recognition of the faithful services rendered. During the less than three years of the pastorate the church has nearly doubled its membership and prospered in all its branches. A pipe organ, electric lights and other improvements have been added and are paid for. There is a large and loyal C. E. Society which has contributed over $100 to the church the past year. The present membership of the church is 61. Benevolences for the year were $75 ——Belmont closes the year with all bills paid and in a prosperous condition. The S. S. membership has increased during the year from 231 to 335. The church membership is 139, 27 of whom have been added the last year.——Pilgrim. The annual church reception was held Dec. 31 with large attendance. Telegrams of greeting were exchanged with the former pastor. Rev. C. M. Southgate of Auburndale. Mr. Brierly, the S. S. superintendent, retiring after six years of service, was presented with an elegant chair and clock.——Union observes the Week of Prayer with special services. The pastor, Dr. J. E. Tuttle, will give a series of sermons on The Christian Life Sunday evenings during January.

Gilbertville.—Trinitarian. During the 14 years' employment of the weekly pledge system its use has gained steadily. The Sunday evening congregation and the attendance at the midweek meeting and the Y. P. S. C. E. are growing. Rev. Nathan Thompson is living here, and is a help to the pastor, Rev. D. C. Stone, by preaching and in the weekly meeting.

Warren.—Of the 263 resident members 146 responded to their names at the annual roll-call. There have been added to the church during the year 15 new members. The benevolence of the church for S. S. and missionary work was $2,819. The Week of Prayer is observed by union services at the several churches. The pastor has commenced a series of four Sunday evening praise services, at which addresses to the young people will be given on modern science and life. These services have been held in the audience-room of late and are so well attended that they will be continued. The church has adopted Rev. William Davies of Spokane, Wn., and Rev. S. C. Bartlett of Tottori, Japan, as their ministers in the missionary fields for the coming year and intends to furnish their support.

North Brookfield.—First. The Week of Prayer is observed by this church in joint meetings with the Union and Methodist churches. Eleven new members were received at this church last Sunday on confession, and the four new deacons of the church were installed. A business men's Bible class has been formed, a kindergarten department has just been opened and a Junior C. E. Society is being organized.

Granby.—The meeting house has been put in thorough repair and is refurnished in part. The 75th anniversary of the dedication of the present edifice was celebrated Dec. 31. The annual roll-call meeting and dinner was held, and in the afternoon there was special music and a historical sermon by the pastor, Rev. R. C. Bell, who completed on that day his fifth year here. Ten-minute addresses by visitors were a feature.

Great Barrington has made a careful revision of its manual, after special inquiry after all absent members. At the annual meeting a bountiful supper was furnished by the Ladies' Aid Society, and a roll-call was enjoyed. A large proportion of the members, nearly 200, were present and responded. This new departure will now become an annual observance of the church.

Newton.—Auburndale. Following the custom of the past few years, early morning meetings were held on Christmas and New Year's mornings. These are among the most interesting and spirited meetings of the year. The additions to the church at the January communion were 10 by letter and one on confession.

Maine.

Biddeford.—Second has made an excellent showing this year. A balance remains after all debts are discharged, the church has been incorporated, the congregations are growing, benevolences are increased, the S. S. primary department on the kindergarten plan adds efficiency. The pastor's course of lectures on Social Problems has attracted much attention. The Ladies' Missionary Society raised $300. There have been nine additions to the church.

South Paris.—The annual meeting called out an unusually large attendance Dec. 29. Great harmony prevailed. Twenty-one persons have united on confession. During the present four years' pastorate of Rev. R. J. Haughton there have been 60 additions. Fifty subscribers are pledged to Congregational Work.

Bridgton.—A club and reading-room for the young men of the town is to be opened, and the vestry is being prepared. At North Bridgton the gift of a fine chandelier from Dr. E. E. Chadbourne, in memory of his wife, is much appreciated.

Andover has used the town hall for services the past five Sundays, and there have been good congregations. The walls and ceiling of the meeting house are completed, and modern pews of oak are to be furnished.

Bucksport.—Elm Street. A unique and delightful party was recently held, at which about 75 pictures of Madonnas and The Nativity were shown and described.

The work of Misses Washburn and Burdette at South Ashland and Masandis has awakened much interest, and there have been several hopeful conversions.——The Gray church realized $100 from a recent fair.

New Hampshire.

Plymouth.—The pastor, Rev. F. G. Clark, celebrated the close of seven years with this church by an appropriate sermon. More than $27 have been raised for the Armenian orphans. The money usually spent for presents for the teachers of the various schools of the town was this year used for clothing and groceries for the poor.

Manchester.—South Main Street is taking new interest in its work and the new pastor, Rev. C. A. Bidwell, is encouraged by many evidences of advancement. The repairs on the edifice are finished and paid for. Pew rentals have increased almost $300. The congregations are increasing and an unusual religious fervor is noted.

Concord.—First. During the past year nine persons have united with the church. The S. S. membership is 370 and the C. E. rolls include 180. The contributions amounted to $2,281. Last Sunday the pastor, Rev. Dr. F. D. Ayer, declared his purpose to lay down his pastorate next September at the close of 30 years' service.

Lancaster.—The new pastor, Rev. P. F. Marston, was formally installed Dec. 30. At a recent festival and entertainment the women realized $125. The Sunday school, which lost somewhat during the vacancy in the pastorate, is rapidly getting into a healthy working condition again. Rev. Ralph Gillam begins a series of union revival services this month.

Swanzey.—For the promotion of a better acquaintance, the new pastor and wife, Rev and Mrs. V. W. Blackman, have opened the parsonage for a series of sociables, which are well attended and greatly appreciated.

The Ladies' Circle in Rye netted from a Christmas festival nearly $125, and those in Dumbarton realized nearly $25.——The Plaistow and North Haverhill church was never better united. The meetings are well supported and the outlook is encouraging.

Vermont.

Springfield.—First celebrated Forefathers' Day by a dinner, 65 persons being present. The dinner was followed by a historical address on John Robinson, the Pastor of the Pilgrim Fathers, by the pastor, Rev. O. S. Davis. Several toasts were responded to and the occasion was the most pleasant of the five already celebrated by the society. A Scrooby Club is to be formed at once.

Jamaica.—Twenty-six accessions recently received, all but one on confession, are the result of the recent revival meetings in which the Congregational and Baptist churches united. This is the largest ingathering the church ever had. Mr. A. J. Cameron is pastor.

St. Johnsbury.—North has recently raised its debt of $1,200. The chairman of the business committee made a detailed report and then the pastor, Dr. A. H. Heath, called for subscriptions and before the close of the service the entire amount called for was pledged.

West Rutland.—Rev. G. I. Adams was ordained Dec. 29, Rev. C. R. Seymour preaching the sermon and Rev. F. S. Adams offering the prayer. Mr. Adams has been engaged to supply the pulpit for six months.

Barton Landing is enjoying prosperity under the lead of Rev. J. K. Fuller. At a recent midweek prayer meeting, without special effort, 125 were present. The church was incorporated Dec. 26.

At the Christmas tree exercises in Cambridge a collection was taken for the Armenians.

Rhode Island.

SLATERSVILLE.—Jan. 3, the last Sunday of the pastorate of Rev. J. H. Whitaker, was pleasantly marked by the reception of six adults into the church on confession and one by letter.

Connecticut.

HARTFORD.—The Monday morning Ministers' Meetings have been resumed and are growing in popularity.——Wethersfield Avenue. The transference of the property of the society to the church has been accomplished, and the society is in consequence dissolved.——First presented Rev. Dr. G. L. Walker, pastor emeritus, with a handsome loving cup Christmas, as a remembrance of affection and sympathy for him in his illness. Dr. Walker was much moved by this token. A largely attended New Year's reception was held in the chapel Friday.——Fourth. Rev. Samuel Freuder, a converted Jewish rabbi and graduate of Chicago Seminary, addressed the pastor's Bible class last Sunday and spoke at the Wethersfield Church in the evening. He has other appointments in the city. He shows a hopeful view of the prospect of the conversion of the Reformed Jews to Christianity, if wisely planned and persistent efforts are put forth.

ROCKY HILL.—Troubles which have existed for some time resulted in the calling of a council to meet Dec. 31, to advise whether or not the church should accept the resignation of its acting pastor, Rev. C. D. Chunn. The council found that as Mr. Chunn had not been installed he could not claim a dismission by council. It declined to give credence to or judgment on rumors concerning the pastor, but expressed its wish and prayer that he might be guided of the Lord in his future service and that the divisions in the church might be healed. The time of Mr. Chunn's engagement will expire April 1. At a business meeting of the church on the evening after the council several members were voted letters of dismission.

NEW BRITAIN.—First. The New Year's reception given the members of the church by Rev. and Mrs. G. H. Sandwell at the parsonage last Friday was a success.——South gives evidence of being stronger than ever along all lines. The membership, 962, shows a net gain of 22 for the year, there being 26 additions on confession. The income from the various funds amounted to $858 and the Sunday collections to over $2,000. It was unanimously voted to continue Rev. S. G. Butcher as assistant pastor the coming year. There are 707 families and 2,734 persons connected with the church, making it one of the largest Congregational churches in New England. Rev. Dr. J. W. Cooper is pastor.

WEST HARTFORD.—First. The funds of the church amount to $4,400. It was voted to have a copy made for handy reference of the book of original records, containing 5,000 entries of births, "publishments," marriages and deaths, from 1714 to 1840. The time of communion was changed to begin the first Sunday in January. Rev. T. M. Hodgdon is pastor.

WILLIMANTIC.—An interesting praise service was held last week Sunday evening, the arrangement being that of The Congregationalist. The ladies netted quite a sum from the supper which they gave Dec. 29, and the proceeds will be applied towards paying for the improvements which were recently made on the edifice.

LITCHFIELD.—The close of the first year's pastorate of Rev. John Hutchins finds the church much strengthened. There were 22 additions, equally divided between confession and letter. The church has given in benevolences $1,375. A C. E. Society has been formed.

NORWICH.—Broadway and Second, uniting with the Central Baptist Church, are making preparations for a three weeks' series of revival services, a week at each church. The pastors will conduct the services at first, enlisting outside aid later.

HEBRON has voted to add $100 to the society's permanent fund towards making good the losses sustained by the society from unfortunate investments.

WATERTOWN.—First. The late G. R. Baldwin of Waterbury, after making several minor bequests, left the remainder of his property, a considerable sum, to this church.

COLLINSVILLE.—The sale of seats following the annual meeting of the church last week amounted to $1,573, a little less than last year's amount.

FAIRFIELD has voted for free seats for the ensuing year, and to raise the salary of the pastor, Rev. F. S. Child, $300.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

BUFFALO.—People's. Rev. H. E. Gurney, the State evangelist, is assisting the pastor, Rev. H. D. Sheldon, during the opening weeks of the year.——Pilgrim. The new pastor, Rev. S. C. Ferris, is meeting with success in this field. A Boys' Brigade of 50 members has been organized and is drilled by an officer of the State militia.——First, Dr. F. S. Fitch, pastor, closes a successful year, with $100 surplus in the treasury.——Plymouth Chapel is too small for its growing attendance. The infant class numbers over 200. A new house is much needed and a temporary substitute serves for a reading-room and for the various church activities. Rev. A. L. Grein is pastor.——Clinton Street and Sloan. At the former of these churches a Young Men's Association has been organized, which is instituting features of institutional work, a reading-room and other instrumentalities for the young people in the community. At Sloan there is a quiet religious interest in progress, with some interesting conversions. Rev. L. G. Rogers cares for this double field.

SYRACUSE.—Plymouth, Rev. E. N. Packard, D. D., pastor, has unusually large morning congregations, and has voted to adopt Mr. Moody's suggestion for meetings during January.——Danforth, Rev. H. A. Manchester, pastor, is to unite with a neighboring Methodist church in a series of evangelistic meetings under the lead of Rev. M. S. Rees.——Good Will, Rev. H. N. Kinney, pastor, has been for some weeks having a successful after-meeting in connection with the Sunday evening service, in which there are frequent conversions.

COVENTRYVILLE.—A church rally was enjoyed Dec. 16, nearly 125 persons being present. Six former pastors responded by letter; another was able to be at the meeting. The present pastor, Rev. R. C. Lansing, presented an interesting pastoral letter.

NEW YORK.—Manhattan, at its second communion, Jan. 3, received 35 members to membership, 32 by letter. This month the pastor, Rev. Dr. H. A. Stimson, will give a series of five Sunday afternoon lectures on The Story of the New Testament.

DE PEYSTER rejoices in the payment of an old debt, the last of several wiped out during 1896. Since the coming of the present pastor, Rev. Grant Van Blarcom, last February, no missionary aid has been received.

MORIAH.—The women have been able to put a much-needed furnace in the meeting house; congregations are increasing, those of the evening being one-third young men. The present pastor is Rev. H. A. Depfer.

COLUMBUS recently held on a week day evening a "model study hour," to which the Sunday school was invited. The object was to give the scholars an idea of the best way to prepare their lessons. Rev. C. H. Burroughs is pastor.

CARTHAGE closed the year with special services for the week and will begin the new year with the observance of the Week of Prayer. Evangelist H. M. Morey spent a week with this church, efficiently aiding the pastor, Rev. J. B. Felt.

PHŒNIX has paid off a debt of $1,200 during the year and is now all out of debt. A good number of new members united with the church last year.

Pennsylvania.

LANSFORD.—Second has been holding evangelistic services this month, Rev. R. McHardy of Canada assisting. A recent appeal to the congregation secured $700, which nearly clears the church of debt.

RIDGWAY has recently obtained a set of fine communion furniture, a table and chairs. Three missionary services have recently been held with great success, two conducted by the young people.

VANDLING has recently raised about $300 of its indebtedness and sent an offering to the Armenians. It keeps its reading rooms open daily and they are visited by many persons.

From a New England supper in Allegheny Dec. 10 the First Church realized $200.——Kane has completed its parsonage and organized a C. E. Society.

THE INTERIOR.

Ohio.

SPRINGFIELD.—First. The pastor's wife, Mrs. Steiner, has been called to Oxford, O., by the death of her mother. At the annual meeting it was noted that Miss Ellen Folger has served efficiently for 35 years as superintendent of the primary school. Another teacher in the Sunday school, Mrs. C. M. Nichols, has taught a class for 41 years uninterruptedly. The financial and spiritual outlook are more encouraging than for years.

Illinois.

SHAW had a memorable day Dec. 20. Though not a year old, it has erected a neat and substantial house of worship. The pastor, Rev. M. A. Frost, has done good service on the field and has encouraged the people in their efforts. The trustees have been indefatigable and the people have responded nobly. At the dedicatory services the sermon was by Dr. James Tompkins, who also superintended the raising of the $400 required to clear up all indebtedness and prepare the way for the appropriation from the C. C. B. S. In the evening the Amboy and Lee Center Churches gave up their services to be present and their pastors made addresses. A lay evangelist, Mr. Clapp, who rendered valuable service here before the church was organized, brought a helpful message. Mr. Frost includes in his parish the church in Sublette and the people from there were present.

CHICAGO.—Pilgrim held its annual meeting Dec. 30, showing a present membership of 549. Part of the year it was pastorless. During the four communions of Dr. G. R. Wallace's pastorate 57 were added to the church. During the year $8,217 have been raised, of which $1,986 were for benevolence. Increased attendance at Sunday evening services and prayer meetings are especially noted. The Mayflower Mission is prosperous. Its Sunday school is only limited by the size of the building. A kindergarten and free medical dispensary were added during the year.

Indiana.

INDIANAPOLIS.—Plymouth. The McCulloch Club is having a series of home lectures on civics. The subjects are treated by local experts. A limited number of course tickets are sold and the pupils in certain grades of the schools are furnished free admission.——Brightwood has adopted plans and let the contract for an enlarged house. The present edifice is to be moved to the rear and a new auditorium built which will supply the church with needed room and Sunday school facilities. Rev. C. E. Grove is pastor.——Rev. J. W. Comfort, an excellent preacher and a man who wins and holds many friends, recently retiring from his pastorate and the professorship of homiletics at Butler College of the Christian Church on account of Congregational views, is now residing in Indianapolis and preaching as opportunity offers. He would accept a pastorate in a Congregational church.

FORT WAYNE.—South. A Christmas sale held by the women netted over $100. The church has a large field and is gradually overcoming the perplexities incident to the drawing power of the down-town churches.

Michigan.

DETROIT.—The churches celebrated Christmas much as usual, by benevolences, charities, entertainments and services for young and old, and all feel that the season has been an uplifting time.——People's. Beginning Jan. 3, the pastor, Rev. Morgan Wood, is to conduct two weeks of special meetings.——Mt. Hope has just received 15 new members.

CONSTANTINE.—The Sunday school attendance has outgrown the capacity of its room and has to hold opening and closing exercises in the auditorium. One class of elderly men numbers over 30. The church gave a reception to the 60 new members recently received. It was a delightful occasion.

SAGINAW.—The Men's Club discusses timely topics at the close of the Sunday morning services. The King's Daughters had a Christmas tree and dinner for about 60 persons who would otherwise have had no Christmas cheer.

HART held its annual meeting Dec. 23. Rev. A. H. Hadden made an address after the supper. The church has doubled its benevolences and added 20 members in the year. Rev. Arie Binkhorst is pastor.

Wisconsin.

FONTANA.—A new organization, with 16 members, was recognized Dec. 30. Addresses were given by Rev. Orville Smith and Sec. H. W. Carter. The preliminary organization and the reception and baptism at the recognition were conducted by Rev. F. N. Dexter. The council for the recognition of the Williams Bay church and the preliminary organization at Fontana were held Dec. 18.

THE WEST.

Minnesota.

MINNEAPOLIS.—The annual reunion of Congregational ministers and their families occurred Dec. 28 at First Church. About 80 persons were present, and letters were read from several former pastors, including Rev. Drs. H. A. Stimson, G. H. Wells, J. L. Scudder and others. This yearly gathering dates from the early days of Minneapolis, and included the ministers of both Twin Cities until they became too numerous to be entertained under one roof. It has done much to promote the delightful ministerial fellowship which has characterized this city.

Kansas.

Eureka.—The most thorough religious awakening the town has ever felt has resulted in nearly 180 decisions for Christ. The Southern Kansas Academy students have become almost universally Christians and the church has been greatly quickened. The pastor, Rev. Adam Murrman, has been assisted in these meetings by Evangelist R. L. Layfield of Kansas City, Mo. Though held in the Congregational edifice, they soon developed into union services, and the harvest will be shared by all the churches in town.

Nebraska.

Arcadia.—The meetings held at Dunham schoolhouse by Rev. J. F. Smith have resulted in great good. Mr. Smith has sustained out-station work here for some time under great discouragement. The community has been irreligious, with Sabbath desecration and various immoralities. During the progress of the meetings the presence and power of the Holy Spirit were manifest and 25 persons accepted Christ. The home church held a communion service at the schoolhouse, at which 19 united on confession. This makes a total of 29 accessions within three months. Mr. Smith has been invited to be installed as permanent pastor.

Rising City, Rev. C. J. Sage, pastor, held its annual meeting Dec. 29. It took the form of a rally service, commencing at 10 A. M. There were full reports of church work, and a social lunch at noon. Hard times have affected the finances, but otherwise the work continues encouraging.

Lincoln.—Butler Avenue, situated in the northern part of the city, maintains the only service in a large neighborhood, and is seeking to reach all the people by various forms of activity.

Saratoga Church, Omaha, has received a new communion set from the large class of young ladies taught by Mrs. L. S. Hand.

North Dakota.

The State H. M. S. is considering the appointment of a new superintendent, to take the place of Rev. H. C. Simmons, who has resigned his commission in order to give his whole time to Fargo College. He will continue to serve, however, until his successor is appointed.

PACIFIC COAST.

California.

Campbell.—The admission fee to the Christmas entertainment was a large apple and a large potato. It was paid enthusiastically. The proceeds were devoted to the poor.

Saratoga.—During the year the debt of $150 has been paid. New paper adorns the walls. Rev. W. H. Cross finishes 14 years of continuous service.

Washington.

Seattle.—A determined effort, led by more than 100 saloon keepers re-enforced by a number of merchants and bankers, to secure the repeal of the early closing ordinance, was defeated Dec. 14, largely through the co-operation of church workers with the better element among the citizens. The ordinance referred to requires that all salooons be closed from 1 to 5 A. M.

The church in Trent has received the generous gift of an organ from Mr. G. A. Upton of Magnolia, Mass.

CANADA.

New Brunswick.

Milltown.—The 50th anniversary of the church was observed with literary and religious exercises, and special music and decorations. Two ladies who are original members were present.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES.

Leading a blind man to church is part of the work of a missionary committee in Canada.

The repeating of a Psalm learned each month by a Beverly, Mass., society, forms part of the prayer meeting.

Every society in Kansas has a copy of the State paper through the efforts of the State executive committee.

The Indians at Santee Agency, Neb., have five Junior Societies, a Young People's Society and a Mothers' Society.

ROYAL

BAKING POWDER

ROYAL—the most celebrated of all the baking powders in the world—celebrated for its great leavening strength and purity. It makes your cakes, biscuit, bread, etc., healthful, it assures you against alum and all forms of adulteration that go with the cheap brands.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

The sermon committee, suggested by Dr. Clark, reports in two or three minutes at each meeting the main points of the sermon.

A sociable in a large hall in Sante Fé on election night, where returns could be received, was so successful that that society intend to repeat it at future elections.

The World's C. E. Prayer Chain will pray during January for the conversion of the world, that the opening of the new year may witness the beginning of a universal revival.

The Chinese Congregational Endeavorers of San Francisco have given $17 for next year's convention and $30 to the American Board, while still supporting six missionaries in China.

The shoemaker's hammer used by William Carey before he went to India has been given by an English Endeavorer for use as a gavel at the San Francisco Convention. A Hindoo society is making another gavel for the same purpose.

An appeal for work among the students in art schools has led to plans for general efforts in their behalf. All such students interested in the effort, and willing to share in it, should send their names and addresses and names of their schools to Miss Florence Simms, 1,004 Champlain Building, 126 State St., Chicago.

AUTHORIZED AND REVISED VERSIONS COMPARED.

Prof. Richard Moulton, in his book, The Literary Study of the Bible, lays strong emphasis on the superiority of the Revised Version as bringing out the literary merit of each book, the relation of each part to other parts. He says:

> It is impossible to insist too strongly upon this difference between the Revised Version of the Bible and its predecessors, a difference of kind and not of degree, and one which is as wide as the distinction between the words "text" and "context." The English reader need not feel any difficulty on the ground of the disfavor with which the Revised Version has in many quarters been received. Such reception has been the regular fate of revisions from St. Jerome's day downwards. The Authorized Version had itself to encounter the same opposition. It is said to have been a full half-century before this work of King James's translators came into general use, and in the interval we have on record the opinion of a scholar and divine, who, asked by the king, declared he would be torn by wild horses rather than urge so badly executed a version upon the churches.
> The whole discussion of the subject seems to me to have been conducted on a wrong footing. The critics will take single verses or expressions, and, as it were, test them with their mental palate to see whether the literary flavor of the old or the new be superior. But comparisons of this kind are a sheer impossibility. No one, least of all a cultured critic, can separate in his mind between the sense of beauty which comes from association and the beauty which is intrinsic; the softening effect of time and familiarity is needed before any translation can, in word and phrase, assume the even harmony of a classic. Meanwhile the consideration here contended for—the unique excellence of the Revised Version in the matter of connectedness and the higher unity—is beyond dispute. The true issue between the Authorized and the Revised Versions is the question whether the Bible is to be treated as a collection of sayings, each verse an independent whole, or whether the first duty of an interpreter is to associate a text with its context. What answer the theologian will return to this question it is not the province of this book to determine, but speaking from the literary point of view, I make bold to say that the reader who confines himself to the Authorized Version excludes himself from half the beauty of the Bible.

A BISHOP ON UNITY.

Bishop Perowne of Worcester, England, recently invited a large party of Nonconformist ministers to spend the afternoon with him at his residence. After a service in which several of them joined him, the bishop gave a short address, which is thus reported by The Christian World:

> Beginning by heartily welcoming all present, he went on to speak of the growing desire for Christian unity. In this desire he shared, but did not think it could or should be found in one external organization. Such a unity, he thought, would crush liberty, and make things dull and lifeless. But the unity he was desirous of seeing was one of heart and affection. Such, he believed, was the unity prayed for by our Lord, and there was no doubt this prayer was largely answered. Everywhere the desire for Christian unity was observable, not external, but because of this more truly catholic. There need be no giving up of principle, but there were many openings for co operation. The mission field was one; all were wanted, all were blessed. He mentioned as illustrating this the success of the Wesleyans in Fiji, the London Missionary Society in Madagascar, and Carey and the Baptists in India. Then another way in which union might be seen was in the part taken in the revision of the Holy Scriptures. Whatever might be the view as to the "Revised Edition" being a gift of God to his church, his having sat for fourteen years side by side with learned Nonconformist scholars made him able to bear testimony that he had amongst them found hearty Christian feeling. Such a service, too, in which they had just taken part, where there had been so much heartfelt devotion, was a link of union, and so was Christian hymnody, including as it did so many poets of all churches in whom love to the Lord of all was the characteristic feature. They need not give up their special principles but "be one in the truth," and in some real sense they would all see God in one another. By different methods they would be thus keeping the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

RARE CABINETWORK.

One of the leading architects of New York advances the opinion that the Dining Room of a house is more closely scrutinized by visitors than any other apartment. His inference is that especial pains should be taken with the furnishing of this room.

The time has passed when it is necessary to have dining-room cabinetwork built to order in an endeavor to produce a fine effect. Some of our recent productions are equal to the best private designs.

The China Closet here shown is an example. No illustration can do justice to its beauty. The entire frame is deeply carved, and as an example of the graver's art the cabinet is notable.

It is superbly appointed, with beveled plate glass, curved windows and door, beveled French-plate mirrored back, and heavy plate glass shelves. We sell the cabinet for less than half the cost of building it to order.

A PROPER RETORT.

The editor of The Christian Leader has a memory that serves him well in these days of renewed complaint against "political preaching":

> On the Sunday succeeding the murderous assault upon Senator Charles Sumner as a "reply" to one of his senatorial speeches, very few church pulpits failed to make a practical application of the gospel to the outrage upon free discussion and the rights of free men. In one instance the preacher, having done what he felt to be his duty, was on making his way to the door of the church rudely accosted by a stranger in terms very explicit as to the impropriety of preaching politics from the pulpit. Instantly the congregation that was making its exit gathered around the preacher and his accuser. Said the preacher to his accuser, "May I ask of what church or congregation you are a member?" It appeared that he was not connected with either. "May I further ask to what church you give financial support?" It appeared that his money did nothing in that direction. Then the preacher said: "You do not attend any church and you do nothing in the supporting of any preacher. Can you give good reason why you may find fault with that which you do nothing to maintain?"

BRAVE AND FAITHFUL SERVICE.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE WEST MEDFIELD CHURCH.

Whereas our pastor, Rev. N. T. Dyer, has decided that Providence calls him to a new field of labor, we, the members of the Second Congregational Church of Medfield, Mass., which he has served with fidelity for nearly seven years, wish to put on record our affection for him as a man and minister, and our regret at his departure from us.

The trials through which we have been passing for three years have drawn us to each other in a most cordial sympathy, and revealed to us elements in the character of our pastor that have awakened our admiration and respect. His cheerfulness, courage and patience have been an inspiration.

We bear witness that as a preacher he is instructive, evangelical, earnest and sincere; as a pastor he has been faithful, self-sacrificing and sympathetic; as a friend, loyal and true.

We feel in the departure of Rev. Mr. Dyer and his estimable wife, who has also endeared herself to our people by her discreet and Christian demeanor, that we sustain a loss not easily made up to us. Our prayers and earnest wishes will follow them to their new field of labor.

For ourselves and our much tried church, we will take heart in the thought that the Master who loves us and gave himself for us will still be our defense and our guide.

Adopted by vote of church at its annual meeting, Dec. 28, 1896. Signed, FRANCIS S. WIGHT, Clerk.

CHURCHILL—In Oberlin, O., Dec. 30, Etta Vance, wife of Prof. C. H. Churchill.

HUTCHINSON—In Peabody, Mass., Oct. 31, Miss Susan E. Hutchinson, aged 67 years. A devoted member of the South Congregational Church, although restricted by physical disability from taking an active part in church work, she was always responsive to the calls made upon her, and the poor and needy have lost a friend. Cheery and bright in her disposition, her loss in the home circle will be sadly felt.

MARCH—In Winchester, Jan. 1, Dr. Daniel March, Jr., a prominent physician and a son of Rev. Daniel March, D. D., of Woburn, aged 52 yrs.

NORRIS—In Hartford, Ct., Dec. 29, Ella C., wife of Rev. Kingsley F. Norris, associate pastor of the Fourth Church, aged 46 years. A devoted and tireless Christian worker.

PILLSBURY—In Redlands, Cal., Dec. 20, Rev. John F. Pillsbury. He was a graduate of Boston University in 1890, and for a short time acted as assistant pastor under Dr. Horr at East Boston. In 1892 he was called to Newport, N. H., but on account of failing health was obliged to resign.

WILLIAMS—In Providence, R. I, Dec. 22, Mary G., wife of Giles Albert Williams, aged 53 years. Burial at Ware, Mass.

MR. THOMAS SMITH.

Died at his home in Worcester, Dec. 3. He was in his eightieth year, and until a few months before his death vigorous and active. The last time he left his home was to vote on Nov. 3. He was keenly interested in national affairs and considered the result of the election something for which to be thankful.

His wife went before, some three and a half years ago. During the distressing last weeks of his illness he exhibited patient willingness to wait God's time. He clung to life, but spoke with Christian submission of his approaching end. After his wife's death his conversation was much concerning the future life, and his bright hope of meeting her in the better world.

He was located in the same place in Worcester for more than forty years as a manufacturer, and was highly respected as a man of business integrity. He was a faithful member of Plymouth Church and often in the place of worship, though in the last years of his life deafness prevented him from enjoying much in church. He sat near the pastor and was ready to greet him at the close of the service. He was a constant reader of The Congregationalist, having taken it a great many years. He was not a man of public speech, but vigorous and interesting in conversation.

He lived an unostentatious but earnest Christian life. He was a friendly man, and those whom he called his friends through many years found his friendliness sure and lasting though undemonstrative. He lived within a few days of fifty years from the date of his marriage, and two daughters, Mrs. A. P. Cutting and Mrs. F. W. Foye, both of Worcester, survive him.

Remodeling a Gown

becomes a pleasing occupation, provided it was stitched on a Singer Automatic. The elastic seam made by this machine is perfectly safe when locked, but can be taken apart in an instant when unlocked. Thus its use is especially desirable for the clever woman who wishes to make over a garment so that it may conform to the changing styles. Whether in the hands of the amateur or the expert, this simple bit of mechanism is the most convenient and effective of any.

Having all the advantages claimed for other "automatic" sewing machines, the Silent Singer has many points of preference that can easily be demonstrated by comparison. Of faultless construction and finish, it is absolutely the lightest-running, the simplest and most compact. It is more easily threaded, and its parts are better protected from dust. The broad treadle better promotes the health and comfort of the operator, because it is lower and the position of the feet can be changed at will. These points are worthy careful consideration by those of delicate health or unaccustomed to continuous use of a sewing machine.

CHURCH REMODELING.
THOMAS W. SILLOWAY, Church Architect,
10 Park Square, Boston.

Mr. Silloway's long practice in building or remodeling over 400 church edifices enables him to save and utilize all the valuable parts, and for a comparatively small outlay produce a building preferable to a new one of much greater cost. He proposes to continue the work of remodeling as a specialty, and tenders his services to committees who would practice economy, and where the means are limited.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

As was expected, trade at the close of the old year and at the beginning of the new was dull and featureless. It is naturally a dull time in any event, but seems to have been more than usually quiet this season. The Western bank failures and the impending change in the Administration at Washington may have something to do with the small volume of business, although neither of these factors are considered of sufficient importance to interfere with the progress of spring trade. The bank failures in the West are clearly the results of execrable banking methods.

The dry-goods trade is awaiting the spring demand, but the whole cotton goods situation is depressed by the accumulation of print cloths at Fall River, and the very low prices that prevail at that center. Woolen manufacturers buy wool only to make up orders as the latter are received. Prices on pig iron are reported to have been cut twenty-five cents per ton, and, indeed, since the recent reduction in both iron and steel, consumers are holding off to await further developments. Lumber is not selling rapidly, but dealers are looking for a lively movement when the spring season opens. Rates for money are easy, and it is the consensus of opinion that the money market will remain easy for several months.

SALVATION A FACT, NOT A THEORY.

We hold that there is in Christianity that which not only delivers men from outward sins and the desire for them, but also emancipates them from this power of the self-life and substitutes for it the principle of love, perfect love to God and therefore perfect love to men. I think that every one here will admit that if there is that in Christianity, it is not publicly preached as much as it ought to be. This would enable men to test for themselves the truth of Christianity. Just now we are going outside the Bible for proofs of the inspiration of the Bible. We are going to the monuments, to witnesses, to manuscripts for evidence of Christianity. I do not for a moment decry all this, but I mean to say that the man of the street is not able to avail himself of it, and Christianity therefore seems far away from him, and he looks upon it as a matter of contention and wrangling between theologians. But if I can establish my point, that Christ is able to deliver a man from the power of sin and from the love of sin, and to make him a pure and happy being, not by a gradual evolution merely but by the direct and immediate act of God, I give to that man, however ignorant he may be, the power of testing for himself whether Christianity is of God or whether it is a mere dream of the human faculty. I do not know but that I may be addressing men here today who are having trouble with their Christianity, who are not quite sure that it is what they have been taught to believe. If I can only get those men to get hold of what I am talking about, to see that there is a divine power emanating from Christ to which they may attach themselves, shall we not be able to establish that the living Christ is a source of spiritual dynamics to all those who by faith attach themselves to him?—Rev. F. B. Meyer.

THE GRAND OLD MAN LIFTS HIS VOICE.

Mr. Gladstone approves all relief work in this country, as a letter received by Rev. F. D. Greene shows:

I rejoice that the great and bountiful people of your country are endeavoring, through the relief fund, to mitigate, as far as they can, some of the consequences of the conduct of the great assassin.

This is something, not much. For Europe and civilization still remain under the disgraceful reproach of having coldly tolerated a series of outrages, perhaps the most monstrous known to history; and, according to the latest accounts, one of the powers seems, after the innumerable falsehoods of the sultan, still to accept his trivial and worthless assurances, and even to be flattered by them.

To your good work I wish heartily well, and I have the honor to remain your very faithful W. E GLADSTONE.

CHURCH CARPETS AT MANUFACTURERS' PRICES. JOHN H. PRAY, SONS & CO., CARPETS AND UPHOLSTERY, 658 WASHINGTON ST., OPP. BOYLSTON ST., BOSTON.

THE PREACHER AND HIS AUDIENCE.

The London New Age has been discussing the question, Does the Sermon Block the Way? Upon this matter opinions will differ, but we think Professor Shuttleworth, in a letter to the New Age, sums the whole matter up when he says:

> If a man can preach, I believe people will always care to hear him. The truth is, that our clergy are falling into an exactly opposite mistake to that of their predecessors in the eighteenth century. The latter were the most learned clergy in the world, but they were out of touch with life and their people, they neglected their parishes for their books. Today most of us neglect our books for our parishes, and the man who does not read cannot preach effectively to people who do.

On this side, also, Dr. Amory H. Bradford wrote:

> Our sermons would no doubt do more good if they were better, and they would be better, we may add, if fewer things were expected of the preacher. The "one man ministry" is responsible for much of the weakness of the pulpit. The same person cannot be "father confessor" to a large congregation, pastor calling on all his people as often as they wish, their adviser in difficulty and their sympathizer in sorrow, and still have the time or the strength for the best preaching. However, in spite of all its imperfections, I am sure that in my own country, at least, the sermon does not block the way, but that where it most nearly realizes its ideal the audiences are largest, and, so far as can be judged, the best results in the individual and society are realized.

THE HOPEFUL SIDE OF HIGHER CRITICISM.

That students of the Bible should ignore research into its history is no more to be expected than desired. The more that men are interested in it, the more eager they will be to find out what it is, how it came into being and what are the evidences of its divine authority. But the character and aims of the scholars who make these researches have a vast influence in deciding what shall be the power of religious truth in their time. Those who want freedom from the consciousness of God's presence will come to quite different conclusions from those who seek to realize his presence more fully. In this respect we have much reason to rejoice that Biblical investigation is so largely being carried on by devout and reverent scholars. Dr. Fairbairn, in the Outlook, declares that the prospect has never in his experience been so bright as now. He says:

> Criticism is coming to be the exercise of religious minds rather than the hostility of an irreligious rationalism. There could happen no greater calamity to religious thought than that religious scholarship, research and criticism should be in the hands of men whose aims are simply negative. It is hardly possible to overestimate the gain which religion has made by, as it were, capturing the critics. They are not less thorough, not less distinguished by love of truth, not less learned than the men who went before them, so many of whom used the higher criticism as a weapon of offense against faith. Nay, in all these things we may say that, on the whole, the new men are superior to the old, but their pre-eminence lies partly in deeper reverence and in keener sympathy with the thought they deal with in the past and the spirits they speak to in the present, but especially in the marvelous reconciliation they have accomplished between critical freedom and spiritual truth.

Hyomei is a purely vegetable antiseptic, and destroys the germs which cause disease in the respiratory organs. The air, charged with Hyomei, is inhaled at the mouth, and, after permeating the minutest air-cells, is exhaled slowly through the nose. It is aromatic, delightful to inhale, and gives immediate relief. It is highly recommended by physicians, clergymen, and thousands who have been helped and cured.

Pocket Inhaler Outfit Complete, by Mail, $1; (for foreign countries add $1.00 postage); outfit consists of pocket inhaler, a bottle of Hyomei, a dropper and directions for using. If you are still skeptical, send your address; my pamphlet shall prove that Hyomei cures. Are you open to conviction? Extra bottles of Hyomei Inhalant by mail, or at druggists, 50 cents. Hyomei Balm, for all skin diseases, by mail, 25 cents. Your druggist has Hyomei or can get it for you if you insist. Don't accept a substitute. HOBKIRK INN. Est. 1882. Camden, S. C. Dry sunny, piney-wood climate; little wind; warm house, open fires, sunny rooms; excellent cooking; ample grounds; house physician. References, circulars. F. W. ELDREDGE, PROP.

THISTLES FROM SCOTTISH HILLSIDES.

THE RULING PASSION.

Ian Maclaren tells a story of an old Scotchman in a hospital, which illustrates the national love for discussion. One of those wandering angels in feminine form who visit hospitals paused by his cot and asked if she should sing him a hymn. The old man raised himself on his elbow and said in a hoarse whisper: "Na, na. But if ye wad like an argyment, noo, I dinna mind."

THE PROFESSOR AND THE BOOTBLACK.

The late Professor Blackie used to relate with great gusto the following story against himself. As every one knows, the genial professor used to be a picturesque and striking figure in the streets of Edinburgh.

A wiry-framed patriarch, with strikingly handsome features and long hair that fell in ringlets about his shoulders—no one once having seen the professor could forget him. Passing along one of the principal Edinburgh streets he was accosted one day by a very dirty little street gamin with: "Shine your boots, sir?"

The urchin was importunate, and the professor, impressed with the extreme filthiness of the boy's face, remarked: "I don't want a shine, my lad, but if you go and wash your face I'll give you a sixpence."

"A' richt, sir," was the lad's reply, and going over to an adjacent drinking fountain he made his ablution. Returning, he held out his hand for the money.

"Well, my lad," said the professor, "you've earned your money; here it is."

"I dinna want it, auld chap," returned the gamin, with a lordly air, "ye can keep it and git yer hair cut."

A MATCH FOR THE SKELETON.

Dr. McTavish of Edinburgh was something of a ventriloquist, and it befell that he wanted a boy to assist in the surgery who must necessarily be of strong nerves. He received several applications and, when telling a lad what the duties were, in order to test his nerves he would say, while pointing to a grinning skeleton standing upright in a corner, "Part of your work would be to feed the skeleton there, and while you are here you might as well have a try at it."

A few lads would consent to a trial and receive a basin of hot gruel and a spoon. While they were pouring the hot mass into the skull the doctor would make his voice appear to proceed from the jaws of the bony customer and gurgle out, "Br-r-r-gr-huh, that's hot!"

This was too much and, without exception, the lads dropped the basin and bolted. The docter began to despair of ever getting a suitable helpmate, until a small boy came and was given the gruel spoon.

After the first spoonful the skeleton appeared to say, "Gr-r-r-uh-rhr, that's hot!"

Shoveling in the scalding gruel as fast as ever, the lad rapped the skull and impatiently retorted, "Weel, jist blaw on't, ye auld bony!"

HE SPELLED IT WITH A "MAC."

In Otago, New Zealand, where Scotchmen are in the majority, a contract for mending a road was to be let, and the most acceptable bid was signed "McPherson." Notice was sent to the said McPherson to complete the contract, and, lo, he appeared in all the glory of yellow hue and pigtail!

"But," gasped the president of the board, "your name can't be McPherson."

"All lightee," cheerfully answered John Chinaman, "nobody catchee contlact in Otago undless he named Mac."

The contract was signed and the Mongolian McPherson did his work as well as if he had hailed from Glasgow."

BURNS KNEW BETTER.

A practical and patriotic Scotchman assisted at a meeting of a certain improvement society at which a Shakespearean scholar dilated upon the virtues of his favorite writer. At the close of the meeting the stranger approached the lecturer, and the following dialogue ensued.

"Ye think a fine lot o' Shakespeare, doctor."

"I do, sir," was the emphatic reply.

"An' ye think he was mair clever than Robbie Burns?"

"Why, there's no comparison between them."

"Maybe no, but ye tell us it was Shakespeare who wrote 'Uneasy lies the head that wears the crown.' Now Robbie would never hae written sic nonsense as that."

"Nonsense, sir?" thundered the indignant doctor.

"Aye, just nonsense. Robbie would hae kent fine that a king, or a queen either, disna gang to bed wi' the croon on their head. They hang it ower the back o' a chair."

SHE CLUNG TO THE MIRACLES.

Dr. Walter C. Smith, the popular Scotch poet-preacher, on one occasion tried to explain to an old lady the meaning of the Scriptural expression, "Take up thy bed and walk," by saying that the bed was simply a mat or rug, easily taken up and carried away.

"Na, na," replied the lady, "I canna believe that. The bed was a regular four-poster. There would be no miracle in walking away wi' a bit o' mat or rug on your back."

A POPULAR ERROR.—If any of our readers think that, in order to get fine furniture, it is necessary to have it built to order, we ask them to turn to another column and notice the beautiful china cabinet exhibited by the Paine Furniture Co. at their warerooms in this city. We have said several times during the last year that the Paine Company were selling ready-made furniture which was as handsome as anything built to order in this city. An important feature of such furniture is the great saving in price. It costs only about half what one must pay for ordered work.

The Sacramental Hymn

"And when they had sung a hymn, they went out unto the Mount of Olives."

O, to have heard that hymn
Float through the chamber dim,
Float through that "upper room,"
Hushed in the twilight gloom!
Up the dark, starry skies
Rolled the deep harmonies;
—Angels, who heard the strain,
How ran the high refrain?

How rose the holy song?
Triumphant, clear and strong,
As a glad bird uplift
Over the wild sea-drift?
Or was its liquid flow
Reluctant, sad, and slow,
Presage and prophecy
Of lone Gethsemane?

Was it a lofty psalm,
Foretelling crown and palm?
Soared it to hights of prayer,
On the still, vibrant air?
When the last feast was spread,
And the last words were said,
Sang the Lord Christ the hymn
In the old chamber dim?

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

Although it is practically the middle of January, the general business situation continues dull, and but little recovery is noticeable from the apathy usual around the first of the year. Collections do not improve in spite of the easy monetary conditions at the great financial centers. In the money market a slightly better demand for funds is reported and the banks are understood to be pretty well loaned up. Money is abundant, however, and comparatively low rates are expected to obtain for some time.

Salesmen are now starting out on the road and word from them is expected with great interest. It can be stated that in most instances merchants and manufacturers look forward to a good spring trade. Goods in jobbers' and retailers' hands are known to be of small volume, and it is figured in consequence that the call for merchandise, when it does start, will be of very fair proportions.

In cotton goods the situation continues very unsatisfactory, and lower prices would not be surprising. In Fall River, where there is a tremendous glut of print cloths, a paper is understood to be passing among the manufacturers inviting signatures to an agreement to run forty-two hours a week until such time as it is thought fit to terminate the restriction of the production. It is also reported that a portion of the large surplus stock of print cloths, perhaps a million pieces, will be exported and sold for what it will bring in the foreign markets.

Wheat exports continue of fair volume and last week's exports of corn were the largest on record—some 4,819,261 bushels. In wool manufacturers are buying only as required to meet their orders. Lumber is quiet but dealers look for improvement very soon. In the stock market, although trading is dull, there is a very strong undertone and rising prices, and increasing speculative activity are foreshadowed. Railroad earnings are making better showings and this adds to the bullish feeling on the stock exchanges.

ARMENIAN ORPHANS' FUND.

Amount received during the week ending Tuesday noon, and acknowledged in detail by individual receipts	$990.21
Previously acknowledged	20,411.66
Total	$21,401.87

Few more interesting letters have come to hand than this from an A. M. A. school in Alabama:

> It gives us pleasure to send you a draft for $5.71 for the orphans' fund. It may be of interest to you to know that it is the gift of a number of little "American Highlanders." Our friends have been very kind to us and we have felt that we should do something for those more needy than we.
> I announced the Sabbath before Christmas that a collection would be taken for the little children in Armenia when we had our Christmas tree, and followed up the announcement with an explanation of the trouble and suffering. The little ones were much interested, and as they had no money they went to trapping quail to sell to us. As a result we have had quail on toast and quail off of toast and this money to send with the true expression of sympathy from all the little mountaineers. We trust and pray that it may help some little one to a good home and to a life of true service for the needy.

The Book of The Pilgrimage

An Appreciation from

The Independent and Nonconformist
London, England.

"By Monday's mail we received from the proprietors of the Boston Congregationalist a copy of the sumptuous souvenir volume which has been prepared as a record of the Congregationalist pilgrimage to England and Holland. It is entitled 'The Book of the Pilgrimage,' has as its motto Lady Rowena's words (from Scott's Ivanhoe), 'Accept this acknowledgment of thy travail and of the shrines thou hast visited,' and is dedicated to 'our hosts in England.' The contents of the book include all the articles written on the pilgrimage by Dr. Dunning, Miss Dyer, Dr. Clark, Mrs. Spofford, and other members of the party. The itinerary of the pilgrims is traced from the departure from New York to the return to America. Photographs of almost every scene visited are reproduced to remind the pilgrims of what they saw, and a portrait of almost every host, or guide, or speaker with whom the pilgrims came in contact is included in the volume. For the pilgrims themselves no happier souvenir could be devised; for those who came in contact with the party while in England the volume serves as a pleasant reminder of an auspicious event; and for those who in no way shared in the events of the pilgrimage the book provides an entertaining description of a delightful excursion."

Price $3.00, Postpaid.

THE OUTLOOK says:

"The great value of these lectures is not in their analysis of prevalent conditions, although that is searching and just; not in their logic, although that is keen; not in their scholarship, although that is comprehensive; not in their literary style, although that is finished and charming; but in their deep and human sympathy and candor."

"The book is truly wonderful for its width of reading, its radical clearness of thought, and its charm of style. It is a profoundly vital message to the ministry of our time."—Rev. George A. Gordon, D. D. Pastor of the Old South Church, Boston.

DEAN MURRAY of Princeton writes:

"A most timely book. It meets the questions which are stirring in the minds of many, specially of young men, with candor, with ability, and in an attractive manner. The work throughout is full of the spirit of Christ. It is the best one of a very few books I should venture to put in the hands of a young man troubled by doubts."

"Its literary charm and singular cogency will make it a most helpful and permanently valuable contribution to our theological literature."—The Rt. Rev. Henry C. Potter, D. D. Bishop of the Diocese of New York (in a personal letter to the author).

A HOME MISSIONARY'S LETTER.

Dear Sirs: As I have been receiving your valuable paper for two years (or will be now soon) without money and without price I wish to bear witness to its great value to me in my work. Especially was it valuable during our late political contest. Will you please change my address from —— to ——. As I go to that people among the ice and wilderness I feel I shall miss the paper when it ceases its visits, but shall not be able to buy it. We shall remember with grateful heart its visits in the past. Fraternally.

"I think very highly of the Handbook. It is very serviceable in many ways. It has made for itself a place in the work of the denomination and we can hardly understand how we got on without it so long."—N. H.

Our Handbook has for several years served in a number of places as a little New Year's gift from the pastor or church, accompanying a letter of greeting. We have received some very tasteful specimens of the one for 1897, bearing upon the back cover page the names of the regular officers and services of the churches.

IN the vicinity of Boston the special meetings in the churches last week felt, to some extent at least, the influence of the great Tremont Temple gatherings and of Mr. Moody's earnest words. There were few churches which did not hold at least one or two extra meetings. As a rule, reports, so far as received, indicate that these meetings throughout the country were sources of spiritual refreshment and upbuilding to those attending them. Union services in some places brought Christians of different church connections into closer fellowship. We are disposed to question if the observance of the week was as generally enthusiastic as it has been in years past, notwithstanding some churches have reported greater fervor than usual. The drift of sentiment is apparently toward a wider use of Holy Week, both because it comes at a time in the year when many persons are less busy and because it brings certain definite suggestions conducive to a special season of meditation and prayer.

The last year has brought about changes in the relations between this country and Great Britain whose magnitude has only begun to be realized. These changes concern all Europe not less, perhaps, than our own continent. The consciousness of common interests and aims and responsibilities of the two nations, and of the call for our united efforts for the world's higher civilization and permanent peace, was largely awakened by Christian churches, which, in the time when strife was threatened, stretched hands across the ocean and clasped them in fraternal purpose to live in peace as brethren serving one Master. Dr. Mackennal, on another page, tells how these changes are working in England, and what closer relations because of them are coming between Nonconformists and the Established Church. He expresses also the impressions of English brethren as to what results are likely to follow in the United States from the new responsibilities assumed by our Government through the attitude it has taken. More than ever, in view of these things, is it important that American and English Congregationalists should come into closer bonds of fellowship, and be prepared to act together in crises which may come at any time, in which their united utterance may have great weight for the honor and power of English-speaking people throughout the world.

What is the matter with the Baptists of South Carolina? We have not heard of the Congregationalists of Wisconsin, Michigan, Iowa, Minnesota organizing to fight the State universities because their legitimate expansion and reliance on the State treasury have made the problems of Beloit, Olivet, Iowa College and Carleton more pressing. Exactly the same results have followed the creation and growth of the State universities in the North that are now seen in the South, but how different the method of adjustment proposed by the two sections. The South Carolina Baptists have virtually resolved that they will endeavor to win on the reactionary issue that the State has no right to give higher education. The Congregationalists, Presbyterians and Baptists of the North, believing fully that the State has this right, pay their share of the taxes, and then put their hands in their pockets and support denominational colleges and preparatory schools. Nor, were they ever so poor, would they think of denying the right and duty of the State to offer educational privileges to all its most ambitious citizens.

It is said of the late General Walker that his military instinct was so strong that as he looked out of a car window while journeying he almost invariably fell to thinking how the section of the country through which he was passing would adapt itself to a battle. He would notice the vantage points, would calculate how swiftly troops could be moved and how an offensive or defensive fight could best be carried on. In this survival of the soldierly quality, long after the campaigns in which General Walker bore so honorable a part, is there not a lesson for the soldier of Christ as he looks forth upon the world? We have had in our own ranks men who studied constantly fields of Christian operations with a view to the ceaseless conflict of good and evil. Dr. Rufus Anderson was such a man in his outlook upon foreign missions. Dr. Joseph Ward was another in his enthusiasm for home missions. How the Church of Christ would move forward if its members were looking in such a spirit at the little world in which they live! The true Christian soldier is ever ready for a fresh campaign, ever alert to see where and how he can best fight his Master's battles.

The Cabinet-maker of Canton, O., has a difficult and delicate task before him. As he is not alone in his work of choosing rulers who shall be set over the people, we venture to suggest to him and to others the advice which Jethro gave to his son-in-law in the desert, "Moreover, thou shalt provide out of all the people able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating unjust gain; and place such over them." The advice was never more needed than today. Whatever particular qualifications may be necessary for special positions, these general requirements, intellectual and moral, should be demanded in every case.

The hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church in Quebec have put forth their utmost strength to control the legislation of Canada with reference to the schools of Manitoba. Justly fearing the influence of the press, they have declared their right and duty "to interdict the reading of newspapers which they consider detrimental to the interests of faith and the church." They have therefore forbidden all Roman Catholics, under pain of refusal of the sacraments, to buy, read or sell the Electeur, and one of their reasons for doing this is that that newspaper has maintained "that a Catholic may and should sometimes, in matters respecting politics and religious legislation, set aside the direction of the bishops and follow the advice of a lawyer or that of a professional politician—a doctrine which is manifestly contrary to the teachings of Leo XIII." It will be well for citizens of the United States to consider well what this act means. It signifies that the Roman Catholic hierarchy hold it to be their right and duty—where they have the power—to control the politics and legislation of the nation. It remains to be seen whether or not they have power to do this in Canada. Certainly they have not that power in this country, and with such an object lesson before our eyes it ought not to appear strange to Catholic citizens that many people in the United States watch jealously and resist earnestly any movements of the Roman Church which seem likely to increase its influence in politics.

The engineer-in-chief of the navy warns Congress that if it will persist in building high-class ships it must appropriate funds with which to employ skilled engineers to operate them. He says: "The guns will be powerless without the machinery, and, other things being equal, that fleet will give the best account of itself which has the best equipment of trained men in the engine-room, as well as at the guns. To sacrifice the one is merely inviting disaster to the whole, and no amount of skill on deck can compensate for the lack of it below. If the number of trained men is not sufficient for this purpose, the efficiency of the ship as a whole is lowered, and the money which has been expended on her construction to produce the very qualities which were considered of paramount importance has been practically wasted." Herein lies a moral applicable to the warfare of the church against evil. Expensive and intricate ecclesiastical or philanthropic machinery must be kept oiled, cleaned and properly adjusted, or it fails to do that for which it was constructed. There are those today who are old-fashioned enough to believe that too much emphasis is being laid on building machinery and too little on selecting and equipping men who shall operate it. As a result, the few who are competent are breaking down from overwork, and waste is following haste.

The Interior, Presbyterian, has undertaken to discipline Prof. Samuel Ives Curtiss, of Chicago Theological Seminary, for his adoption of certain results of higher criticism concerning the nature of Old Testament prophecies. Our contemporary might have found opportunity for its labors in this direction, and on the same grounds, in almost any professor of Old Testament literature in Presbyterian seminaries, either in this country or Great Britain. The view taken by Professor Curtiss is similar to that of Professor Sanders in his illustration from Isa. 9: 6, 7, in this issue. Professor Curtiss has been allowed generous space in the Interior to defend himself, and has done so effectively. It is not our purpose to take part in the controversy. We refer to it simply to quote his statement of the process through which he has come to accept the main contentions of the higher criticism. The large majority of Biblical scholars have come to the same conclusions with him, and, like him, through long and patient study and prayer for the guidance of the Holy Spirit in their search for truth. And most of them have been rewarded already, not only by clearer knowledge of divine things but by strengthened faith. Professor Curtiss says:

> I make no claims to superior wisdom, although I know something about this subject, having studied it for twenty years, having been present at the trial of Prof. W. Robertson Smith, having known almost every Old Testament critic of prominence on both sides of the ocean, either personally or otherwise, and, as a private pupil of Professor Delitzsch for four years and intimate with him until his death, having witnessed the anguish of his struggles before he declared himself an adherent of the modern critical views. I have felt something of the same anguish, have been troubled for the ark of God, and have thought that, as a champion of traditional views, I could steady it. I must confess that very gradually, but slowly, during many years I have come to the modern critical position, and have found through it a satisfactory view of Scripture, as God's revelation to man through man, and an assurance of its divine character which I have never had before. I fear no attacks of critics, for they cannot disprove the divine character of the book, any more than scientists can disprove that the sun is the source of light and heat.

A LARGE BEQUEST.

When Congregationalists gathered in Albany in a national convention in 1852, one of the purposes they had in mind was to organize a society to aid in building churches. As an immediate result nearly $62,000 were contributed. But no one at that time, probably, anticipated that before the end of a century an amount five times as large would be given to the society by one man.

Nearly four years ago Mr. J. H. Stickney of Baltimore died, leaving large bequests to Congregational missionary societies, colleges and other institutions in which descendants of the Pilgrims are interested, making the Church Building Society residuary legatee. All the other bequests have been paid, but the claim of this society was hotly contested. The Supreme Court of Maryland has now decided in its favor, and the society will soon come into possession of a sum not far from $300,000. Its officers and trustees, anticipating that this decision might be made, have been carefully considering how so large a legacy might be so used as best to meet the needs of the denomination. Heretofore they have not been able in any adequate degree to provide for work in the larger cities which makes pressing demands and which promises most successful results. An indication of what they would like to do more generally is their recent grant to the Jersey City Tabernacle. An opportunity seems at last to have come to furnish suitable equipment for city churches in their beginnings, which may thus be brought speedily to self-support and made strong helpers for the general work of the denomination. It is to be hoped that some such use may be made of this money, distributing it, perhaps, over a series of years. In this way we believe the wishes of the donor will best be fulfilled and the largest good secured.

We are confident that the churches will approve of such a plan, and will continue and increase their contributions so that the society may not feel compelled to devote this legacy to its regular work, which has heretofore been so well managed. During the last ten years 2,274 Congregational churches have been organized. The Building Society has been able to aid only 1,162 of these. Our Presbyterian brethren, on the other hand, in the same ten years organized 1976 churches and aided 1887 through their church erection fund. Not a few of our new organizations, being left houseless, have died, and others have continued a burden to the H. M. S., while, if they could have been aided to erect meeting houses, they might by this time have gained strength to help others. We hope the society may now be able to enter a comparatively new field, and still carry on with larger means the work already on its hands.

THE EVILS OF UNDENOMINATIONALISM.

Unitarian churches have probably less cohesiveness than any other body of churches calling themselves a denomination. They are kept together more by pressure against them from without than from any positive unity within. To this, more than to any other one cause, their lack of growth is due. At a recent address before the Boston Unitarian Club, Rev. John Cuckson emphasized this fact by showing in detail the consequences of their repugnance or indifference to organization. They fight with noble courage and destructive zeal, he said, creeds in other churches and dogmas in their own, but they do not build up themselves. They use the sword but not the trowel. Unitarians maintain no preparatory schools under their care and have only one theological seminary, while the graduates of that one feel that they must take a post-graduate course at Harvard Divinity School. But Harvard has ceased to be Unitarian, and Unitarians in its theological school are only a small minority, while Unitarians generally do not seem to care for their loss. Their association has no authority to settle difficulties and divisions in the churches, and they avoid councils through fear lest in some way they shall lose their independence, which individual churches are often ready to die to assert. They sustain but poorly their denominational paper, the Christian Register, though it has been ably edited. An effort is now being made to raise $20,000 to improve its character and circulation. Mr. Cuckson says that their rebellion against all forms has itself become a form, and that a bare and unattractive one. "We have been wrestling with the bugbear of sectarianism among ourselves, and trying to become reconciled to the utterly unmoral maxim that one religious belief is as good as another and it is a matter of little consequence where or how our children receive their religious education."

The Unitarian denomination has some very able men in its pulpits, and many in its pews. It stands first in this country in its wealth in proportion to its membership among religious bodies claiming to be Christian. Its adherents profess to believe that it stands for religious truth of the highest importance. Yet its very slow growth since the first generation after it began has been most disappointing, as any one may see who reads the confident prophecies of its leaders of sixty or seventy years ago. It may be said that errors in doctrine have hindered its progress. But it would be easy to point to other bodies which hold what we believe to be errors, yet these bodies have grown constantly and rapidly. Mr. Cuckson is certainly right in saying that Unitarianism has been greatly restricted by its lack of a healthy denominationalism. An address of similar nature was lately made by a Universalist minister before the Universalist Conference at Portland, Me. The speaker declared that the Universalist church never had a greater mission than now, but that that church has not prospered because its forces have not been unified.

The lesson enforced for these denominations we shall do well to heed for our own. When Unitarians separated from the Congregational body both denominations had the same polity. But the orthodox churches, finding many of their number deprived of their meeting houses, records and names, and, as they believed, by unjust interpretations of statute laws, drew closer together for aggressive work, while Unitarians fostered a growing pride in the independence of their local churches. Congregationalists planted seminaries to train their ministers and schools and colleges to fit them for such training. They cared for these institutions as they expanded to include youth who wished to be educated for all the pursuits of life. They organized local and State associations and societies to extend their membership throughout our own land and into all lands. They united in declarations of their belief and purpose. They started and fostered periodicals to defend their faith and advance their work and to spread information about both.

The organizations out of which the Sunday School and Publishing Society has been evolved were created by those who believed in their necessity for the life of the denomination. The Recorder and the other religious newspapers, which were finally merged in The Congregationalist, were begun for the same reason and purpose. Congregationalists took pride in their literature. They felt that it was absolutely essential to their success. They loved their benevolent societies. They were zealous to see that these societies were effectively manned and carried on. Many of our ablest men and women willingly spent money and time to attend the annual meetings of these bodies and to bring back the influence of them to the local churches. They felt that the business of these bodies was their business and dependent on them. They studied the accounts of it with personal interest, as men who own stocks study the reports of the markets.

If Trinitarian Congregationalists felt dissatisfied with the management of any of their societies they did not on that account abandon their interest, but sought to improve the management. Their denomination was to them the most important work in advancing the kingdom of God, because it was the work which God had intrusted to them. The reports of its progress and of the welfare of the churches, the discussion of its principles and the record of its life from week to week were matters with which they were deeply concerned. They valued their denominational newspapers as essential to the growth of the work they loved, and ministers and laymen thought it for their own highest interest to extend the circulation of these papers. Among the topics of pulpit and prayer meeting which attracted most attention were the denominational work and life which they shared and the relation of these to the whole kingdom of God.

These statements were not applicable by any means to all Congregational ministers or laymen, but their application to many will be recognized at once by those who were familiar with the leaders of the last generation. To the men and women of that spirit is mainly due the strength of Congregationalism today. If that spirit had been more general our denomination would now be much larger and more influential for good than it is. The so-called liberality which ignores it is not genuine devotion to God or his truth. The usefulness of Congregationalists in spreading the spirit of Christ, in maintaining integrity in the nation and in regenerating men will depend much on their loyalty to the trusts assumed by them as members of their own denomination.

ON GIVING.

To one who in the opening days of the year is seriously considering his Christian duties, none can come home with greater force than that of benevolence. To ignore this obligation or to dismiss it with a hasty thought is disloyalty to Christ and does injustice to one's own spiritual life. What a blessed thing it would be if, during these initial weeks of 1897, all Christian men and women should sit quietly down and plan their contributions to religious objects as carefully as they make provision for the sustenance of their families!

This matter of giving is not a question of much or little. It is one of system and conscientious purpose. It is not to be settled by comparison with a neighbor's practice, nor by imagining what one would do if he had the income which came to him five years ago, or which he hopes to have five years hence. Neither is it a question primarily as to the special objects to which one will give. That phase of the subject certainly deserves careful attention. After one has made up his mind about how much he will give, to divide his little or his much among the many claimants upon it fairly and wisely is a necessary and important task. This task raises certain perplexing problems, but is wonderfully instructive and profitable.

But back of all considerations regarding the method and the destination of one's gifts are the central and determinative questions, how much ought I to give in this year of grace 1897 to the Lord's work, in what ratio to my family and personal expenses should my benevolences stand, am I giving anything like what God, who knows my financial condition, expects me to give? Until one faces such questions as these he has not begun to understand the doctrine and the principle of Christian stewardship—a doctrine which we believe is to receive such honor in the Church of Christ in the next half-century as was never before accorded it.

The simple fact is that a Christian, by the obligations which he takes upon himself, becomes a partner in Christ's work in the world. It is no more the duty of one man to go to Oklahoma or Turkey to establish and build up Christianity there than it is for another, who turns aside from special Christian work to enter business or a profession, to make the proceeds of that calling, nay, the very calling itself, serve the ends of the kingdom. As Mr. Wilder of the Student Volunteers used to put it: "The missionary movement takes hold of every Christian, and in the language of the highwayman says, 'Your money or your life.'" No one thing is delaying the progress of the kingdom in the world today more than the lack of funds. "The saddest of all cries that come to us from the foreign field," said Dr. Farnsworth last week, "are those which tell of work hindered and set back by the order for retrenchment."

In this age, with the opportunities confronting the church everywhere, what Christian who tarries at home while his brethren go to the dark places of the earth can minimize his responsibility for furnishing them with a proper equipment for their work? Their work, did we say? It is not more their work than it is his work. We are not pleading for the devotion of a tenth or a twentieth or any specific percentage of one's income to the work of Christ. But in view of the tremendous urgency of the situation at home and abroad, we beseech Christian men and women everywhere not to let this month of January pass without giving solemn consideration to the Christian duty of giving, to face that duty joyously, to take it up not as a burden but as a glorious privilege. To be known by Christ and by men as a generous giver, as one who gives "until it hurts and then gives again until it doesn't hurt"—is there a better resolution than this which we can make for the new year?

THE QUESTION OF PARTNERSHIP.

The term partnership suggests that side of spiritual life which is apt to be too much disregarded. It is a common error to think chiefly of one's own salvation and too little of one's religious relations and obligations to others. But Christ's demand is that each of us enter into partnership with him and with all who are engaged in doing his will. Moreover, to be hostile, or even indifferent to him naturally involves one more or less consciously in partnership with his opponents. In either case the lack of formal articles of partnership makes no vital difference. The union exists, is evident, in some degree at the least, and is conceded generally.

Partnership involves placing one's self under the influence of one's partners. They must be consulted. Their experience must be deferred to, their opinions weighed and their objections heeded. The power of purely individual judgment and action necessarily is surrendered. One partner may have, and rightly, a more controlling influence than his associates, yet neither he nor they are independent. It also involves the recognition of each other's rights. Their mutual obligations are not sentimental but actual. Each not only may, but must, aim to promote the interests of the others as truly as his own. Earthly law provides definite penalties for deliberate failure in this particular, although for men of honor no such provision is necessary. Partnership also involves hearty co-operation. Each partner may superintend some special department of the common business, but all must labor zealously for mutual success.

All this is equally true of spiritual partnership, whether for good or evil. The suggestion is enough. To explain in detail would be superfluous here. It is more important, especially now in the beginning of the year, to raise certain questions for sober reflection. Am I in partnership with Jesus Christ or with his foes? What does this fact of spiritual partnership mean to me? How does the influence of my spiritual partners affect me, and how much is my influence worth to them? Do I duly recognize their rights over me? Am I co-operating with them loyally for their highest good and my own? Can I be of better use to them in any way? Ought I to change my partnership, so as to make it clear to the world that Christ and his followers, and not his enemies, are my partners?

CURRENT HISTORY.

Anglo-American Peace.

Jan. 11, 1897, will ever be considered a great epoch-marking day in the history of men. Then it was that Richard Olney, our Secretary of State, and Sir Julian Pauncefoote, representing the United States and Great Britain, signed a treaty, which, if ratified by our Senate, will bind the two great Powers and kindred peoples "to submit to arbitration . . . all questions in difference between them which they may fail to adjust by diplomatic negotiation." We find nothing in the text of the treaty itself which excludes from its scope so-called questions "involving national honor or sovereignty." Disputes arising over pecuniary claims not exceeding $500,000 will be settled by a tribunal of three arbitrators, each nation having one representative, and a majority verdict being final. Disputes arising over pecuniary claims exceeding $500,000 will be settled by a tribunal similarly constituted, but if their verdict is not unanimous, then it must be submitted to a new tribunal of five jurists, a majority of whom will decide. All questions involving territoriality are to be submitted to a tribunal of six members, three of them United States Supreme or Circuit Court judges and three judges of highest British courts, a majority of five to one being necessary to make their award final, but an award by less than this majority will also be final if the award is not protested within three months; and in any case "there shall be no recourse to hostile measures of any description until the mediation of one or more friendly powers has been invited by one or both of the high contracting parties." In all cases of inability of the representatives of each country to agree upon an umpire—that is, a third or fifth member of the tribunals constituted to pass upon pecuniary claims—King Oscar of Sweden and Norway shall appoint the umpire. The treaty will remain in force five years, and one year after notice is given by either party that it desires to terminate the same. May it remain in force forever!

President Cleveland, in sending the treaty to the Senate, sent with it a message, in which he said, what will be generally conceded, that > it is apparent that the treaty which has been formulated not only makes war between the parties to it a remote possibility, but precludes those fears and rumors of war which of themselves too often assume the proportions of a national disaster. It is eminently fitting as well as fortunate that the attempt to accomplish results so beneficial should be initiated by kindred peoples, speaking the same tongue, and joined together by all the ties of common traditions, common institutions and common aspirations.

> The experiment of substituting civilized methods for brute force as the means of settling international questions of right will thus be tried under the happiest auspices. Its success ought not to be doubtful, and the fact that its ultimate ensuing benefits are not likely to be limited to the two countries immediately concerned should cause it to be promoted all the more eagerly.
> The example set and the lesson furnished by the successful operation of this treaty are sure to be felt and taken to heart sooner or later by other nations, and will thus mark the beginning of a new epoch in civilization.

The Supreme Court and the Lottery Law.

We had supposed, and the opinion was more than local we are sure, that present Federal legislation against the lottery was flawless, and surely but slowly putting an end to the evil. A decision of the United States Supreme Court just announced shatters this complacent feeling, and in the opinion of the assistant attorney general, who represented the government, calls for new legislation if the Federal officials are to cope successfully with lottery agents. As far as we can judge from the brief abstract of the decision made public, the court holds that if, after a lottery has been drawn, messengers carrying papers and books used in the drawing are detected and arrested they cannot be prosecuted, "for the language as used in the statute-books looks to the future," that is, the Government, to proceed legally, must collect its evidence before or during a drawing, not after. This would seem to be one of those technical decisions which do so much to create the popular impression that courts delight to split hairs and care more for the letter than the spirit of a law.

Versatile Yet Thorough.

General Francis A. Walker, who died so suddenly last week, was a very unusual man. He inherited his ability from his father, Hon. Amasa Walker, and was as eminent an economist in his day as his father was in his. He was a gallant Federal officer of high rank in the Civil War, and a historian of that period of our history who erred only in the modest references he made to his own record. He was a statistician so broad and thorough in his work that those who have followed him in collecting and analyzing the Federal statistics have been forced to pay homage to his wisdom. He was an administrator and educator of the highest rank, developing the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, of which he was president, so that it has few peers and no superiors at home or abroad. He endeared himself as a man to all who met him in the classroom or at conferences of educators. He was a citizen who served loyally on many commissions—national, State and municipal—charged with serious duties and grave responsibilities. He was a social being, popular at clubs, much sought after as a speaker, ever desirous of keeping in touch with his fellowmen. A gentleman and a scholar, he also was a democrat and patriot. Few men in New England could have died whose departure would have called forth more sincere sorrow, and his funeral in Trinity Church was a striking gathering of eminent men delegated to represent the most learned and useful societies and institutions of New England and the nation. General Walker's father and his uncle were two of the founders of the Union Church, North Brookfield, with which church he himself united in 1857.

A Sign of Decadence.

Captain Chapman of the New York police force, now being tried before the police commissioners for assuming authority to act where it is asserted that he had no legal authority, may be convicted of a technical error, but no such verdict should obscure the distinct public service he has rendered in showing to the American people what nether depths some rich men of this country have touched in their search for something to drive away ennui and gratify their lusts. Here is the evidence, which shows how the heirs of good men squander money which they have not earned, and of which they know not the value. Here is the evidence of how many women there are who traffic in their bodily charms, and share their profits with even baser men. Here is the damning proof of what some men, typical men, too, consider a proper feast to give to one about to wed. Alas! New York is not unique in this respect. It has more of it, because there center the idle rich and the panderers to vice, but the virus is everywhere. The cry is now for a revival of intolerance of impurity and easy living, for less breadth and more depth, for increased differentiation between worldliness and godliness.

The Outlook for Cuba.

The venality of the Spanish officials in Cuba and their incapacity as administrators is being denounced severely by Spanish journalists. Semi-official news from Madrid indicates that Spain has sought to get from our Administration a statement of its scheme of Cuban reforms, and has found that genuine home rule is meant, not merely administration reforms such as have just been offered to Porto Rico. Senator-elect Money of Mississippi, who has just returned from a tour of investigation in Cuba, discounts General Weyler's boasts, and predicts a victory for the rebels.

State versus Church in Canada.

Sir Charles Tupper's speech in London, asserting that the United States is bent on stealing Canada, is the whine of a disgruntled and shelved leader and counts as such with intelligent Canadians and Englishmen. The decision of the court that priestly interference with electors in Three Rivers vitiates its recent selection of a member of Parliament, and necessitates a new election, is due to a capital law and a brave judge. As a precedent it will go far toward offsetting the schemes of the priests and Conservative politicians. Premier Laurier, addressing his constituents in Quebec last week, showed that he fearlessly faces the issue now raised and will not retreat under pressure. He defended the Manitoba compromise, deprecated the growth of factionalism, pleaded for harmony among Canadians of all races and faiths in promoting commercial prosperity, and refused to be drawn into a controversy over "mere words." On the other hand, he affirmed: "I will labor all my lifetime for the triumph of civil liberty and clerical noninterference in matters political." A most significant battle is on in Canada, and the omens are propitious for a triumph of liberty of thought and speech to be won by Roman Catholic laymen fighting against men not content with spiritual authority.

Cecil Rhodes Is Defiant.

Cecil Rhodes, South Africa's most imposing political figure, is now en route to London, there to appear before a commission charged with the duty of investigating, among other things, his share of responsibility in the Jameson raid against the Transvaal. His trip from the interior to the coast and his reception in Cape Town have been so redolent with adulation that he seems to have lost his head, for the tone of his speeches just before sailing for London was such as to grieve his friends and astound his fellow-Britons. Contempt and defiance for those who will investigate and judge him, unconcealed greed for all territory in South Africa now non-British, and thinly veiled hints that if he is disciplined then South Africa may cease to be British and become independent, such were the main features of his remarks. No wonder President Kruger of the Transvaal feels that he has been justified in discounting British pretensions and in preparing for the worst. Whether Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, colonial secretary, and the English public will take Mr. Rhodes at his own valuation remains to be seen. Rev. J. Guinness Rogers, in the London Independent, says that Rhodes will not be so received. Dukes and millionaires and a venal press will fight desperately for him, however, for if he goes down he can take many others with him.

India's Famine.

The Secretary of State for India has at last consented to let British sympathy for the sufferers flow forth in a tangible way and the subscription lists are now open in London. The British public is at last awake to the fact that its officials in India either have not realized the magnitude of the crisis they were facing or, realizing it, have not dared to confess their incapacity in dealing with it. That there have been rains of late doubtless increases the likelihood of larger food supplies many months hence, but it does not fill the millions of stomachs that are empty now. Bombay is not far from a state of panic, with a demoralized police force and a rate of mortality which is awful to contemplate. Nor is the outlook bright for communities to which the residents of Bombay have been fleeing, for some of them surely will have in them the germs of the deadly bubonic fever.

We cited last week correspondence from an American in India telling of unrest and secret revolt against British rule. None of this, of course, is reflected in the resolutions of the Indian Congress, reports of which are just at hand, but the British press is calling attention to the fact that Lord Roberts, who served in the Indian mutiny and rose to high rank in the British army through valor and administrative skill while a soldier in India, says, in his recently published autobiography, that "the signs of the spirit of unrest and discontent which sowed the seeds of Indian mutiny are being revived," owing to glaring faults of administration.

NOTES.

The recent election of senators in France resulted in marked gains for the moderate Republicans and corresponding losses for Radicals and Conservatives. It is a wholesome sign of the stability of the republic and a recession of the wave of Socialism.

Mr. Bryan's speech and President Cleveland's letter do not indicate that Jackson's political disciples are in agreement in their interpretation of Jackson's message for his own age or this; and the pronunciamento of the Populist national committee clearly shows that the fusion of 1896 is not likely to be repeated in 1900.

The multiplication of suicides recently among men holding responsible, semi-public, fiduciary positions may have suggested that portion of the inaugural of Governor Wolcott of Massachusetts, in which he urges legislation prohibiting all such men from speculation in stocks while serving institutions, which, in turn, are servants of the people. Boston's reputable business men indorse the scheme.

Governor Wolcott of Massachusetts's report on the sale of liquor within the commonwealth is far more satisfactory reading than the references of the governors of New Hampshire and Maine to the same subject. Under Massachusetts local option law the law is enforced, and the area over which it is operative is slowly but surely increasing. In New Hampshire and Maine it would seem to be otherwise. Governor Wolcott is against local option in wards or sections of cities.

For the defeat of Mr. Addicks's scheme to buy one of Delaware's seats in the United States Senate, good men everywhere render thanks, but for "Boss" Quay's victory in the Pennsylvania Republican caucus there can be naught but sorrow. The very fact that Mr. Penrose is a graduate of Harvard, a man trained by study at Johns Hopkins, and an author of economic works, makes him the more dangerous because subservient to a "boss" who is ever seeking to promote personal ends, not the public good.

Thus far the hearings on the tariff before the House Committee have done little more than show the cupidity of claimants for protection and the apparently irreconcilable differences of opinion between producers of raw material and manufacturers of it. Partisanship and sectionalism had little opportunity for raising their heads during the debates in the House last week, and as a consequence there have been careful discussions of the Loud Bill, limiting second-class mail matter, and the Powers Bill, providing for a funding of the debts of the Pacific railroads. The defeat of the latter, by a vote of 102 to 167, will probably force the Government to foreclose on its second mortgages, and may in the end lead to governmental management and ownership.

IN BRIEF.

In answer to questions—the story in last week's issue, "For Tom," is a true story.

The latest strike in Omaha, it is safe to say, will bring little public sympathy for the strikers. The drivers of an express company struck on account of a rule of the company forbidding them to use intoxicating liquor. It is a satisfaction to know that the places they left vacant were promptly filled.

Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler was born seventy-five years ago last Sunday. He celebrated the anniversary last Saturday. By pen and voice he keeps on preaching the gospel to a multitude who value his ministrations as much as they were ever valued. May his years of usefulness on earth still be many.

Some of the officials of the Smithsonian Institution who received courtesies from the sultan of Turkey in 1895 are now sending to that ruler "a magnificent life-size figure of a Sioux chief in full regalia." If the chief is represented as scalping a victim we can see the propriety of the gift.

This is to be remembered in discussing the growth of large fortunes in this country—many of them are nominal, not real. Thus the late Austin Corbin when he lived and when he died was supposed to be a multi-millionaire. His heirs will be fortunate if they ultimately realize a quarter of a million.

The contributions during the two months' Moody meetings in Carnegie Hall, New York, amounted to $2,604.87. Of this Mr. Moody said that $1,822.61 was paid for rent and printing and the remainder was used in distributing literature to prisoners. We hope the Tremont Temple meetings will yield a still larger sum.

Advance sheets of the British Congregational Year-book for 1897 show that there are now 2,867 ministers in England and Wales, 2,188 of whom are pastors actively engaged, and the number of churches and mission stations is 4,607. Scotland has 187 churches and 201 clergymen; Ireland twenty-seven churches and twenty-eight clergymen.

The various branches of the Salvation Army seem to have been so successful as to call for the organization of a "Salvation Navy." At any rate, a church in the form of a gospel ship is to be built in Chicago, in which religious services are to be held, and there are to be naval cadets and a naval band. The rudder of that ship ought to be carefully constructed.

The Volunteers of America go a step farther toward being a church than the Salvation Army from which they sprang. A member may be baptized and may partake of the Lord's Supper if he chooses. But he may be a member without either. A step more and Volunteers might become in this respect obedient disciples of Him who said, "This do in remembrance of me."

It is a secular paper, the Beverly Evening Times, which pronounces this judgment on those huge bundles of literary miscellanies known as the Sunday newspaper:

> To read those now published one would think that a large part of the world had gone to the devil and that it was the chief end of modern journalism—on Sunday morning—to show those who hadn't the way.

The late Dr. A. B. Robbins, a leading citizen for fifty years of Muscatine, Io., whose picture we published last week, was an uncommonly good reader of Scripture. One of his parishioners used to say that he could sit all day and hear Dr. Robbins read David's Psalms or Paul's Epistles. What a splendid opportunity for impressing truth the preacher possesses in the Scripture lesson of the day!

Despite the pinch of hard times the Protestant religious press of the country continues to evolve and better its service to the churches and individuals. The Northwestern Christian Advocate of Chicago and the Western Christian Advocate of Cincinnati came to us last week in new and attractive typography, with smaller page and larger type; and the Presbyterian Journal of Philadelphia likewise has what printers call "a new dress."

The Herald and Presbyter points out the weakness of Congregational polity by citing the case of Dr. C. O. Brown. It says: "No one is entitled to speak for the public and to declare that the Iowa church sinned in calling him. Under Congregational polity it had a right to call him." The argument of our contemporary is as valuable as the news on which it is based. Who else has heard that an Iowa church has called Dr. Brown?

Isaac Rich Hall, formerly the Mt. Vernon Church, now the headquarters of the law department of Boston University, was dedicated last week. Hon. Oliver Wendell Holmes of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts delivering the oration. Our hope is that the students of the law school in some very real way may breathe in the gospel which Drs. Kirk and Herrick used to preach, while they are studying law within walls that formerly echoed to songs, prayers and exhortation.

Ever since the admission of Kansas into the union its State officers, when inaugurated, have kissed a copy of the Bible. The Populists, who came into power last week, have done a sensible thing in abolishing this custom, which was likely to promote irreverence, especially if the Kansas copy is as shabby and dirty as those sometimes found in public buildings. If the members of the new State government shall obey the principles of the Bible, they will do well in substituting that service for the lip service on its covers.

President Tucker of Dartmouth College contributes an interesting reminiscence of the lamented General Francis A. Walker. "In the last conversation which I had with him," says President Tucker, "as the subject of national independence came up, he said, 'If the liberty of Switzerland or Holland were invaded I would shoulder my musket in a minute.'" Thus does the spirit of liberty and democracy break forth and serve notice that Americans of the highest type will not suffer tyranny to be re-established on the continent of Europe, not to mention South America.

We learn with deep regret that the illness of Dr. M. M. G. Dana, who has been confined to his bed since Christmas Day, continues critical. He rallied slightly last week, but is again losing ground. His physicians hold out no hope of his recovery, but may be able to retard the end. Many of the churches of Brooklyn, where he is residing, have sent to him floral gifts and expressions of sympathy, and anxious inquiries have come from his former parishes and from many friends. His mind is clear and both he and his family are grateful for the many assurances they have received of affectionate remembrance.

The man who, at the enthronement of Rev. Dr. Frederick Temple as Archbishop of Canterbury and primate of all England last week, cried out, "It is a fraud," was not so far wrong. Legally, of course, Dr. Temple is all that he claims to be, but the formulæ in which his ecclesiastical standing is set forth assert that he was chosen by his fellow-churchmen, guided by the Holy Spirit. As a matter of fact, he is what he is simply by the appointment of worldly state officials, and the minor ecclesiastics know it, and in a very real sense "consent to a lie," whereby they bring religion into disrepute and set up an ethical standard which does not ring true.

The editor of the Christian Advocate some time ago made a careful investigation of many cases of persons who had tried the Keeley cure for drunkenness. He found that fifty per cent. of those cured held out nine months, but he has discovered an editorial in that paper, written about seventy years ago, claiming that Dr. Chambers's Remedy for Intemperance would cure 99 cases out of 100, whence the editor concludes that there are hundreds of secret, infallible cures for drunkenness, most of which have had their day and been forgotten, while drunkenness still increases. Total abstinence is the one sure cure, and the time to begin taking it is before the disease appears.

It is good to see Barna S. Snow, the affable secretary of the Boston Seaman's Friend Society, again at his desk in the Congregational House, after an absence of nearly a year on account of illness. A portion of his work in the interval has been efficiently performed by John G. Pollard of Woburn. The society, by the way, has not passed through the hard times without undergoing a large and crippling shrinkage in receipts. This is the time of year when the sailor on the wintry sea ought to receive the special thought of persons comfortably housed on land, and such provision for his safety and happiness when in port as this society makes should be generously sustained.

We deprecated, the other day, the custom of candidating in connection with filling the pastoral vacancy. A correspondent wants to know what better method exists, and adds the question, "Is time gained by hearing some one you can't have?" We did not intend to intimate that delay should be caused by becoming interested in unavailable men, but we think that time will be saved in the long run by shutting off a stream of candidates who are almost always sure to divide the preferences of the congregation, besides encouraging in them a critical attitude. Let a competent committee hear, in some other pulpit, the man or men under consideration, or, better yet, in case they are pastors, let the committee journey to the places where they live and hear them in their ordinary surroundings and under normal conditions.

Ian Maclaren was interviewed by The British Weekly as soon as he ran down to London the Monday after his arrival in Liverpool, and the interviewer describes him as appearing as if "he had spent the last three months in deep repose and idleness." Dr. Watson speaks with delight of his experiences at Yale. He says of his audiences here, that "with such hearers a man can hardly fail to do his best"; that the scene outside the Congregational church in Appleton, Wis., when he preached there reminded him of a Highland sacrament; that he found our journalists a most agreeable class of men; that our women's manners are charming. Two interesting statements also are made. Prof. George P. Fisher of Yale Divinity School has the books from which Ian Maclaren read when here, for which other men offered large sums, and Miss Alice Longfellow gave to Ian Maclaren the manuscript of an article by her father, with Burns as its theme.

Two long-forgotten but heroic early missionaries of the American Board, who went out to labor among the Cherokees in 1821, were recalled to memory by Mr. M. M. Folsom, in an interesting article in the New York Evening Post of Jan. 2. Their remains lie near Coosa, in Floyd County, Ga., and this is the inscription on the stone which stands over the only grave which is marked:

MRS. ESTHER BUTLER,

Wife of Doct. Elizur Butler
Was born in South Canaan, Conn.
Sept. 15, 1798;
Joined the Mission Among the Cherokees,
Under the A. B. C. F. M. Jan. 1821; and after Nearly Eight Years of Exemplary Piety
And Devotedness to the Missionary Work,
Died in the Triumph of Christian Faith
Nov. 21, A. D. 1829, Aged 31 Years.
"Oh, Grave, where is thy victory?"
"Thanks be to God which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."
1 Corr. xv, 55–57.

Dr. Butler fought for the Cherokees against the cupidity of the white settlers and suffered four years' imprisonment in a penitentiary because of his pertinacity in fighting for his Indian converts' rights. Mrs. Butler died while her husband was in the penitentiary at Milledgeville. They must have been among the first of that long procession of New Englanders who from time to time have given their efforts, and in some cases their lives, to help uplift the South.

At the annual meeting of the Massachusetts Cremation Society last week it was stated that during the past year there have been 137 incinerations under the rules and care of the society, a gain of fifty per cent. over the record of any other year; that relatives frequently deliberately ignore the wishes of the dead respecting cremation and bury when the last will and testament orders cremation; that, under almost all conditions, the rights to the last sacrament is denied such Roman Catholics as uphold cremation. Mrs. Margaret Deland, the novelist, is one of the directors of this society.

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE

FROM NEW YORK.

Commemorative Service.

The Broadway Tabernacle's Wednesday evening meeting this week was made commemorative of the late Mr. Austin Abbott, since 1871 one of its most loyal and efficient members, and for much of that time one of its deacons. Dr. Lyman Abbott, feeling in the Tabernacle's atmosphere of home at liberty to speak freely of his brother, whom all there knew, went back to the early Maine life of the family, the coming of the three brothers to this city, the graduation from the New York University, the partnership in the practice of law, the deceased brother's various forms of help to the speaker during and after his change to the ministerial life, and continued to the end. The simple narrative, known by all to be strictly truthful, deeply touched the hearers' hearts.

Chancellor McCracken of the university, starting with the life of Mr. Abbott when a member of college, dwelt upon his honorable career as student of law until he came to be the acknowledged authority on legal decisions and all questions involving intimate knowledge of law literature. The chancellor closed with grateful acknowledgment of Mr. Abbott's services as dean of the University Law School, which he in large measure reorganized, enlarged and strengthened, and in which his wise and helpful instructions stimulated and brought out of the students the best that was in them. Dr. William H. Thomson, representing the church into which he came ten years before Mr. Abbott and of which he is now the senior deacon, spoke of his late associate as a member and officer of the church, paying honest, loving tribute to his loyal constancy, zeal and devotion to the interests and work of the church to the latest hour of his life. So, one after another, our best and strongest helpers are passing beyond. But it is comforting to see that they and their work are lovingly remembered.

Evangelistic.

Since Mr. Moody closed his series here, meetings have been kept up in Cooper Union under the lead of Rev. A. C. Dixon of Brooklyn, with singing by Mr. Sankey. They have been well attended, and the interest is growing and as many as fifty sometimes rise for prayer. Dr. Dixon is also to keep up the Sunday services in Carnegie Hall.

The Evangelical Alliance's union Week of Prayer services have also been well attended. One of them, being of a missionary character, was led by Dr. Leonard of this city and Dr. J. L. Barton of Boston. Dr. Buckley and Rev. W. G. Puddefoot spoke on home missions at the Friday evening session. The ladies of the Christian Union have also held daily prayer meetings in the Broadway Tabernacle lecture-room, one of which was addressed by Mrs. Ballington Booth.

A Salvation Army worker from Chicago gave at the headquarters on Wednesday evening a realistic, perhaps too realistic, exhibition by way of illustrating his discourse upon Satan and his machinations. His advertisement that he was "going to burn the devil" brought a protest from the insurance people, and the plan was modified, not enough, however, to prevent danger to the building, since the effigy of the evil one did take fire and create alarm in the minds of the hundreds drawn to the building by a street parade and show before the lecture. By the light of a red fire display, the members of the effigy were dissected, described and commented upon, one by one, the heart representing deceit; the intestines were a string of whisky bottles and tobacco pipes; his tail was made of playing cards tied end to end, and the backbone was a representation of Colonel Ingersoll. There may be people whom such a show would profit, but somehow the account does not read well.

The Modern Juggernaut.

Not aged, lame, near-sighted and otherwise infirm men and women alone, but the people generally, are getting more and more out of patience with our street cable-car system. It works rapidly when it works at all and doesn't take a fancy to stop and line up a string of cars several blocks long, filled with disgusted citizens belated for dinner, or, worse still (as it has done several times within the last week or two), when it chooses to take the bits (or cable) in its teeth and run amuck while the fit lasts, smashing into car after car ahead and stacking up scores of innocent and helpless passengers upon the floors. To add to the misery, the cable can't wait for a passenger to get on or off. When one intending to enter grasps the handle and is trying to set one lame foot upon the step the signal is given to go ahead, and the car goes ahead fiercely, dragging the poor victim by one hand and arm over the muddy pavement until some chance stops the car or the exhausted would be passenger drops into the mud. Scores of thronged street crossings that were dangerous enough before have been made doubly so by the flying cable cars.

Apropos, a good Baptist pastor in Brooklyn has just had to leave his charge, the running of trolly roads on two sides of the church building having unfitted it for Sunday service.

All this is preliminary to the glad announcement that at length two fair trials have been made of cars run by the long talked of "compressed air motor," claimed to be perfectly controllable and as free from danger as the other is full of it. The experiments so far have seemed to justify all that is claimed for the new power. It moves the car with sufficient rapidity and ease, not snapping some one's head off at every turn, it needs no special skill in "the man at the wheel," and is not expensive. So there is room to hope that it may soon come into use.

Personal.

Rev. President Raymond of Union College has preached for the Broadway Tabernacle people for several Sundays, and is expected to continue the service for some Sundays to come. Prof. George Frederick Wright addressed the Clerical Union last week on The Antiquity of Man.

Our beloved Dr. Cobb, young and agile as he is, was not far-sighted enough to see coming around a corner ahead of him while crossing the street a reckless cabman, whose mind was doubtless absorbed in the "strike" with which his belligerent clan are now tormenting the city. So the doctor received from the dashing vehicle a stunning blow that came near to proving very serious. The good news from Baltimore about the Stickney bequest, however, has so far restored him that he is at work with his usual vigor and cheer.

HUNTINGTON.

FROM THE INTERIOR.

Sunday Evening Lectures.

Following the example of Dr. Noble, who has already announced a series of twelve lectures on topics of commanding importance to the thinking world, President Harper and Dr. Hillis have arranged for a course of lectures at Central Music Hall on the general subject, Life After Death. They are to be given by professors in the University of Chicago and in our various theological seminaries. The first lecture, last Sunday evening, by Prof. A. W. Small, was on The Influence of Thought upon Life and Conduct. The music was an attractive feature. In spite of the rain the hall was comfortably filled. While admitting the influence of physical conditions in the making of character, it was affirmed that its influence is not paramount, but that ideas make the world; that, while a good body is important, and that increased knowledge will undoubtedly give the world better bodies than the members of the most enlightened nations now possess, thought will still maintain its prominence. Hitherto religious thought has been the chief organizing power. Indications are that patriotism, literature and science will also influence communities and nations. The thoughts of our predecessors should be studied. The wealth of unrealized thought which we inherit should be changed into action. We must take the thought of an immortal life into our reckoning. For the questions of life are: When shall we live? How shall we live? Who shall live?

Pardon of Criminals.

Governor Altgeld is signalizing the last days of his power as chief magistrate of Illinois by turning loose upon society a large number of criminals, some of them criminals of the worst sort. Tuesday he opened the prison doors to twenty-six, among them half a score of murderers and the notorious McGrath who for years had been the terror of Chicago police. He has commuted the sentence of the Meadowcroft Brothers, bankers, who, it may be remembered, were convicted of having received deposits after they knew that their bank was insolvent, to a confinement of sixty days in the county jail! While in some instances there may be a reason for pardoning men and women, it is hard to see any reason for the course which Governor Altgeld has pursued. He seems to take it for granted that the man who prospers, who is law abiding and a friend of righteousness, ought not to ask for protection against thieves or murderers. In his last message some suggestions which he offered as to the inequalities of law should be remedied at once, but to the larger number of his recommendations it is certain no heed will be given. The inauguration of Mr. Tanner will furnish us a governor of an entirely different character from the one now about to retire; whether better or worse, few would venture to predict. At present there is excitement, not only in Springfield, but throughout the State, over the nomination of a senator. Alderman Madden, against whom the municipal voters' league is protesting, seems most likely to win. It is a pity that a State like Illinois, with so many men in it who would honor the Senate by their presence, should not be represented by a man of the highest qualifications both of mind and character. At present we seem to be powerless to select such a man. The politicians rule and naturally they favor men who will not fail to protect their interests.

The Failure of the Alpha Club.

Friends of young women were surprised to read Thursday morning that the Alpha Club and Working Girls' Home had gone into the hands of a receiver. This club has been directed by Mrs. Laura M. Thomas, its founder and from the first its general manager. Inability to meet the rent of the rooms occupied was the immediate cause of the assignment, although hard times and diminution of patronage have seriously lessened receipts. The club has been a great boon to working girls. They have been able to secure good food at cost, a lodging for twenty-five cents a night and instruction in various branches of study for ten cents a lesson, and at the same time to enjoy all the comforts and refining influences of a cultivated home. Mrs. Thomas has been a true friend to the girls who have sought her aid. With thirty girls at present living in the home and a large membership, which at times has reached eight hundred, it is hoped that some way will be discovered by which the club will be permitted to continue its good work.

Suicide of W. A. Hammond.

Everybody was startled at the news of Mr. Hammond's death. Among business men he had maintained his usual calm exterior, but at home and among a few intimate friends he gave evidence of the intense mental strain he was undergoing. There can be no doubt that he was not in his right mind when he threw himself into the lake. It is now reported that depositors of the bank of which he was the active manager will receive a first dividend of fifty per cent., and that with the sale of the assets of the bank they will undoubtedly be paid in full. Not a few on the streets are asking if it were necessary to break a bank with such assets at its disposal as this one had, if it would not have been wiser to have aided it through its straits rather than have closed its doors and thus have taken from scores of stockholders their only means of support? There are hints of underhanded proceedings which may yet explain what to many now seems dark. It is certain that universal sympathy is felt for Mrs. Hammond and her children, and for the friends of the man whose sensitiveness to public criticism was so keen that he took his own life to escape it.

Three Great Bequests.

The Chicago of the present generation owes a debt of gratitude to the men who provided so generously for the Newberry Library, already in some departments one of the best equipped libraries in the country; for the Crerar Library, whose doors will soon be open to the public; and for the Gilpin Library, which is purely historical, and which has been rendered possible by the thoughtful beneficence of Mr. Henry Gilpin, late of Philadelphia. It was through the accumulations of his gift that the present convenient and attractive library building, recently dedicated, was erected and made a part of the commanding structure now belonging to the Historical Society. We are glad to add that the treasures of the Field Museum, the Art Institute and the existence of several institutions of learning are evidence that not a few men of wealth among us have chosen to administer upon their estates while still alive and able to select the channels along which their gifts shall flow.

Week of Prayer.

In nearly all the churches attendance has been encouraging. In some of them it has been very large, and with a manifestation of interest which will undoubtedly require a continuance of the meetings through at least another week. Pastors certainly have been faithful in their preaching, and have been hoping and praying for a great ingathering during this month and the next. As might have been expected, the interest has been relatively greater in the smaller and the mission churches than in the larger and independent churches. It is not so easy to reach a membership of a thousand or even of half a thousand as it is a membership of fifty or a hundred.

Chicago, Jan. 9. FRANKLIN.

DEACON DUDLEY'S SUNDAYS IN BOSTON.

I.

BY ALDEN ENDICOTT.

"Hannah," said Deacon Dudley in his most measured tone, "I'm not going to hear Dr. Gordon tomorrow."

He folded his Saturday Transcript with great deliberation, removed his spectacles, wiped them with an assiduity quite uncalled for, then held up their polished surfaces to the softly shaded electric light. But he avoided looking across the table to his wife, who sat reading F. B. Meyer's Christian Living. At first she was too astonished at her husband's announcement to speak. Then her amazement changed to anxiety, and she asked with real solicitude, "Don't you feel well tonight, Jacob?"

"O, yes," he replied, in a half shamefaced way, still intent on rubbing his glasses, "but the fact is I've made up my mind to see something of life in the city this winter."

The humor of this remark was entirely lost upon the worthy couple, well along in the sixties, who had left their simple home in a small inland city for the purpose of spending the winter in Boston. By untiring industry Mr. Dudley had amassed a modest fortune, but increasing riches made no difference in their primitive style of living. The plain, square house, through whose unadorned rooms no childish voices had ever echoed, seemed a fitting shrine for this man of sterling character and irreproachable habits. In her youth Mrs. Dudley was quite a contrast to her unimaginative, methodical husband, but during forty years of married life she had assimilated his ideas till the two were now as much alike as the Cheeryble twins.

From time immemorial Mr. Dudley had been deacon of the church where he lived. He never missed a prayer meeting when at home, and a journey was a rare event. Life ran in narrow grooves. Naturally his theology was a trifle severe in its type. Modern conditions in great cities he knew nothing about. "The masses" had an unmeaning sound to his ears. He had a vague idea that socialism was synonymous with anarchy. He could not conceive a condition of society in which whole sections of a city were unchurched and in which the residents turned Sunday into a holiday.

This winter, after considerable deliberation, the Dudleys decided to spend in Boston. The temporary closing of the home was a great event in their quiet lives. For weeks in advance all the details of their prospective sojourn in the busy metropolis were carefully and prayerfully discussed, especially the question of where they should attend church. Mrs. Dudley shrank from living in a hotel, and when a friend recommended a boarding place within easy reach of the Old South Church the suggestion settled a perplexing problem. To be sure, they knew nothing of the pastor nor the people. But was not the Old South the historic church in the denomination and therefore likely to be a stronghold of orthodox teaching? Sittings were secured immediately upon their arrival in town and for a month they had been enjoying the sermons. The preacher's gown, the ornate architecture and some features of the quartet singing rather troubled these simple, unmusical souls, and they felt shy and embarrassed in the crowd, with no one to speak to them. But barring these trifles they anticipated their Sundays with unaffected pleasure. Great, therefore, was Mrs. Dudley's consternation when her husband announced his intention of not going to his customary place of worship.

"I've been thinking," he continued, with even greater deliberation than before, "that the times are a good deal changed, Hannah."

As this trite statement elicited no reply he went on as if talking to himself and slowly nodding his head by way of emphasis: "Now there's no denying that in these so-called Sunday services here in the Transcript," and he tapped the paper with his glasses, "there are some strange notices. Seems to me there can't be much gospel dispensed in some of the places, but I'd rather like to see for myself. Just listen to this," and he read aloud a few of the more striking notices.

"You don't mean to say, Jacob, that you're going to those Spiritualist places," cried Mrs. Dudley in alarm.

It so happened that on the preceding Sunday several of the boarders had attended an exciting séance, and their experiences, as related at the tea table, had sounded painfully irreverent to provincial ears. In other little ways, too, the Dudleys were realizing the difference between Sunday in a cosmopolitan center and its observance in their own home. At breakfast, for instance, scarcely half a dozen members of the household appeared, and they were armed with Sunday papers. No one seemed to have a settled place of public worship, but each drifted in the direction of the choicest music or other attraction. The crowds which were seen pouring into the Art Museum and Public Library on the Lord's Day was another revelation to the good deacon and his wife. All their notions of what belonged to a proper observance of Sunday had suffered a rude shock during the last month. But Mr. Dudley boldly replied to his wife's question, "Yes, Hannah, to the Spiritualists and the Christian Scientists and the Theosophists and the Trades Unionists, and everything else that professes to hold a meeting on Sunday for the good of mankind."

Mrs. Dudley was aghast. Something of her native spirit revived and she exclaimed, almost with asperity, "Well, Jacob Dudley, if you're determined to go philandering round to all such heathenish places on the holy Sabbath day I'm going with you, that's all!"

As a result of this joint decision they sallied forth the next morning feeling as guilty as a pair of children playing truant. They selected for this first Sunday's jaunt the Ruggles Street Church, solely because they overheard one of the boarders say from behind his Herald, "Mighty fine program at Ruggles Street today. There'll be a big crowd there."

Deacon Dudley argued that where the crowd went he was going, but it must be confessed that both felt a sense of relief when, in reply to a timid question, they were told that it was a Baptist church. The sermon, at least, would be likely to be free from dangerous heresy. As they wended their way to a part of the city evidently inhabited by the "common people," they were surprised to see such a throng pouring into the short street from all directions. Surely all could not be going for the sake of the music, which was reported to be a great "drawing card." Some, like themselves, must be indifferent to the "concord of sweet sounds." Directly opposite the edifice was a large cigar manufactory.

Entering the vestibule a friendly hand was extended in welcome. Another greeting awaited them at the head of the stairs, and still another at the entrance to the main audience-room. What a congregation filled every available space! In the Dudley's home church everybody was on about the same social level and in outward appearance much alike. Here a great diversity was apparent. A few were elegantly and all were respectably clad, but there were little tokens that most of the people came from homes in which it was hard to make both ends meet. Mrs. Dudley detected an odor of the kitchen in the woman at her side. She noticed, too, that some of the children's garments were evidently the cast-off clothing of the rich. No coin larger than a silver quarter appeared on the offertory plate.

There were no hymn-books, but the hymns and the notices for the week were printed on a plain, four page leaflet. There were meetings for mothers, for boys of all ages, for working girls, for reformed men, for little children. Plans for distributing food and clothing to the needy, for teaching cookery and carpentry, were outlined, along with Christian Endeavor and missionary gatherings. Notice of a lunch to be served Sunday noon in the vestry struck them as an odd way of mixing food temporal and spiritual. A dispensary in the rear was another novel feature.

But externals were forgotten as soon as the service opened. Four men appeared in front of the organ, which was placed just behind the minister, and began to sing "Just as I am," with a yearning tenderness which made the tears well up in their eyes. The preacher, a young man, slight in figure, without priestly garb, reverent in manner, magnetic in voice, invoked the divine blessing. More music followed, and a sort of expectant hush settled upon the great congregation. By and by came the sermon, and what a sermon it was! What native eloquence, what depths of spirituality! All listened as if spellbound as he spoke for half an hour, without notes, on the transforming power of Christ's love.

"Who is this pastor?" inquired Mr. Dudley, as they came out.

"Rev. E. D. Burr," was the reply. "He has been here about five years, and they say his congregation and the work carried on here resemble F. B. Meyer's in London. I'm a stranger here, too, but I like the preaching immensely and come often."

As they sat together in the Sunday twilight Deacon Dudley said, reflectively: "I guess, Hannah, there are more ways of preaching the gospel nowadays than we know anything about."

Great Britain and the United States as Affected by the Events of 1896.

By Rev. Alexander Mackennal, D. D., Bowdon, Eng.

The year 1896 closed under very different auspices from those which marked its beginning. Our Christmas festivities in 1895 were shadowed by a fear, not, indeed, so intense as that of 1861, when the Trent difficulty was at its keenest, but having the same tragic element—the dread that Great Britain and the United States might drift into the inexpiable crime of fratricidal war. There were many of us unable to accept the easy optimism which declared such a war impossible. We prayed that it might be made impossible, we believed that it was unlikely, but there are elements in every international problem out of the knowledge, and therefore beyond the calculation, of the private citizen. We Englishmen did not know how far the feeling of your Eastern States represented the whole nation; we knew no more about the counsels which might prevail in our own foreign office, where the traditions of that secret diplomacy that has been the curse of Europe are not yet dead. Our gratitude that a treaty of arbitration concerning Venezuela has been accepted is all the fuller because our apprehensions were so burdensome. And deeper, even, than our satisfaction that this particular complication is on the way to a peaceful settlement is the joy with which we hail a signal triumph of the Puritan—the Christian—sentiment on both sides the Atlantic.

That is what the recent Venezuela agreement means. The first check to an imperious temper came from the pulpits of America and England, and it was decisive. Lord Salisbury and Mr. Cleveland both saw that they had not their people with them. The peoples were for brotherly conciliation, and self-assertion was quelled. The cynic may talk of other influences at work—the panic in Wall Street and the difficulties Great Britain was beset with in Turkey and Egypt. But even the cynic must perceive that the way out of the difficulty was presented by the utterance of Christian conviction, and when the cynic sees that religion and conscience are forces to be relied on he is on the way to be converted. The churches have gained an advantage in the sphere of international politics which it will be their shame not to improve.

The daily and increasing personal intercourse between the citizens of the two countries; the delightful friendships which are thus formed; the worship in each other's churches; the visits paid and the sermons preached by ministers of the various Christian denominations which have a home equally in your land and ours—these things sanctify the Atlantic steam service and make it a messenger of the day of the Lord. Dean Stanley and Phillips Brooks were ministers of one church; Yale students are taught abiding truths by British pastors; the Pan-Anglican Synod, the Presbyterian Alliance, the Ecumenical Methodist Conference, and the Apostolic International Congregational Council have introduced a new condition of things, which wise statesmen will learn to take account of. If blood is thicker than water, religion is stronger than blood, and ours is the religion of Christ. The new comity is "born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God."

It was more than a happy incident, it was a providential blessing, that the visit of the Pilgrims to the old world shrines, where your fathers and ours had suffered and learned so much, was made while the crisis was still impending. The joyousness of your reception, blessing those who gave and those who took, might seem inconsistent with any grave apprehensions in the hearts of either guests or hosts. In reality, the political tension lent a something—a yearning, a tenderness, a solemnity—to our mutual greetings and farewells, a pathos to our social and private prayers, like the blended lights and shadows of the eternal overhanging the scenes of time. You felt it not only in the Memorial Hall, but also in the cathedrals and the deaneries which welcomed you so cordially; it broke from the lips of Mr. Price Hughes and the Episcopalian speakers at Gainsborough as fully and as touchingly as from any of your Congregational brethren.

The prompt and hearty response made by members of the Established Church to the request that they should join us in welcoming you surprised me. I ought not to have been surprised, but I was so. We had never asked a favor for ourselves; when we asked one for our brethren it was given, not as a favor, but with brotherly frankness. International courtesy had something to do with it, the determination to show that the true English feeling toward you was confidence, not jealousy, had more, but the sense of Christian fellowship—the true catholicity—had most of all. I frankly confess that your reception by so many of our national clergy made me ask myself whether we Nonconformists have been wise or right in maintaining, so stiffly as we have done, our proud aloofness; whether that "watchful jealousy," which, many years ago, a wise young statesman declared to be the inevitable feeling produced in Nonconformists by the existence of our Established Church, may not be carried too far.

One of the good results of intercourse between you and us may be to temper the sectarian spirit, both in your land and ours. We cannot feel the same distrust of members of other denominations in foreign countries which we feel toward those in our own. International friendships may teach us to distrust our own suspicions.

The memorial in favor of arbitration sent from the Free Church National Council to the churches of America may prove to be the first of many wholesome interchanges of sentiment between English and American Christians in reference to the larger bearings of Christ's kingdom. I should like to record here my gratitude, not only to the representatives of your churches for the reception they gave that memorial, and their endeavors to circulate it, but also to some of your publicists for their sympathy. It might be unwise to mention names. I will only say that my effort to get our memorial into the White House, accompanied with the explanation that it was not a political document but an address to the churches, was made pleasant by sympathy and counsel from Americans holding high office both at home and here.

Our common interest in Armenia ought not to be passed over in a brief notice of the influences at work this year. One of your lady missionaries deeply moved English audiences by her narrative of the sufferings and patience of your adherents in Armenia. Mr. and Mrs. Rendel Harris are telling us the same things, and also bearing testimony to the confidence in which your missionaries ought to be held, not only for their present work in the relief of suffering, but for their past work also in building up Christian character to martyr fidelity. It will soon dawn on the English mind that, side by side with the Armenian martyrs, as worthy of commemoration, stand the American missionaries who have taught and sustained so many of them.

May I venture one word as to how the assertion—and extension—of the Monroe Doctrine, which Lord Salisbury has accepted, strikes an English Congregationalist? The continental press is furious; the English press has accepted the position calmly. It will increase your influence, it will multiply your responsibilities. You will not be able to hold yourselves detached, as you have hitherto been, from those large imperial questions, those international problems, which have been, for some generations, the burden of Europe. You will be a graver nation as your responsibilities multiply; perhaps you will learn a new sympathy with the perplexities of European nations.

But of most hopeful augury is this—the recognition in Europe that America is a factor in our international politics is simultaneous with the assertion that arbitration instead of war is a possible international policy. Had we fought over your right to speak about the Venezuelan question, the Monroe Doctrine would have been a permanent danger of war to the European states; as it is, it is a promise of world-wide peace. The two nations who have most heartily accepted the principle of arbitration, and that under difficult circumstances, may be glad of any doctrine which brings either of them from seclusion within its own territory into the politics of the world.

THE LITERARY APPROACH TO THE OLD TESTAMENT.

II. THE APPLICATION OF LITERARY PRINCIPLES IN THE STUDY OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

BY PROF. FRANK K. SANDERS, YALE UNIVERSITY.

If the Old Testament is a historic literature, including varying literary types, originating during a long national existence, registering numerous phases of a progressive development, yet expressing throughout all its diversity a set of distinctive, unifying ideas, it follows that a thoroughly satisfactory method of Bible study will take all this into account. The approach to the Old Testament will be a literary pathway. Only to those who enter by this way will the richest treasures of truth be fully disclosed.

The first step forward is to acquire a habit of classification. It is not quite correct to say that there are some twenty-nine independent volumes in the Old Testament. A more satisfactory statement from the literary point of view would be that the Old Testament includes a number of groups of writings, closely allied in form, character and purpose. Each group has an individuality and requires a certain distinctiveness of treatment. One cannot apply the same methods of study to such a history as First Samuel, to such an anthology of devotional poetry as the Psalter and to such a drama as the book of Job.

The second step is to individualize. Each book of the Old Testament is distinctive in some way. It has a certain logical position within its group. To study or even to read the prophetic writings, for instance, in the order in which they are arranged in the English Bible, is to invite confusion of ideas and obscurity. A fundamental preliminary is the arrangement of these utterances in the order of their deliverance, as nearly as this can be done. Some students can do this to their reasonable satisfaction, some cannot; but any one by taking a little time and trouble can arrange the writings in an order which will suffice for working purposes. He may or may not modify his arrangement after independent study. Probably he will, but it will be because of an intelligent use of a true method of study.

Having adjusted the book to its relative place in its appropriate group, it remains for the student to consider its facts from the point of view of the purpose of its writer or compiler, from that of its original audience, and then—and then only—from that of its contribution to the history of the growth of religious ideas. To make these considerations perfectly clear, it will be profitable to examine several representative books of the Old Testament.

We may begin with one that seems perfectly simple—the book of First Samuel. The ordinary biographical method of studying this book is very satisfactory. The biographical element is the prominent one. Our attention is centered upon the leading actors in the drama of Israel's reorganization. The feeble and inefficient Eli, the wise and strong and earnest Samuel, the erratic Saul, the heroic and hopeful David, as well as the knightly Jonathan, the stately Ahimelech, the crafty Doeg, the clever Abigail, are set forth in pen pictures of extraordinary interest. But the moment we ask ourselves "Why was this book written?" we begin to see that it was not written for the primary purpose of giving these biographical facts.

A close consideration of the actual details shows that, as a biographer, the writer was not a success, but a failure. He failed to throw light on most important parts of Samuel's career, neither showing us how Samuel acquired the influence implied by chapter 7, nor explaining how the powerful judge of all Israel could be unknown to the young man Saul, nor making clear how the prophetic order, of which he became the official head [19: 20], came into organized being. Out of the incidents of Saul's long reign he selected for description only six or seven, all but three being related in connection with the career of David. The fact that half of the book (with one-sixth of the time) belongs to David's life shows us at once that the stories about Eli, Samuel and Saul were only preliminary to the story of David's life. The student then inquires, "In what sense preliminary? What kind of facts did the writer select? What did he mean to set forth by means of them?" The answer, as illustrated by what is related about Saul, is that the writer must have had it in mind to show by this past history one fundamental factor as necessary to the success of the Hebrew nation—obedience to the will of God; and one glorious fact—that the hand of God had guided every step of its past history.

Thus their history becomes, not mere annals, not merely biography, but a sermon to the Hebrew nation of the writer's time. When, therefore, a study of the group of historical books shows the student that they fall into two great groups according as they were written by men who belonged to the priesthood, as Ezra or Chronicles, or by men of prophetic sympathies, as Judges and Kings, he concludes that First Samuel belongs to the latter class, and receives a broader conception of the work of a prophet. Such a man not only aimed to stir his people to active righteousness by direct appeal; he buttressed his exhortations by recounting the significant lessons of past experience.

The prophetic writings introduce the student to a fresh set of problems. They can only be classified in order of time, the distinction into major and minor prophets being unscientific and quite unnecessary. A chronological arrangement is imperative. Isaiah was not the first of the literary prophets, but the third, or, possibly, the fourth. A similar rearrangement of the chapters or sections of such prophetic books as Isaiah and Jeremiah, which are really collections of utterances of varying dates, is equally necessary if the student seeks to determine the original meaning of these utterances and the work of the prophet for his own generation.

This necessity may be shown by quoting from George Adam Smith's arrangement of the earlier prophecies of Isaiah: B. C., 737, his call, chap. 6; 736–5, his first sermon on the three Jerusalems, chaps. 2–4; 735, on patriotism, chaps. 5: 1–25; 9: 8 to 10: 4; 5: 26–30; 735–732, on the Prince of Peace, chaps. 7: 1 to 9: 7; against Damascus, chap. 17: 1–11; before 722, against Samaria, chap. 28. With this arrangement other scholars substantially agree. Very manifestly no one who disregards the necessity of rearranging this material can possibly form a correct idea of Isaiah's life and work. Yet an understanding of the prophet as a man of the seventh or eighth century B. C., who advised kings and people on political questions, who kindled the religious enthusiasm or aroused the conscience of the nation because he applied the principles of righteousness to the solution of the problems which pressed upon it, is another necessary step to the understanding of his message for all time.

The prophets uttered eternal truths, but we can only understand what they meant to say by noting the particular occasion of each utterance. The promise of the Prince of Peace [Isa. 9: 6, 7], for instance, taken, as one often reads it, by itself, is simply a prediction of the Christ. So it is, but not primarily, or, at least, not specifically. It is the culminating promise through the prophet of a royal deliverer from the evils into which a vacillating king and a ruthless foe were about to involve his land. It was a stirring message, intended to arouse immediate hope and faith in Isaiah's own countrymen. It was, first of all, something uttered to them and in their interests. This fact is the only sound starting point from which one may determine its deeper significance. The very reasons which led them to accept and trust in Isaiah's assurances of immediate deliverance were, as a matter of historical fact, unsatisfied until the coming of Christ, and thus their expectation was carried through the centuries as an ever future hope.

Let us turn to the book of Job. Here, too, we need to classify. Job belongs to the group of wisdom literature to which belong Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, many Psalms, and perhaps the Song of Songs. Whether the book should be arranged before Proverbs or after it has a bearing on the purpose of the book, and consequently upon our understanding of its relation to Hebrew religious thought, but is not of supreme importance. The vital consideration is a literary one. The book of Job is a drama and must be interpreted as one. It is a very peculiar drama, however, its characters really representing ideas. The three friends of Job, for instance, represent three types of defective argument in reference to the divine significance of suffering. No one who realizes this will be able to commit the error of quoting any of their remarks as if representing the mind of God.

A closer study of the book will lead to a second conclusion. The arguments of these friends are apparently more or less sanctioned by other parts of the Old Testament. They represented religious views actually held. Bildad's oracular proverb, "The light of the wicked shall be put out" [Job 18: 5], is twice affirmed by the proverb writer [Prov. 13: 9; 24: 20], but Job in his reply [21: 17 ff, properly read] contradicts and refutes it as a general truth. It follows, therefore, that we cannot always rely on any one Biblical passage or verse to give us a complete Biblical truth. One part of the Old Testament often corrects or adjusts another part.

The study of the Psalter is peculiarly difficult, because there is so much of uncertainty. It is not difficult for the untrained student to see by careful study why Psalm 18 may have been uttered by David himself, as well as why Psalms 42 and 43 were probably written during the exile and why Psalm 137 was post-exilic. Consequently he does not have to satisfactorily classify every psalm in the Psalter in order to realize that the Psalter is an anthology, or, if one pleases, a collection of hymnals, a portion being of very early date and a portion of very late date, the remainder belonging somewhere in between.

What a fresh standpoint this gives for the understanding of the Psalter as a factor in the religious development of Israel! It registers, not merely the aspirations of one soul, but the devotion of consecrated men through many centuries. How such a discovery changes one's conception of the forces which influenced Israel in post-exilic times! Those days were far from being barren and unspiritual if there were always godly men who could produce immortal Psalms!

There must be a limit to these illustrations. They could be greatly multiplied. They prove this fact—that the study of the Bible from an historical and literary standpoint does not rob the student's Old Testament of any elements of real religious value. It serves to correct many obvious errors. It does much more. It throws a flood of light upon obscurities, it redeems a large number of neglected passages, it co-ordinates all parts of the Old Testament, but, chiefly, it makes it a book, not of 3,000 years ago, but a book of today.

REGRET.

BY MARY BINGHAM WILSON.

Before we knew that o'er our days of sunshine
Could come such shade,
Before we knew that in our midst an angel
His home had made,
How calm we were in our serene contentment—
Our skies how blue—
How light we held his living, loving presence,
Before we knew!

But now the sorrow of a vain regretting,
"Had we but known,"
Throbs sadly through our life of seeming calmness
In undertone.
O, could we hear once more the voice now silent—
So dear, so true—
As in the old sweet days of love and gladness
Before we knew!

SETTLING DOWN FOR THE WINTER.

BY MRS. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

On this January day, when the clouds hang low and the snow falls soft and steadily, drifting under the fences and heaping the hollows, one has a distinct sense of the pleasure there is in settling down for the winter. Summer is by this time a beautiful memory, no more tangible than a dream that went with the daylight. Autumn's glorious procession is over; the splendor on forest and mountain vanished with the first real wintry storm, and the fruits and grains were long ago gathered in and cared for in barn and bin.

Here we are with a long period before us during which the family will move into closer quarters, or the house at least take on a certain resemblance to a fortified refuge from the onslaughts of tempest and cold. We can settle down for the winter without that sense of interruption from without, which is peculiar to other and less rigorous conditions. Winter is a strenuous and exacting season, but its frowning face is after all benignant in a way, and some of its grimmer aspects bring with them much of blessedness.

Now is the time for undertaking with confidence that long piece of work which was laid aside for the busy weeks, when summer engagements were pressing. It may be the beautiful rug, into which so many pieces are woven, each a souvenir of this or that family event—here a fragment of Emily's wedding gown, there a bit of Ezra's old blue topcoat, again a scrap from the dainty frock of a small, rosy-cheeked grandchild. Perhaps it is a tablecloth, or a spread for the bed in the guest chamber, which is to be embroidered all over in clusters of chrysanthemum or sprigs of sweetbrier. Such a piece of work becomes a valuable possession and is fit to be an heirloom. You can go on with it in comfort now that you have settled down for the winter.

A friend of mine, not particularly devoted to her needle, takes the winter for study, selecting a period in history and going minutely into the details of the home life, the social opportunities, the dress, the table and the several phases of the century she chooses. She makes a chart for herself, in which is entered whatever she discovers, and she writes her views of the notable people and events in her commonplace book, thus fixing in her mind that which most impresses her. Last year her field was the second century of the Christian era; this year she may, for a change, select a widely different period. But whatever her choice of a subject, she does her work thoroughly, and at the close of the winter feels that she has made a very decided advance in knowledge, and has also furbished up her mental weapons, so that they are facile and ready for use.

The winter classes in various lines are inviting to thoughtful women, and there are no more enthusiastic students than matrons past their prime. Indeed, one charming feature of our period is that its atmosphere is favorable to development as long as life lasts, and that there is no arrest of progress after school days are over and girlhood is in the background.

The close and serious study of current events is worth the attention of women who can compass some leisure during the winter. One gains breadth and reaps great advantages by keeping eyes and ears open to what is going on in the world in this wonderful time, when so much is happening, and the march of the nations is toward the coming in of Christ's larger reign on the earth.

In our winter settling down we cannot leave out of the account what we are doing in the church. Every Christian woman needs to do some direct personal Christian work, for her own soul's good, as well as for the help of others. What this work shall be in individual cases must be decided by the peculiar circumstances of each person and household; but we cannot be mere parlor-car passengers on the road; we must all take hold and help if our church, considered in its smaller local organizations or as a great aggressive unit, is to prosper. These winter months give us our opportunity beyond any other for steadily showing our colors, for faithful attendance upon meetings, and for that self denial which builds the Lord's kingdom. In other days and other years we may not have been so diligent or so devoted as we ought, but no matter, the past is gone and idle regrets are of no use; our plain duty is to > Act, act in the living present,

> Heart within and God o'erhead.

A great deal of neighborhood and friendly sociability may go on during the cold weather, and this pleasant intercourse with our townspeople, and those whose homes are near ours, should be counted upon and cultivated. The Country Club, forming a center where the residents of a village or small town may come together frequently and informally, is the source of so much agreeable and congenial companionship that it should be prized when carried on under the right auspices. Not suffered to degenerate into a mere gathering of young people for amusement, but brought up to high efficiency by the interest and co-operation of the best persons, both men and women, in a place or neighborhood, the Country Club is one of the most admirable and useful social institutions of our day.

THE KID'S NEW YEAR'S RESOLVE.

BY MAC GREGOR JENKINS.

At the corner of Grant and Lincoln Streets the Kid held undisputed sway. It had taken months for him to gain the distinction, but now he was recognized as the "boss of de corner." He could swagger about at his own sweet will, undisturbed by the scowls of fallen leaders, who had bent the knee to him only after hard fought battles. The sweets of power came to him in the ready allegiance of smaller boys, who had been buffeted about by former tyrants, and accepted the Kid's uncertain rule as a matter of course.

His accession to power was not, however, a pleasure to all his subjects, and some were in covert rebellion. The apple-woman looked upon him as anything but a blessing, for he purloined her apples at will and always evaded capture. The cabman on the corner had descended from his box, whip in hand, so often in vain that he gave up all attempts to punish him, and submitted to jibes and missiles with a stolid indifference born of necessity. The switchman would find stones wedged into the street railway switches so skillfully that delays could only be avoided by the greatest watchfulness. In fact, every one whose path of duty or pleasure led by the Kid's corner came to know and dread him. By the instinctive cunning of the street Arab he had been able to keep free from the law, and he had still to learn the comprehensive quality of the legal phrase "malicious mischief," which every evil-intentioned boy of the streets dreads.

But the Kid was not wholly bad. He dispensed a rude sort of justice, which was meant to be fair, and he would do a kind thing for a friend as quickly as many a more fortunate lad.

But he was in power, and the sovereignty of Grant and Lincoln Streets changed with amazing rapidity. He had battled for his privileges, and he intended to avail himself of them. What is more, he intended to eclipse all his predecessors by the ingenuity of his mischief. He was in a fair way to do it, but for months his arch enemy thwarted him. The burly policeman, who represented law and order on the Kid's corner, was no vassal of his. With the utmost arrogance he had ignored all former rulers, and on the few occasions when he had devoted his undivided attention to them they had suddenly and mysteriously disappeared for longer or shorter intervals. The Kid, therefore, viewed the "copper" with suspicion, and reflected at great length how he could humiliate him. It was no easy task, for O'Brien knew well the ordinary pranks of the street Arab. So the weeks grew into months, and still the feud was on, and O'Brien was still in a measure master of the situation.

One frosty autumn evening, when the city was in a turmoil of a political demonstration, the Kid planned one of his most brilliant efforts. There was to be a large torchlight procession and Grant and Lincoln Streets were to be represented by a detachment of boys under the Kid's command. He had not applied to the regularly constituted officers for permission to parade, nor did the chief marshal know of this picturesque addition prepared to add interest to the parade. The Grant and Lincoln Cadets were to assemble privately and drop into the line whenever they could, do as much mischief as they could and make their limit of noise and then disperse. These were the instructions.

As the great procession with blaring bands and flashing torches swung down the street the Kid held his impatient cadets under control until a break came in the glittering line, then with a wild rush they formed behind one of the detachments and with a few battered torches held aloft they stepped proudly after the music. Their glory was short-lived for their presence attracted every boy on the streets and soon such a throng gathered, following and fighting for places in their ranks, that a marshal ordered the police to disband them. It was a short, sharp, incisive battle and the cadets vanished. The Kid, who had proudly led his company, found himself quite alone and unsupported in his struggle with an officer, and when fairly subdued he was not appeased to find that the iron hand on his collar belonged to O'Brien, the "copper" from Grant Street. With a few rough words of admonition the officer dismissed him, but the indignity rankled and for days the Kid was sulky and unhappy.

During the winter months life on the corner was uneventful. The cold drove even the boys indoors and the Kid, who had no indoors to go to save a box in an alley, roamed and shivered alone. His one amusement out of business hours (for he sold papers a few hours each day) was to wage war on the copper. He was made the target for snowballs and lumps of frozen earth and tormented in every possible way. Since the failure of the Grant and Lincoln Cadets to achieve fame the Kid had felt that his position as leader was not as secure as formerly.

One wet, foggy December afternoon, just as the lights began to make the street bright, he was standing in front of a bake-shop window with a bundle of unsold papers under his arm.

Suddenly he spied a benevolent looking old gentleman waiting on the corner for a car. The Kid thought it a good chance to play one of his favorite tricks. He advanced cautiously and dropped his papers into the gutter running with water. Seated on the curb near them he gave vent to very realistic sobs and leaned over in an attitude of grief and utter discouragement. The sound of his sobbing attracted the old gentleman's attention. After a moment's hesitation he came to him and put his hand on the boy's shoulder.

"What's the trouble, my little fellow?" he asked, kindly.

The Kid pointed dramatically to the soiled and worthless papers.

"That's too bad, my boy, but don't give in. How many are there?"

"Ten Globes and four Heralds," he sobbed.

The old gentleman took out his pocketbook. "Well, here's the money. I'll buy them all."

The Kid virtuously shook his head.

"Yes, let me," his friend protested. "Here, take it, and a Happy New Year to you," he added.

There was no further hesitation; the Kid stretched out his hand for the money. As he did so the gentleman's arm was seized by a gloved hand and a rough voice said: "Here, don't let him impose on you like that!" With a quick glance the boy saw O'Brien.

"But," protested the generous man, "the poor boy is in trouble."

But both the boy and the officer had disappeared. With a bound the Kid darted into the middle of the street. As he dodged between the passing vehicles his foot slipped on a car track and down he went in front of an approaching trolley car. The officer was but a step behind and he picked him up in time to stumble with him unhurt upon the fender of the moving car. He extricated himself from his dangerous position and carried the frightened boy to the sidewalk. Here the Kid made a dash for liberty, but the officer held him firmly. Threading his way through the crowd to a dark alley he stopped in a darkened doorway and thrust the boy into a corner.

"Now," he said, after a pause, "I've got you. I don't know what to do with you. You ought to be shut up. You've been the boss of this corner too long and you've made trouble enough. I've stood your mischief when perhaps I ought not to. I've hushed up complaints against you. I've been your good friend. And how have you paid me back? With stones and snowballs, lies and mischief. You are a mean little cuss and you know it. With all your swagger you're a little coward in some ways. But there's good in you, too, that's the trouble. You're plucky and kind when you want to be, and meaner than dirt when you want to be.

"And after all your other pranks now you try to lie and cheat to an old gentleman like you did tonight. That's what I call mean. I saw you and when I came up I said to myself I'd put you where you'd make no more trouble." O'Brien paused and mopped his forehead. Speech-making to bad boys in a dark alley was not his forte.

"Lem me go!" whimpered the Kid, now thoroughly scared.

"Yes," said O'Brien, "I'm going to, just this once, but I'll tell you why. Not for your own sake, by a good deal. I intended to arrest you, but when I saw you fall in front of that car I thought of a little kid I've got of my own who did that once and now he's only got one leg and he'll never run again. And he's worth ten such fellows as you. Something made me jump after you to save you just because I thought of my own little fellow who never did a mean thing in his life. Now go home and think it over." With this parting advice O'Brien returned to his official duties on the corner and left the boy stunned and tearful.

Then he realized his good fortune, that he was free, and a little of his old spirit came back. He started jauntily down the street. He tried to whistle, but for some reason he couldn't; he tried to swagger, but it was a dismal failure. In fact, the Kid was subdued. The more he pondered the more subdued he became.

At last he reached his home, and pulling aside the carpet which hung at the door he crawled into the straw-lined box. His chum was asleep, and the Kid pondered a long time alone in the dark.

Then he wakened his chum, a cripple he had taken pity on and allowed to share his quarters: "Say, Limpy, I'm through. Yes, I'm done. I ain't going to boss de gang any more. I got a right to do as I choose, an' I don't choose any longer. I'm through!" In answer to his chum's amazed questions he told his story: "Yes," he said, in conclusion, "dat copper is a white man; he's a dandy an' we never knew it. Come to think of it, I guess I'll stay boss while I can, but de gang has got to be bossed different. No more meanness for me!"

The next morning, as the bells were welcoming in the new year, the Kid pinned up in his box the following, written with infinite trouble on a scrap of soiled paper:

AFIELD, ASHORE, AFLOAT, AFLYING WITH YOUNG NATURALISTS.

THE VERY BEST SPECIMEN OF ALL.

BY MR. MARTIN.

I have examined with special interest the various specimens of natural history exhibited from time to time, during the past year, in the Home Department of our paper, collected as they have been by enthusiastic experts from air and earth and the waters under the earth. But there has been one notable omission. Flowers of the field, fowls of the air, wayside weeds and seaside crabs have been vividly and beautifully described, but, although it may not seem very modest for me to say it, I am sure that neither Mr. Parkhurst's Heralds of Spring, nor Miss Tolman's Familiar Ferns, nor Mrs. Bucklin's roses and grasses and cranberries with their learned Latin names, nor even Mr. Rankin's Pile of Stones and Charles Upson Clark's Beetles begin to equal in real value and interest the natural history specimen I have in mind. I shall not give the Latin name of the animal—although I might do so—but try to describe it to you in plain English, so that when I have finished, you may be able to tell whether you have ever seen one of them or read of them in your books of natural history.

To begin with, the animal is found in all parts of the world—at least, in all countries I have ever visited or which I have read about in books of travel. Like most zoölogical species, however, they differ in color, size and characteristics, according to the climate or other surroundings. They are very much more numerous in India and China than in England or America, while in cold countries like Greenland, Labrador and Patagonia they are comparatively rare.

Strictly, he should be classed as a land animal, yet my careful observation shows that he gradually changes his habits and becomes to some degree amphibious. In his first years hating water, perhaps more than the young of any other animal, fighting against it and almost exhibiting symptoms of hydrophobia if it is brought near him, he afterwards comes to be very fond of it, and in the warm season may be seen paddling in it for hours together, and is even able, if necessary, to swim considerable distances, as would a dog or bear.

You may denominate him a quadruped or biped as you like, for in the first year or two of his life he walks on all fours as a quadruped should. But afterwards he is able to imitate the monkey—to which in other respects he bears a striking resemblance—in walking on two feet. They learn to travel very swiftly in that mode and I have actually seen them—when they might not have known I was watching—chase each other right merrily in an almost erect posture. Like the monkey, too, they are very agile at climbing. Although not perhaps strictly prehensile animals, they are yet so skillful in climbing trees and so fond of it that some naturalists have, I think, considered them as descended from the ancient tree-dwellers, but I do not know enough about evolution to give any opinion as to that. I ought to have said, however, that before they are strong enough to walk they are carried about by their mothers, although they are not classed, like the kangaroos and opossums, with marsupialia.

I have not mentioned their color. Have you ever seen a young Arctic seal? Pomiuk could tell you that when very young they are dressed in white—pure, soft white; so are the animals I am describing to you. Later their covering, like that of the seal, becomes darker, although in some countries it is said to be almost as bright colored as the plumage of the flamingo. As in the case of other species of animals common to different zones, their covering differs with the climate, their dress in polar regions being a thick fur, while in torrid latitudes it is extremely thin. I think there is even a difference in this respect between the summer and winter seasons of the temperate zone.

You know that animals are sometimes classified according to the food they choose, or their mode of eating it—carnivora, herbivora, rodentia, ruminantia, etc. I think these animals of ours belong to the omnivora, from the kinds and quantity of food they manage to consume. I do not think they are ruminants, for I do not remember seeing one of them "chew the cud." Their incisors are sharp, so that they are able to eat meat, and, although I have never heard them called "predatory" animals, I have more than once seen them catch other animals (both land and water animals) and devour them. They are certainly rodents, for they are good at gnawing—nuts of almost any kind being the favorite objects of their search. I have often seen them climbing trees to obtain them, as well as to help themselves to apples, plums and other fruit, to all kinds of which they are very partial. For this reason they are not in good repute with the farmers, who, however, seldom succeed in stopping their depredations, for they are as sly and nimble as a fox.

This reminds me to speak of a marked trait of these animals—their remarkable love of sport. I suppose this is characteristic of the young of all animal kind, but I am sure in none is it developed to such an intense degree as in this species. They not only play with one another in various and exceedingly funny ways, but they play with other animals as well. I saw one of them the other day—a little fellow which had scarcely got out of the quadruped stage—rolling over and over with a rollicking dog in the greatest glee, and both animals seemed to enjoy it equally well. Like the horses mentioned in the Scrap book column the other week, or like the monkeys—to which, I repeat, they are allied in many traits—their sport is all the better if there is a bit of mischief in it. The housewives as well as the farmers understand this, for they often find a jar of preserves or pan of doughnuts, which they have carefully put away in the cellar or pantry, broached and a part or the whole of its contents gone; Madam knows well enough who it is that, guided by scent or otherwise, had stolen in when all was quiet in the kitchen and accomplished the theft.

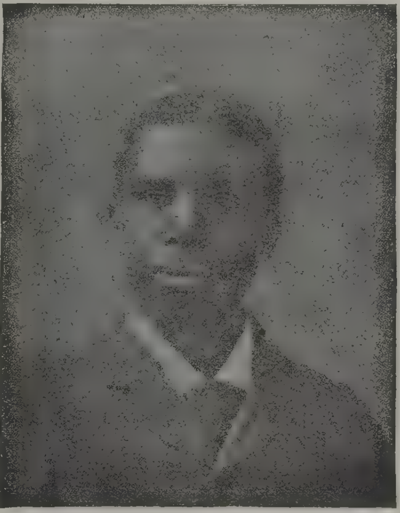
One other singular thing—these animals make more noise according to their size than any other members of the animal kingdom. If they were as large as hippopotamuses and had voices in the same proportion no ears could endure the sound! When many of them are congregated together at play their noise is something tremendous. Since I began this article I stopped to take a short ride on my wheel—lest a winter storm might end the bicycling season—and returning through a manufacturing village I suddenly encountered a company of these animals very near the road. Such chattering, such yelling, such screeching, such howling, such squalling, such resemblance to laughing hyenas, such combined chorus of uproarious vociferation, as startled me! But I rattled my bell and came past them unharmed.

This animal is very intelligent. I have been in Hagenbach's menagerie and seen the trained elephants and horses and tigers, but I do not believe any of them begin to be as capable of training as these creatures I am describing. In fact, they can be trained to know and do almost anything in the world.

In conclusion, I have only room to say that despite their mischievousness, their noisiness, their destructive propensities, they are really good-natured, amiable and affectionate animals. One learns to love them exceedingly and is generally loved by them in return. They have almost never been known to injure or molest any who treated them kindly. For my part, I do not hesitate to say that I would rather have a few of these animals as my friends and companions than all the pet poodles and even the pet pussy-cats in the United States!

THE POET AND HIS SONG.

The writer of this poem, Paul Laurence Dunbar, is a young Negro, whose parents were slaves, and who until recently has been earning an honest livelihood as an elevator boy. His poems first appeared as waifs in the newspapers of Ohio, his native State, and attracted the attention which they deserve. His father, who escaped from slavery by flight into Canada, taught himself to read and showed a remarkable fondness for history. His mother was freed by the events of the Civil War, and manifested a passion for literature, especially for poetry. After the father's death she struggled on in deep poverty, but with a mother's pride and hope in her son's genius. A most appreciative introduction to Mr. Dunbar's book, called Lyrics of Lowly Life, published by Dodd, Mead & Co., is written by Mr. Howells, in which he says: "If he should do nothing more than he has done, I should feel that he had made the strongest claim for the Negro in English literature that the Negro has yet made."



Paul L. Dunbar.

A song is but a little thing,
And yet what joy it is to sing!
In hours of toil it gives me zest,
And when at eve I long for rest;
When cows come home along the bars,
  And in the fold I hear the bell,
As Night, the shepherd, herds his stars,
  I sing my song, and all is well.

There are no ears to hear my lays,
No lips to lift a word of praise;
But still, with faith unfaltering,
I live and laugh and love and sing.
What matters yon unheeding throng?
  They cannot feel my spirit's spell,
Since life is sweet and love is long,
  I sing my song, and all is well.

My days are never days of ease;
I till my ground and prune my trees.
When ripened gold is all the plain,
I put my sickle to the grain.
I labor hard, and toil and sweat,
  While others dream within the dell;
But even while my brow is wet,
  I sing my song, and all is well.

Sometimes the sun, unkindly hot,
My garden makes a desert spot;
Sometimes a blight upon the tree
Takes all my fruit away from me;
And then with throes of bitter pain
  Rebellious passions rise and swell;
But—life is more than fruit or grain,
  And so I sing, and all is well.

Closet and Altar

No life is complete which does not sometimes sit trustfully waiting to be fed by God.

All common things, each day's events,
  That with the hour begin and end,
Our pleasures and our discontents,
  Are rounds by which we may ascend.

Do you desire to learn the secret of a restful life, to learn how you can be a man or woman of Christly power? You can only become such in so far as Christ has power over you and takes possession of you. . . . You are to live a life of obedience to authority; a life in which there is but one dominating power—the omnipotent imperium of the Godhead.—Webb-Peploe.

No doubt the true conception of the eternal future includes the idea of perpetual development, the movement of the intellect into new regions of truth, the ascent of the moral life to loftier hights of righteousness, the increase of the fervor of love for God and for all those who will share our blessedness in him, the discovery from age to age of new and glorious forms of moral and spiritual life that will attract our affection and fill us with delight, the enlargement, the perpetual enlargement, of all those powers which find their exercise in the service of God and of those whom he has created. Rest and progress will doubtless be united in the perfect life.—R. W. Dale.

Thou who dost all things give,
  Be not thyself forgot!
No longer may thy children live
  As if their God were not!

But every day and hour,
  Since thou dost bless us thus,
In still increasing light and power
  Reveal thyself to us.
    —W. H. Furness.

Christ will come to thee, holding out his consolation, if thou prepare him a fit dwelling within thee. Many a visit does he make to the interior man, sweet is his communication with him, delightful his consolation, great his peace, and his familiarity exceedingly amazing. Give place, then, for Christ, and deny entrance to all others.—Thomas à Kempis.

Almighty God, we bless thee for the life that cannot die. Thou hast clothed us with a body which we must shed; it must return to the dust, but the soul which thou didst fashion in thine image shall live forever. The soul is blinded by the body. The body often overwhelms the spirit, but the body is only for a moment, its conquests cannot endure. Help us to claim our better selves, our higher manhood, and to live in all thought and feeling that is uppermost and therefore nearest God. We have often sinned against thee with the body when we did not mean to sin against thee with the soul. Save us, O Christ, from ourselves. Save us from our senses, and may we live and move and have our being in thee. Our burden is heavy, but it is only for a day. Give us joy in these thoughts. Deliver us from despair and all manner of humiliating fear. May we stand in the sublimity of trust and work in all the tenderness of childlike obedience. Lord, hear our prayer and let our cry come unto thee. Amen.

MEN'S HOUSEKEEPING.

BY AGN' B. ORMSBEE.

It is true that not all men keep house, but all mercantile business involves a great deal of genuine housekeeping, fully as exacting as that of women. Men not only cheerfully yield this field of work as being woman's peculiar sphere, but are the first to scout the notion that they are housekeepers in any sense of the term. Yet what is the constant cleaning, scrubbing, dusting, setting to rights which goes on nearly every day in our large stores, groceries and drug stores, to say nothing of the less regular sweeping, polishing and window washing that the lawyer, the real estate agent and all that huge army of business men in offices are repeatedly having done to keep their surroundings attractive.

But whether you recognize the relation between your own housekeeping and that of your wife and mother there is one point to bring to your notice, and that is why, having well begun, do you not continue the good work? Why do you not do your work more thoroughly? If woman's voting could possibly be so superficial as man's housekeeping it is well that she is at present debarred. Your brasses shine, your windows gleam, your counters are dustless, but how are your cellars and your back yards and your back stores? Almost without exception these out-of sight places are dirty, disorderly and too often filthy. How can men of refined personal habits bear to have the cellars of their places of business filled with rotting boards and packing materials, moldy papers and rubbish of all sorts, decaying and smelling to heaven?

And yet this is not a fancy picture, but a report of what exists behind the scenes of the majority of business houses in both city and country, if we could only see it. Such cellars, such workrooms, such dumping grounds of yards would not only bring down upon a woman's head the contempt of her kind, but a visit from the health officer. Look in the cellar of almost every grocer and see if it be not true that men do not yet understand that the laws of hygiene apply to both the inside and outside of the proverbial platter. Many a home is quarantined and its housekeeper criticised for the typhoid fever, diphtheria, malaria or rheumatism of the breadwinner, while, if the truth were known, there is here no mystery of Providence, but only a wondrous mercy that the damp and decaying matter that lurks beneath and behind the sale and workrooms of the unfortunate man has caused so little suffering.

THE POWER OF SUGGESTIVENESS.

More is accomplished in this world always by the suggestions of motive and force than by the impositions of form and rule. He who believes in suggestion has trust in the vital powers of things. The whole world is waiting to start into far higher action than anything yet, if one could only touch its springs. This is the beauty, this must be the quiet satisfaction, of the lives of those obscure and patient workers who build nothing themselves, but who suggest the need and wish of building to other minds greater than theirs. Think of being the school teacher of Shakespeare, or Milton, or Pascal; and yet only a few antiquaries know the name of either. Surely there are last that shall be first. Surely this power of suggestiveness must always be the teacher's wisest and best.—Phillips Brooks.

1. WHAT WAS HER NAME?

'Neath hoary Egypt's glowing sun
A fresh young English rose once grew—
The Nile was white with lotus blooms,
But none so fair as my ONE TWO;
So long I tarried there in ONE,
Till love returned was my bright lot,
For though my dear girl's name was TWO,
Her heart, good luck for me. was not!

Now, puzzlers who can guess her name
From hints I've dropped will have the key
That, sages say, unlocks the door
To Egypt's oldest mystery;
For, since in ONE was found this TWO,
This TOTAL, oddly graven o'er,
Strange hieroglyphics have been read
That posed philologists before!

2 METAGRAM.

The sea! The sea! All joy for me
Is in my white winged ONE;
A refuge true from cares that TWO.
With her I envy none.

Though skies be THREE, she dances free
Across the waters wild;
Unmoved I FOUR though breakers roar;
I am an ocean-child.

Let others praise the woodland ways,
The FIVE that hails the light;
I trim my sail to catch the gale,
And SIX the gull's swift flight.

Some count their SEVEN an earthly heaven.
Set round with palings straight,
But all the brine I hold as mine,
From Hebrides to EIGHT.

From early English history
We  full many a tale.
One tells of how a fair-haired slave
In Rome, exposed for sale,
Was seen by good Pope Gregory,
Who asked the prisoner's nation.

Let not some modern  say
The legend is not true!
I'd rather far believe in all
The old myths—wouldn't you?

On this basis the depth of water would be one foot.'

The Conversation Corner.

MY DEAR CORNERERS: Writing this on New Year's Day, I place the old interrogation at the head to remind you that our sign for 1897 will remain unchanged—a question—and our motto still the same: ask, seek, learn. (Do you not think these words are all the more appropriate and attractive because you find them among the sayings of Jesus?) The sign and the motto suit us all equally well, whether we be four or forty—or twice forty! If there are any who think they "know it all" now and do not need or care to ask and seek and learn other and better things—well, they are out of place among us Cornerers!

Here are a few ? ? ? which have been waiting in the Drawer some time for an opportunity to ask themselves:

RHODE ISLAND.

Dear Mr. Martin: . . . I want to ask the Corner this question. Where can I find that poem which begins,

The boy stood on the burning deck,
Whence all but he had fled?

I think many of our older members must have spoken it in school and hope some of them can tell me. RUSSELL.

That's right, Russell; many old Cornerers have spoken Casabianca in public on the stage. It was one of the most familiar pieces for reading and declamation forty and fifty years ago—and since—as a host of our honorary members could testify. It is in many of the older school readers, but perhaps in none readily accessible to you. But you will find it in the third volume of the Heart of Oak series, a collection of classic English prose and poetry, which, I am sure, has been recommended to you before in the Corner (Heath & Co.; 50 cents).

The poem, as read or recited in school, used to excite our sympathies greatly at the thought of the boy who would rather die than disobey his father. I knew one little boy who was so much touched by hearing the piece that in making his evening prayer he added to his other petitions this: "O Lord, bless the boy who stood on the burning deck." Other of Mrs. Hemans's poems used to be much admired and often quoted, but are now said to be out of date. I have just asked two young college graduates about her Hour of Death, once so familiar—

Leaves have their time to fall,
And flowers to wither at the North-wind's breath—

but neither of them had ever heard of it! I hope our children will not forget Mrs. Hemans's beautiful poem on the Landing of the Pilgrim Fathers—which you remember is preserved in her own handwriting at Pilgrim Hall in Plymouth—

The breaking waves dashed high
On a stern and rock-bound coast.

And here is a similar question from a reader who is more than "twice forty":

VERMONT.

Dear Mr. Martin: I am not one of the Cornerers and am only a little more than eighty-five years old, but I have a scrap-book and wish to get a poem written by Mrs. Sigourney many years ago when there was some political trouble in South Carolina. It began with

Stars of my country's sky, and ended—after the trouble was over—with

The Southern Cross looked brightly forth,
And the pole-star kept its place.

I thought that some grandmother of the Cornerers might have it and oblige your young correspondent. MRS. S. L. M.

I have looked over different editions of Mrs. Sigourney's poems, but do not find the one desired. But "grandmother" may have it in her scrap book! Mrs. Sigourney, like Mrs. Hemans, wrote many poems, widely read in their time, but in a whole volume I see none now that seems familiar, excepting "The Western Emigrant"— did not we read that in school boy time, perhaps in the "Village Reader"?

An ax rang sharply 'mid those forest shades;

WESTMINSTER WEST, VT.

Dear Mr. Martin: I would like to inquire if the old Liberty Bell is not in Independence Hall, Philadelphia? I recently heard the statement made that it was not returned there after the World's Fair, but think it must be a mistake. I myself saw it at Chicago, guarded by the policemen who went with it from Philadelphia. I would also like to ask if any one has the poem entitled The Clerk of the Weather. CHARLES P.

I cannot answer the last question. I have kept daily record of the weather for nearly fifty years, but not in poetry! I "guess" the Liberty Bell is in Independence Hall, all right; the U. S. Army would have been called out if that sacred relic had not been returned. Charles will remember that there was a model of the old bell at the World's Fair, besides the original, and it was the former that was usually rung there—perhaps the model was kept in Chicago.

BROOKLINE, MASS.

My Dear Mr. Martin: . . . I venture to ask another question which may be answered in the Corner. Has the Duke of Westminster anything to do with the Bank of England?
W. B. S.

I find that the Bank of England has a governor and twenty-four directors, elected annually from members of the company. I do not find among the offices and titles of the Duke of Westminster any connected with the Bank of England. I wrote to a gentleman in Kidder, Peabody & Co.'s banking-house, and he courteously replies that he has examined the list of the directors and Westminster's name is not there. Very likely the Most Noble Duke leaves with the Old Lady in Threadneedle Street any extra money he may have, for an old Englishman who called on me the other day said that in his day the Duke of Westminster was the richest man in England, his income being commonly reported as a guinea a minute. (Against all the bother of taking care of so much money, he would have the privilege of doing good with the amount he did not need for his board and clothes—how many children and poor families and missionaries he could make happy! Supposing he gave away only one-half of his income, how much would he have to distribute every day? There is a ? in arithmetic for you!) Let W. B. S. write direct to Mr. W. His address is:

Sir Hugh-Lupus Grosvenor, K. G., P. C., Duke and Marquess of Westminster, Earl Grosvenor, Viscount Belgrave, Baronet Grosvenor, of Eaton, in the co. palatine of Chester; Custos Rotulorum of the co. of London; hon. col. Earl of Chester's yeomanry cavalry and lieut. col. commanding Westminster rifle volunteers; supernumerary A. D. C. to the Queen, etc., etc.

JAMAICA PLAIN, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: Last summer I visited the Tower of London and think some of the Cornerers may be interested in what one of the guards told me. Among the crown jewels are twelve solid gold salt-cellars. They are about nine inches high and six inches in diameter and are made in different shapes to mark the various degrees of rank. The largest is in the shape of the White Tower, and is always placed at state banquets in front of Queen Victoria, at the head of the table. Starting from that the others are placed at intervals down the table and the people are seated above or below one of these according to their rank. It is the old custom, still kept up, of sitting above or below the salt. Does any one know the origin of the custom? EMILY D.

I remember that Jewel Room with its crowns and other royal regalia (although the guard did not tell me about the salt-cellars), and also those relics of the royal ambition and cruelty which make the history of the tower so terrible. It is very pleasant to make a pilgrimage to old England—and to read about it in the "Book of the Pilgrimage"—and we may rejoice in all that is good and true in "our kin beyond the sea," yet when I think of the infinite fuss and fashion and folly and the un-Christian spirit connected with the life of the nobility, and of a government by hereditary right rather than by merit, I prefer the simpler government and plainer ways of our republican country—what say you, Cornerers?

Mr. Martin

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK.

What Happened in 1896? Janus had two faces. So does January. In this month—and I am writing on its first day—we look backward and forward. Last January—if you pasted the Corner page in your scrap-books, you will find it under Jan. 30—we asked what would happen in 1896. Now we can look back and see what did happen. Can you make out the list? Besides the election of the President of the United States, after the most exciting and important campaign of this generation, what should go on the record? Venezuelan trouble amicably settled; system of arbitration to be arranged between England and America; Turkey still murdering its people, and the nations of the world looking on; the Cuban rebellion kept up; the coronation of the czar of Russia; the assassination of the shah of Persia; the discovery of X-rays—apparently one of the most important discoveries of the century; the deaths of two great English painters and of our most famous American authoress. What else do you remember of national note?

What Will Happen in 1897? It would seem certain that something must happen in Turkey. After the murder of 100,000 of his subjects, the sultan cannot much longer defy the sentiment of the world. We will look out for his dethronement or a European war. Something must happen in Cuba. Such atrocious warfare must stop, or there will be no people or property left in that beautiful island. The United States will not go to war with Spain, but we may have a hand in the settlement of the Cuban war. One thing we do know, that we are to have a new President and a new administration. It is a question of great interest whom the President selects as his advisers in the different departments of the Government. How many of you can make a correct list of the officers of the President's Cabinet? (I do not mean the men's names but their offices, as Secretary of War, etc.) You know that these are to be selected by the President and submitted to the Senate, immediately after his inauguration, for confirmation. What position will the new Administration take as to Cuba, Turkey, Hawaii? THE LAME MAN HEALED.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D. D.

The first Christian church began to be organized at Pentecost, the annual Thanksgiving Day of the Jews. What was to be its character? How would it differ from the Jewish Church? What would it seek to do for men? These questions were, no doubt, asked by the disciples themselves even more earnestly than by those who observed it from without. Luke has chosen this incident of our lesson to answer in part these questions. It shows us:

I. The life of the new church. Some months, perhaps, had passed since Peter's first sermon. The company of organized disciples had settled into the habits described in the last lesson [Acts 2: 42–47]. Further light is thrown on their daily life by this healing of the lame man.

1. They kept up the habit of public worship. At the daily hour of prayer Peter and John were going into the temple. So were the other disciples [Acts 2: 46]. They held services in their own houses. There they broke bread in remembrance of their Master, whom the Jews had condemned to death. They must have already realized the wide difference between their belief and that of other Jews. But the stability of the state required that the people should habitually worship God in the temple. Their own religious characters could not be maintained without public worship. They kept going to the temple till the Jews made them feel that they had no place there, and till they had stated worship of their own. That is manly Christianity. Those who purpose to serve God will worship him in public. They will keep holy the Lord's Day. They will honor him before the people.

2. They kept up habits of benevolence. Christ laid emphasis on men's duty to the poor. He fed the hungry and healed the sick. He taught his disciples that in the great judgment day their destiny would be decided by their treatment of the needy [Matt. 25: 34–46]. Beggars were to be met on every hand in Jerusalem then. They are there now. The Gate Beautiful is gone, but they are beside every gate that remains—blind, maimed, deformed, wretched. Instinctively beggars go where men worship God. They expect the greatest success there. It is their testimony to the character of the church. There were no hospitals then. The poor and needy depended on the compassion of individuals. The church of Christ has since then taught the world the beauty of organized charity. Orphanages, homes and hospitals claim from Christians what individual beggars had to ask for themselves from the early church, which was not denied to them.

3. Their benevolence was real self-sacrifice. Peter and John had no money. If they had possessed it, and had given it to the beggar, he would have been a beggar still. But they had something better to give, even the life and power of Christ which were in them. They set the poor man on his feet and made him able to help himself. This miracle typified the high service which the disciples of Christ are constantly doing. This man had been carried by others ever since he was born, and expected to be carried till he died. But that command, "In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, walk," made a new man of him. His feet and ankle bones received strength. It is sometimes said that the very poor are not to be found in the church. That is because the church helps the poor who come into it to help themselves. They are not likely to remain poor. She puts heart into men, rouses their ambitions and opens ways for them to do honorable service, till they become as surprised at their own powers and as grateful to God as did the lame man.

II. The message of the new church. The healing of the lame man gave Peter a text for another sermon as effective in its way as his first one. Those who had been with Jesus had come to expect that he would heal the sick, restore sight to the blind and cause the lame to walk. It was a question whether after his ascension his authority and power would continue with the church founded in his name. Here was the answer. It was given:

1. To the needy. The lame beggar became a physically sound man through the name of Jesus Christ. His power was still among men. Those who needed him could come to his church as they had come to him in person, and with the same confidence. Healing the sick was not his business when on earth. He often sought to escape the crowd who came to him only to get the benefit of his miraculous power. Disease and death continued in the world through his ministry in it, with no appreciable change. His miracles were not the end, but only the symbol, of his mission. But they did proclaim to all who were in need that he was a deliverer and Saviour. He gave them, not silver and gold, but manhood. His followers found this their mission also. It is now our work to make the weak strong in him, to lift up the fallen, to give manhood to men through their faith in Christ and their devotion to him. So far as the church forgets its mission to the needy it loses its peculiar power. If the spirit of Christ departs from it only the dead body remains.

2. To the people. A lame man healed and renewed suggested a race redeemed and renewed. Only divine power could do that, the power of the Son of God crucified and raised again to life. The preaching of Peter at this time stands as a specimen of the gospel as it was proclaimed in those days of the beginning of the church. It is the same which must now be preached by those who represent our Lord. Some have thought that the idea of Christ as the Son of God and Redeemer of mankind was the result of ages of growth and that it was not the idea of the first disciples But no one, I believe, can study with unprejudiced mind these addresses of the apostles to the Jews without seeing that they attribute to Jesus Christ the highest possible authority and the supreme power of God. Through him they had healed one man. Through him they invited all their hearers to become new men that their sins might be blotted out. His name was to them above every name. His death at the hands of the Jews and by their consent was the greatest of crimes. They had killed the Prince of Life. His resurrection was the crowning evidence that Jesus also, like his Father, had life in himself. This was the substance of the gospel they preached. The promises of forgiveness of sins rested, and still rests, on these facts. Because Christ died and rose again, we have the assurance of "seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord." The prophets foretold him. God "sent him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from your iniquities." These are the glad tidings which have been believed by vast multitudes and have caused them to receive him as their Saviour and to give themselves to his service. These are the truths which we believe and teach.

CHURCH REMODELING.
THOMAS W. SILLOWAY, Church Architect.
10 Park Square, Boston.
Mr. Silloway's long practice in building or remodeling over 400 church edifices enables him to save and utilize all the valuable parts, and for a comparatively small outlay produce a building preferable to a new one of much greater cost. He proposes to continue the work of remodeling as a specialty, and tenders his services to committees who would practice economy, and where the means are limited.

PROGRESS OF THE KINGDOM.

HOME MISSIONARY WORK AMONG LOGGING AND MINING CAMPS.

(Parallel with The Congregationalist's February Topic for Missionary Meetings.)

Christian work among lumbermen and miners is carried on under conditions which distinguish it from missionary enterprise among the ranchers or Western farmers. The transitory character of the mining and lumber communities, which spring up in a day and as quickly disintegrate and disappear, constitutes the discouraging feature of work for these classes. The miner is a wanderer. Usually he is unmarried, and lives in a cabin alone or with one or two comrades, utterly apart from the softening influences of home, of wife and mother. If he has a family he seldom has a home of his own, but temporarily rents one of the rude huts erected by the mining company. His children grow up in the midst of a lawless, unsettled community, in mental and moral darkness as dense as the physical darkness in the underground region where he works. At any moment the mine may be exhausted or the "rich strike" upon which the miners have staked their hopes may prove a disappointment, and they must pack up their scanty household furnishings and join a stampede to some other place.

Even more rapid, perhaps, is the march of the lumber camp, and similar conditions of life prevail among the great army of lumbermen in Michigan, Wisconsin, Georgia, Alabama and Louisiana, as well as in the far Western States of Oregon and Washington. There are three distinct classes of workers in the lumber business—the mill men, the camp men and the river men. The latter are the smallest company but the most difficult to reach with Christian influences, as they flit from stream to river and from river to lake. In his book, The Minute-Man on the Frontier, Mr. Paddefoot draws a graphic picture of the founding and the breaking up of a lumber camp. He introduces us first to the primeval forest in all its beauty and tranquillity, then shows an army of brawny men of various nationalities invading the scene. Rude houses of logs, containing little but bunks one above another, are quickly erected. Men with axes and saws soon change the view. In a few weeks the grand old forest is a wreck, and but a few scrubby oaks or dwindling beech trees remain. The last picture is one of desolation. The buildings decay, the roofs tumble in and a few camp stragglers trying to get a living are all that are left. Solitude reigns supreme.

Among such a mixed and floating population as these miners and lumbermen, in communities so transient, the problem of accomplishing any permanent Christian work is indeed a perplexing and often disheartening one. But the loneliness, the temptations and vices, the lack of restraint, the absence of healthy resources attendant upon such a life makes the need of an uplifting and regenerating force all the more imperative. To our shame it has been said that the temptations and allurements of the saloon and the gambling house are always with these roving pioneers, while the church holds back, waiting for a settled community before she can hazard the chance of sending the gospel to a floating people. Mr. Puddefoot indicated some of the methods for helping these classes when he wrote: "These villages and camps ought to have good libraries, a hall well lighted, innocent amusements, lectures and entertainments, and in addition to this an army of men carrying good books and visiting all the camps." The mission churches and Sunday schools in the lumber and mining regions are as the irrigating streams in the Western prairies. Enterprises such as Auntie Gardiner's Free Reading-room at Red Lodge, Mont., are doing untold good and the hands of those who, like Rev. S. E. Lathrop of Ashland, Wis., are striving to secure fresh, attractive literature for such purposes should be held up.

As a typical enterprise among Western miners let us turn to the interesting work begun and carried on by Mrs. Alice S. Barnes, a plucky miner's wife in Castle, Mont. Her husband was one of the first on the ground when this camp, far up in the Rocky Mountains, was laid out in 1887, and he had control of the store and post office. The community was composed mostly of men among whom the saloon was a great factor. Mrs. Barnes was a member of the Society of Friends and an earnest Christian. She lost no time. Her own words best describe the energetic manner in which she, a woman and a stranger, undertook single-handed to inaugurate religious services: "I organized a Sunday school at once, but waited over one Sunday before saying anything of a church service. During the second week I ascertained that the one young lady of the town could sing and had a copy of the Gospel Hymns. I, too, had one, and considering that with my Bible sufficient, asked every one who came for the mail to meet the next Sunday evening in our unfinished store for service. We improvised seats with boxes and boards and had a congregation of twenty—seventeen men and three ladies."

This was the first of the regular Sunday evening services, which continued three years before a church organization was formed and were attended with astonishing regularity by fifty and finally by seventy-five men. This earnest woman begged the H. M. S. to send out a pastor for the congregation she had gathered and to whom she continued to preach until the long-waited-for missionary arrived. But times were hard, many of the people moved away and the new pastor soon became disheartened and left the field again to Mrs. Barnes, who is now a regular missionary in the employ of the C. H. M. S. It is good to read her glowing plea for "her boys," whom she characterizes as kind-hearted and generous to a fault, ever ready to protect a woman or a child, noble in many traits of manhood but too often fallen into habits of dissipation. Many of them she declares are intelligent and well-read, affable, courteous, brimful of strange stories of camp and field and all the wonderful romances which are a part of the adventurer's lot.

The remarkable work of Rev. James Hayes, himself a converted coal-miner, in the Coal Mine Mission in Indiana is so well known we need not in this article trace the development of congregations and Sunday schools, the establishment of reading rooms, the growth in temperance sentiment in Coal Bluff and its surrounding towns. But the influence of the mission in helping to solve social problems is worth noting. Before Mr. Hayes went to this field, strikes among the miners were always accompanied by riots, lawlessness and murder. The officials of the mining company testify that of late years there has been a marked change. The church and Sunday school have been largely instrumental in preserving property and promoting law and order. The pastors take such an opportunity to inaugurate some new line of activity in and around the churches. During a recent strike in one Indiana town the miners painted the meeting house, and the women recarpeted the floor. During the period of cessation from work there was not a single misdemeanor committed in the town.

An excellent idea of the difficulties of preaching the gospel in a new town in the woods may be gained from an article in The Home Missionary for June, 1896. The writer was sent to begin religious work in the heart of the pine region in northern Minnesota, in a community which promises to be the headquarters of an immense lumber business. Here he found only three buildings, with the exception of the railroad station, finished for use. Two of these were doing a thriving saloon business, the other, a hotel, was having an annex built for the same purpose. The preacher made himself known, and arranged to have services in an office of one of these buildings. When the time came he was obliged to summon up courage to interrupt some exciting games of cards which were going on in the room, and ask the attention of the players. Well might this worker say: "To be faithful to God, and yet not to arouse unnecessary antagonism on the part of such men, in such circumstance, severely taxes the skill of an ordinary mortal. An injudicious step, or an incautious expression, at the commencement of such a mission might necessitate one's having to take the next out-going train." But the missionary met with respectful treatment, and remained to see an important work opened.

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN.

Topic, Jan. 24–30. Our Failures and Successes. Luke 5: 1–11.

The ambition to succeed is a worthy one, provided we understand what true success is, and provided we employ proper methods. It is true that one may be a failure from a worldly point of view and a success as a Christian. And it is equally true that one may attain great outward success and fail utterly in his Christian life. At the same time growth and usefulness in one's vocation and progress in character often accompany each other. Such, certainly, is the ideal for us all. I like to think that Jesus was as good a carpenter as could be found in Nazareth in his day. He is honored when his disciples and servants fill their places in the world as creditably as other persons.

The passage referred to contains a parable as well as a miracle. It shows first that failure is often a necessary preliminary to success. These fishermen had come to the limit of their abilities. They had worked hard and long, but for naught. As we toil away at our different tasks and they grow harder instead of easier and comparative failure seems to crown the labor of a day or year, we are brought to understand our need of divine assistance.

Our extremity is Christ's opportunity, as it was by the Sea of Galilee, 1800 years ago. When Peter and the others admitted Jesus to partnership, he brought to the business an insight, a perseverance and a skill which they did not possess. He helped them in the undertaking which seemed to them most essential to their livelihood. If we admit Christ to a share in our plans, we have a right to expect that he will help us solve even the problems of daily bread.

When Christ had done this splendid thing for these fishermen, he asked them to help him. That is always the meaning of success in any calling. It is a challenge to better service. For instance, Christ helps a man to get rich. Favoring winds speed the vessels which he sends forth; laws of trade operate favorably; everything which he touches seems to turn to gold. Shall that man, having amassed a fortune through the good favor of God, forget that all the providences surrounding his life now summon him to follow Jesus, and become, in his way and through his special possessions, a fisher of men? The same law governs the use of every talent which Christ helps us to develop and perfect.

Literature

PROFANITY IN LITERATURE.

We were annoyed the other day by the profanity in The Story of the Second Mate, in the current number of Scribner's Magazine, and since then we have noticed a protest against it in a daily paper. The names of God, Christ and the devil are vociferated in a time of excitement described by the author with a freedom which too probably is true to life, but which is as offensive as it is wrong. The use of ejaculations, and strong ones, under such circumstances is natural and common. But there is no need of profanity, especially of such specially irreverent profanity. The editors of Scribner's should have insisted upon the alteration of these expressions before publication.

The natural defense of such utterances, should any defense be attempted, would be the claim that one object of such a story is to describe seamen as they are; that they do swear like that, and cannot be truthfully portrayed otherwise; and that no approval of profanity ought to be inferred from the failure to correct such expressions. But this would not be a conclusive answer. It is not necessary to illustrate the vices of the sailor to this extent in order to give a sufficiently complete and correct idea of him. And if it were, the result would not justify the method. The game would not be worth the candle.

Scribner's Magazine is usually not only above reproach but safely and heartily to be recommended for general reading, and we make our comment chiefly because the fact that such a publication has laid itself open to just criticism at all proves that a growing and evil general tendency in literature needs prompt correction. It is time to call a halt. In the interests of common propriety let such vulgarity as this profanity be cut out of books and magazines which profess to be morally respectable.

BOOK REVIEWS.

THE NICARAGUA CANAL AND THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

If anything be needed to disgust an intelligent man with the folly with which our international relations often have been managed, it can be found in this volume. The work of Dr. L. M. Keasbey of Bryn Mawr College, the book is a political history of the subject of American Isthmus Transit, the various schemes being described, the history of negotiations concerning them given and the relations of the Monroe Doctrine to the whole set forth from the point of view of a loyal advocate of the doctrine. It is hardly due to the successive secretaries of state for the last thirty or forty years, with perhaps one or two exceptions, that we as a nation possess at present an unexpectedly favorable opportunity to complete the Nicaragua Canal, which unquestionably is the most feasible of the five or six various routes from the Atlantic to the Pacific. And it is humiliating to read the pitiful story of the blunderings, blusterings and shufflings of our diplomatists whom England has continually and calmly outwitted.

It is not a brilliant chapter in our diplomatic history, and it is an instance of the undeserved intervention of Providence that we have at present no need of any complications with Great Britain if we go forward with the Nicaragua Canal, and no reason to anticipate any difference of a serious character. The question of the success of the undertaking seems chiefly a question of money. The author discusses the different routes and, by a process of elimination, shows the Panama and the Nicaragua Canals to be the only practicable ones. The scandalous history of the De Lesseps fiasco at Panama is set forth, and the fact that the canal now being constructed at that point must have locks after all, and on that account is inferior to the Nicaragua Canal, is explained. The only superiority of the Panama route is the supposed possibility of its construction at tide level, which feature now has had to be abandoned. The book is not a plea for the Nicaragua Canal any more than a scholarly comparison of the histories and features of the different canal enterprises, and of the relations of our Government to others in connection therewith.

We decidedly incline to the opinion that the author has made out his case that the Nicaragua Canal ought to be constructed, and at once, and under the control, if not also at the charge, of the United States; that no serious opposition is likely to be expected from foreigners, and that, if such opposition were to be made, we, nevertheless, probably ought to proceed with the work. Whatever Great Britain, which now is exceptionally well disposed to us, may think or desire, the present condition of European politics is so complicated and threatening that no foreign nation is likely to undertake to interfere with our construction of the Nicaragua Canal, unless some needless blustering in Congress or by our jingo press should exasperate it. We have no doubt that a Nicaragua Canal and, possibly, also a Panama Canal are to be constructed within the next fifty years, and the sooner the better, and they will largely revolutionize the carrying trade of the world. An immense advance in the commercial activity and prosperity of our country may be expected to ensue, and this book, in spite of some needless material, is a valuable contribution to the enlightenment of the public in regard to the whole matter. [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3 50.]

RELIGIOUS.

The Old Testament and Modern Life [Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.50], by Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, contains a series of studies of Old Testament characters and the applications thereof to the life of our day. The preacher, it will be remembered, was formerly a member of the Established Church in England, but for some years has been a Nonconformist, apparently in closest sympathy with the conservative Unitarians. One of the most popular of London preachers, the cause of his popularity is evident to the reader of these pages. The insight shown in the study of the lives of Abraham, Moses, Samuel, David and Elijah, and even of some comparatively minor characters, such as Hagar, Judith and Deborah, and the lessons and suggestions drawn therefrom, as well as the choice language in which his thoughts are expressed, account easily for his hold upon both the literary and Christian public. The author accepts many of the conclusions of the higher criticism, but is far from being a destructive teacher, and the devoutness and practical quality of the interpretations and inferences alike render his volume eminently helpful. Indeed, it is not often that more stimulating spiritual suggestions come to one than those which are found in these sermons. The book is one which many ministers will value and which many laymen also will appreciate highly.

Another book of able and telling discourses is by the late Bishop Phillips Brooks, New Starts in Life and Other Sermons [E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.75], being the eighth series of his sermons. The author's sonnet entitled The Waiting City is printed in place of an introduction. The familiar characteristics of the distinguished and lamented preacher are all illustrated in this book. His clearness of thought, his practical, if not always conventional, views of truth, his profound desire to elevate and bless his hearers and his fervid and sometimes excessively rich flow of words will bring back instantly the personality of the great preacher to every reader who ever has heard him speak. Like all his sermons these will have a wide, lasting and beneficial influence.

Two little volumes by the late Bishop of Winchester, Dr. A. W. Thorold, deal with themes of common life with reference to the satisfaction of duty to the Almighty. One is called On Marriage, the other On Money [Dodd, Mead & Co. Each 50 cents]. They are wise, plain spoken and Christian essays such as everybody can understand and such as all should heed.——The sixth edition of Rev. H. T. Sell's Supplemental Bible Studies [Young Men's Era Publishing Co. 50 cents] is a practical handbook containing suggestions for studies in the structure, geography, institutions, times and doctrines of the Bible intended for teachers' meetings, Bible classes, educational institutions, etc., and the popularity of the book is justified by its serviceableness. In its small compass it comprehends a large amount of important material well arranged for easy use.——Mrs. T. B. Arnold's Sunday School Commentary on the International Lessons for 1897 [F. H. Revell Co. 50 cents] is a good example of thoughtful endeavor to promote the successful interpretation and application of the International Lessons and bears a strong resemblance to most of the other works of its class. It seems to have no striking individual features, but is well adapted for actual service.

BIOGRAPHIES.

My Reminiscences [Dodd, Mead & Co. $3.50] contains the recollections of Luigi Arditi, the famous musical composer and conductor, edited by the Baroness von Zedlitz. For sixty years Arditi has been one of the foremost figures of the musical world. He has known almost every musical celebrity, many of them on terms of intimacy. He has been professionally associated with a very large number of them. He has had both good and bad fortune during his career, and has maintained a cheery disposition and looked on the bright side of life successfully throughout. Honors have come to him, well-deserved and numerous, and in his old age he has set down for the benefit of his friends and the larger public the principal facts of his most interesting career. The book is chatty and unaffected and is almost free from the critical spirit which musical people ordinarily exhibit towards each other. Indeed, in some instances one suspects the author of deliberately suppressing what might have been truthful but disagreeable. But this is not a grave fault, if a fault at all. The introduction of a number of portraits, caricatures, facsimile letters, etc., adds interest to the work and the appendix contains the long list of Arditi's own compositions. The book is delightful from cover to cover.

Mrs. Gaskell's Charlotte Brontë, although a standard work, is not in all respects so faithful as it might have been. Partly to retell an always interesting, if familiar, story, and partly to correct what others have said in error, Mr. C. K. Shorter has written his volume, Charlotte Brontë and Her Circle [Dodd, Mead & Co. $2 50]. He has given indefatigable study to the subject, having enjoyed the assistance of his heroine's husband and other surviving relatives and friends, and has been able to introduce a very large number of hitherto unpublished letters and portraits. Certain mistaken statements in Mrs. Gaskell's volume in reference to Bramwell Brontë and others are corrected, and it is probable that the conception of Charlotte Brontë and her family here given will stand as the most accurate likely to be obtained and essentially truthful. The interest of the public in the heroine and all belonging to her, although probably not destined to be always as large as at present, is sufficient to justify such a work and the author has performed his task creditably.

JUVENILE.

Nearly a quarter of a century ago Archdeacon Farrar wrote a story for fathers and sons, entitled The Three Homes [E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.50]. It is the only book from his pen ever published without his name, and he has now acknowledged it. That it has reached a sale of 28,000 copies is a sufficient indication of its popularity, and undoubtedly it will continue to be a favorite book for boys for years to come. Their parents, also, may learn from it much of advantage in regard to wise methods of dealing with young men. It is a manly and Christian story, entertaining and even exciting, yet one which may be cordially commended.

The author of Probable Sons and other writings also has written Teddy's Button [F. H. Revell Co. 50 cents]. It is a bright and lively story for children, with a distinctly charming flavor. It will be liked and will have a good influence.——The Log of the Lady Grey [Bonnel, Silver & Co. 60 cents] is by Louise S. Houghton. This also is a short story, and describes a somewhat eventful yachting trip. The boys and girls are well described and their adventures are interesting. The story is well suited for the readers for whom it is specially meant.

EDUCATIONAL.

Prof. G. P. Fisher's A Brief History of the Nations and of Their Progress in Civilization [American Book Co. $1.50] is not an abridgment of his Outlines of Universal History, as it might be natural to suppose, although based upon it, but a large part of the subject matter has been rewritten. No more competent pen could be found for the composition of such a work than that of Professor Fisher, and the book illustrates well his ample knowledge, expert powers of discrimination and unfailing candor of temper. Special attention is paid to the mediæval and modern periods of history, and contemporary events in different countries between which mutual relations have existed are connected, as far as possible, in description. The most careful advantage has been taken of modern discoveries, and, so far as their revelations have contradicted or modified the truth of ancient traditional statements, these have been corrected. It would be difficult to name another work which covers the same extensive ground so comprehensively and at the same time so clearly and effectively. Intended for a textbook, it also will serve admirably as a work of reference, and many persons will enjoy simply reading it for the sake of the bird's-eye view of human progress which it affords.

Dr. O. J. Thatcher and Ferdinand Schwill are the authors of Europe in the Middle Age [Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.00]. It is one of the books written to supply the needs of the two earliest years of the college course, and the question whether such an addition to the long list of volumes bearing upon the same subject is justifiable will be answered in the affirmative, we are convinced, by all who examine the book. It is commendable in method and arrangement. The style is concise without being too terse. The balance between insertion and omission of details has been held with discrimination. It is supplied with helpful paragraph titles in heavier type, and in all respects it is well adapted to its end. We commend it to the attention of students of the period covered.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Mr. W. D. Howells has supplied the introduction to English Society [Harper & Bros. $2.50], by the late George Du Maurier, a volume made up of the artist's sketches, most of which appear to have been taken from the pages of Punch, but some of which have appeared in his books. Du Maurier had an individuality much more marked than that of most artists, and within his narrow range he excelled, but his range was exceedingly limited. The same faces appear and re-appear in this book upon different bodies and in different circumstances, and create fresh wonder that so accomplished an artist should not have exhibited greater inventiveness, but in their way they are masterpieces, and the jokes or other observations which they illustrate are exceedingly amusing. The volume makes a truly elegant holiday book, but one the charm of which is by no means confined to any particular period of the year. If placed in one's drawing-room, its popularity soon will become manifest by the evidences of use which it will show.

Historic Andover [The Andover Press. $1 25], by Mrs. Annie Sawyer Downs, is the poem which the author prepared for the 250th anniversary of Andover celebrated last May, and read, because of Mrs. Downs's illness, by Prof. J. W. Churchill. No writer could have been found better equipped, or more sympathetic, for such an utterance as this poem, and every page reveals her exceptional competency both as historian and as poet. Only one who has absorbed the spirit of the town for many years and has been close to the center of its intellectual and moral life could have done justice to the theme, which, while having much in common with the careers of other towns, also possesses special and even unique features. Her easy mastery of varied versification and her literary taste and skill render the poem one of more than ordinary significance, and one of the very best written for such an occasion which we ever have seen. It has been illustrated lavishly and beautifully with views of scenery, including also some taken in the English Andover, from which the town drew its name. It is printed and bound in handsome form, and the thousands scattered all over the land who have associations with Andover will prize it almost, if not quite, as warmly as the fellow-citizens of the author.

Irving's The Alhambra [Macmillan Co. $2.00] has been issued in what probably is the most tempting edition ever brought out, for the charm of the narrative has been increased by drawings from the pen of Joseph Pennell of the different places alluded to, and Mrs. Pennell has supplied an appropriate introduction. The book has reached us too late for holiday notice, but, although it is well adapted to be a holiday gift, its character and value are independent of season.——Italy in the Nineteenth Century and the Making of Austro-Hungary and Germany [A. C. McClurg & Co. $2.50] is another historical work by Elizabeth W. Latimer. To a greater extent than has been true always the author has studied history and imparted it in connection with the lives of great men. We do not mean that she has followed this plan to the exclusion of the examination of principles and the march of events, or that other writers have not adopted the personal method to a considerable extent, but only that in this volume it is conspicuously evident. There is no more graphic way in which to narrate history and the volume is based upon careful study and will take its place as not only historically instructive but more than ordinarily interesting. It is brought down almost to date, although in the latter portion it is open to the inevitable objection that history cannot be written safely until its events have passed somewhat into the distance. The book seems to be temperate, candid and worthy of commendation.

Mr. H. L. Koopman, librarian of Brown University, has embodied the fruits of his observations and experiences in a very serviceable little volume, The Mastery of Books [American Book Co. 90 cents], which consists of studies in reading and the use of libraries. It is judicious and practical throughout, and an important feature is a classified list of works which will prove serviceable to all desiring suggestions in regard to the formation of a library and their own intellectual development.——A Man's Value to Society [F. H. Revell Co. $1.25], by M. D. Hillis, is a series of studies on self-culture and character. We have not found in it much which is inherently novel, but this was hardly to be expected. But for its fresh and vigorous pictures and sometimes decidedly original manner of presenting the author's thoughts it is worthy of praise. Such subjects as the elements of worth in the individual, the physical basis of character, the use of books and reading, the science of living with men, etc., are discussed and the book seems to be one of the most rewarding of its class, and we are glad to recommend it.

MORE JANUARY MAGAZINES.

The advent of a new religious quarterly is, in the case of The American Journal of Theology, an event of no small importance in the current history of the Christian Church. Its list of contributors includes many of the most eminent theological and Biblical scholars in this country and in Europe. Its promise to offer only articles which make some real contribution to theological knowledge is well fulfilled in this first number, an admirably printed quarto of nearly 300 pages. Dr. Bruce of Glasgow writes on Theological Agnosticism, Dr. Gregory of Leipsic on Bernard Weiss and the New Testament, Dr. Briggs of New York on The Scope of Theology and Its Place in the University, Dr. Menzies of St. Andrews on The National History of the Sacred Books, Dr. Sanday of Oxford on The Life and Letters of F. J. A. Hort, and President Strong of Rochester, N. Y., on Recent Tendencies of Theological Thought. Critical Notes on Scriptural words and passages form a valuable department, while reviews of recent theological literature and of important theological articles in periodicals, each review being signed, furnish of themselves a very interesting outline of current religious thought. The scheme of President Harper and his co-workers is an ambitious one, but the array of well-known names of contributors as announced is impressive, and if future numbers are held up to the high standard of this one, this new quarterly will have great influence in shaping the thinking of students of theology and indirectly of the whole Christian Church. It is issued from the University of Chicago Press, at $3 00 per year or 75 cents per number.

The late Dr. G. B. Goode, the naturalist, is the subject of the usual biographical sketch with portrait in the Popular Science Monthly [$5.00]. Hon. D. A. Wells contributes the fifth of his papers on Principles of Taxation. Prof. Angelo Heilprin sums up Our Present Knowledge of the Antarctic Regions effectively. M. E. Ward's paper on Disinfection at Quarantine is of much interest in its way. Dr. W. L. Russell goes once more and to good purpose over the familiar ground indicated by his title, Consumption and Consumptives, and there are ten or a dozen other strong contributions. The editorials are excellent. But not all the "orthodox" by any means deserve the vigorous handling very properly administered to certain individuals in that entitled Anxious Orthodoxy.

The Educational Review [$3.00] has half a dozen sensible articles tersely and tellingly written by competent men. The illiteracy of American Boys is Mr. E. L. Godkin's topic, and his remedy is a change in the relative importance of studies. A. C. Armstrong, Jr., studies Philosophy in American Colleges, concluding that it has regained its former position in university life. W. C. Webster's first paper on Recent Centralizing Tendencies in State Educational Administration also deserves careful heed.

Christian Literature [$3.00] as usual has a couple of specially contributed articles, The Development of Doctrine in the Pre-Christian Church, by G. J. Low, and Prof. B. B. Warfield's eleventh on Augustine and the Pelagian Controversy. The others are well selected.

What is it in The Cosmopolitan [$1.00] which is so especially winning? Most of the leading magazines in these days are very attractive without and within, but more persons probably would pick up The Cosmopolitan first out of a miscellaneous pile of magazines than would select any other. Moreover, whoever takes up this number will not be disappointed in the contents. Striking contributions in one or another way are Murat Halstead's about The Farmers' College, the story of an unsuccessful experiment; The Famous Fête at Vaux, by Elizabeth W. Champney; and Mascagni and His New Opera, by Alma Dalma. Mrs. Sangster's poem, The Old Schoolhouse, also will not be overlooked, and the pictures deserve praise throughout.

The New England Magazine [$3.00] has sent out an uncommonly good number. It calls special attention to W. H. Winslow's account of the famous French architect, Viollet-le-Duc, and his work; to Henrietta E. Hooker's elaborate and most interesting portrayal of the history and work of Mt. Holyoke College; to Frances B. Troup's An English Heroine in the American Revolution, Lady Harriet Acland; and to H. C. Parsons's paper on Greenfield, Mass. These all are lavishly illustrated and full of fresh and forceful material. But the other contents also are commendable, and the article by E. J. Carpenter about The Bay Psalm Book deserves special heed.

Dean Farrar's Reminiscences of Lord Tennyson is the most important paper in the Temple Magazine, and another is a visit to President Kruger, the head of the Orange Free State in South Africa. Mrs. Walford and Mrs. Deland supply stories, and Mr. S. K. Hocking's serial, In Spite of Fate, is continued. Rev. F. B. Meyer furnishes a fine illustrated paper about D. L. Moody, and Mr. P. L. Parker one describing A Day in Canning Town, one of the poorer regions of London. The number is exceedingly interesting.

In Lippincott's [$3 00] the complete story is Stockings Full of Money, by Mary Kyle Dallas. Among the other papers of special interest are these: Are American Institutions of Dutch Origin? by S. J. Fisher; the Western Housekeeper and the Celestial, by Mary Hoskin; South Florida Before the Freeze, by R G. Robinson; and With the Whitefish Nets, by Allan Hendricks. Lippincott's continues to fulfill its adopted mission of providing light literature of a high order most successfully.

The Chautauquan [$2.00] devotes large space, as announced, to French literary matters, Jeanette L. Gilder, Prof. J. A. Harrison, John Gennings and Prof. F. M. Warren supplying papers on the French Academy, in which many portraits of members are included. Henry Houssaye writes about French Literature, and T. B. Preston about the Newspaper and Periodical Press of France. Eugen von Jagow treats of Superstition and Sorcery in French Society. How the Gothenberg System Works, by F. C. Bray, the Actual John Brown, by Dr. A. M. Courtenay, and the Age of the Poster, by Maurice Talmeyer, are three papers under the head of General Reading. The other departments are well filled, and the work of the editors and publishers is well done this time, as usual.

The first number of The Month [The Critic Co. $1.00], edited by J. B. and Jeanette L. Gilder, is of exceptional literary interest and value. It contains signed contributions from Messrs. Aldrich, Stockton, Rev. G. S. Lee, Dr. W. J. Rolfe, Bliss Carman and others, and portraits of Kipling, Pater, Nansen, R. H. Davis, Ian Maclaren, Ada Rehan and others. And its departments on art, music and the drama are as well filled as those more distinctively literary. The promise of a new and superior literary and critical publication seems more than likely to be creditably fulfilled, and such an acceptable candidate for favor cannot fail to receive a hearty welcome.

NOTES.

—— There are now only twenty-four cities or towns in Massachusetts without free public libraries.

—— Mr. Zangwill's successor in the Pall Mall Magazine's department, Without Prejudice, is Mr. A. T. Quiller-Couch, known in literature as "Q."

—— Quo Vadis, Sienkiewicz's novel which came out only two months or so ago and which we regard as the best novel of 1896, already is in its sixth edition.

—— Dr. A. Conan Doyle finds it a wise rule of authorship not to promise a piece of work for the future until he has completed whatever he may be occupied with at the time.

—— The Symposium, a monthly magazine which Mr. George W. Cable started not long ago, is to be discontinued, and Mr. Cable has accepted the editorship of Current Literature.

—— The Boston Athenæum with the co-operation of some other libraries is to compile an index of architectural plates found in artistic, architectural and kindred periodicals.

—— The St. James Gazette says that Queen Victoria is about to dictate and revise her autobiography and that it will appear this year. Certainly it will be an appropriate feature of the special recognition of the length of her reign.

—— A limited edition of a hundred copies of Mr. F. J. Stimson's story, King Noanett, with forty or fifty specially drawn illustrations by Henry Sandham, is soon to be issued at $100 per copy. It will be bound in inlaid leather.

—— The Tom Hughes Memorial Fund now amounts to almost $5 000. It is to be a life-size statue and will be erected at Rugby. No Americans have yet contributed to it. Dr. William Everett of Boston, however, has issued an appeal for gifts.

Rev. Alexander McKenzie, D. D., President; George Gould, Treasurer.

PASSING COMMENT ON THIS WEEK'S NEWS.

Progress among our churches in the far Northeast is noted this week by the first step in self support.

If candidates for membership to our churches could be impressed more deeply with the fact that their best contributions to the spiritual welfare of the church they promise to support are not the only offerings necessary for its prosperity, our treasurers would be spared the necessity, which now becomes their duty in some cases, of reporting that much less than one-half of the members are pledged subscribers to the financial support.

Our second strongest center in the Bay State is indebted in no small degree to the energetic lead of its largest church. The mutual generosity of its members and pastor has been strikingly evidenced of late.

A Michigan pastor has made calls enough in a year to have met personally a large portion of the 13,000 residents of the city in which his field lies.

The hearty co-operation of various denominations in an Iowa church shows Congregationalism to be the solvent of the sects.

How many of our churches mean to deserve the Scriptural commendation applied to the one in the Hawkeye State whose fortieth anniversary we chronicle this week?

May success attend our valued contemporary, Congregational Iowa, in its new home, fresh dress and enlarged circulation.

How convenient and helpful for business men must be that 5 P. M. prayer meeting in Kansas City!

A struggling California church which has just built and dedicated a new edifice specifies among helpful results connected with the achievement these two: "We have learned what true Congregationalism is, through the help and fellowship of sister churches; and the community has learned that it was not competition but co-operation on which we were intent." Such knowledge as this must be of inestimable value in building up its spiritual house.

A suggestion for simplifying the programs of annual meetings comes from Nebraska.

For novel ways of celebrating Christmas consult our Kansas news.

One blessed result of a revival in the Golden State is the healing of a contention between two donominations. Today, as of old, no clearer witness to the presence of the Holy Spirit can be found than is expressed in these words: "Behold, how these brethren love one another."

CONSECRATION OF A GRANITE STATE CHAPEL.

The elegant new chapel built the past season by the South Church, Concord, N. H., was dedicated the evening of Jan. 7, with appropriate ceremony. Nearly 600 persons attended, and greatly appreciated the beauty of the surroundings and the varied and admirable program. It included an eloquent sermon by the pastor, Rev. H. P. Dewey, emphasizing for the church a good foundation, unity in diversity, a fitting adjustment of its parts, thereby giving strength, symmetry, harmony and beauty as it grows into a becoming temple for the Lord. Then followed a responsive service of dedication, a mutual prayer for pastor and people, and an original hymn for the occasion by an octogenarian of the church. The services throughout were impressive and enjoyable. After this followed a reception by Mr. and Mrs. Dewey in the ladies' parlor, a light collation and social hour in the dining-room. The ground area of the structure is 78 x 80 feet. It includes, above the audience-room of the chapel, a ladies' parlor, separated by portières, to be drawn when it is needed to give larger room for chapel purposes, a pastor's study and a library room. Below is the dining-room, with all its needed accessories. The inside finish is in Georgia pine. The entire cost of construction was $13,481, leaving from what was raised by the ladies for the purpose $140, to be used in furnishings. Entire harmony prevailed throughout the work. The people are to be congratulated on the result of their willing gifts.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.

Bangor.

The subject of the Bond Lectures for 1897, to be given by Prof. C. A. Young, Ph. D., of Princeton, is The Cosmos, Astronomically Considered.——During the Christmas recess several of the students preached in churches which they occupied last summer.——The Senior Class has had its opening lecture in pastoral theology, under Prof. J. S. Sewall.

Hartford.

The Junior Class has begun elective work, the Middle Class Homiletics and the courses on The Atonement, and Evolution and the Christian Faith, and the Seniors Ecclesiastical Dogmatics and the History of Congregationalism.——Special missionary meetings were held the first three days of this week under the lead of Mr. Luce, who was appointed by the Inter-Seminary Missionary Alliance to visit the different seminaries.——Several members of the seminary, assisted by friends from the city, gave a pleasant entertainment to the students last Saturday evening.——Mr. Van Dyke of Rutgers gave a lecture on Italian Art of the Renaissance Period last Saturday afternoon at Hosmer Hall. These lectures will be continued on Saturday afternoons in January. The students have been invited to attend.

Yale.

Last week the missionary society was addressed by the secretary of the Inter-Seminary Missionary Alliance.——Mr. Coolidge of the Senior Class is obliged to leave for Florida on account of ill health.——President Dwight is giving lectures on Corinthians to the Juniors. He returned Jan. 2 from an extended European tour.——Professor Curtis begins a new course in Old Testament exegesis, and Professor Brastow begins an elementary course in homiletics with the Juniors.——Mr. Briggs was the Senior Class preacher last week.

Oberlin.

Professor Bosworth offers a new course in special New Testament introduction, including an introduction to all the books, and special exegetical study in English of those books that are not studied in the various courses in Greek exegesis.——Professor Wright gives an elective course this term upon Comparative Religion and a course in Evidences of Christianity. He proposes in this course to use the material of his Lowell lectures.——Professor Gates offers a course in Old Testament Theology, required for students who do not take Hebrew.

Chicago.

The term opened Jan. 4.——Mrs. A. P. Stevens, deputy factory inspector of Illinois, addressed the conference Thursday afternoon on Unemployed Men and Overworked Children.——In connection with the appearance of the new American Journal of Theology it is of interest to know that earnest efforts were made to unite the Baptist, Congregational, Methodist and Presbyterian seminaries in the support of a joint theological review. The unwillingness of some of the professors in one of the seminaries to co-operate prevented the execution of the plan, which evoked much enthusiasm on the part of the other institutions.

CLUBS.

ILL.—The Edwards County Club held its annual meeting, Dec. 31, with Southern Collegiate Institute, Albion. More than 400 persons were present. An hour each was given to a conference of trustees and deacons of all the churches in the county and to one of S. S. superintendents and teachers. Topics were: Congregationalism in Edwards County, Our Power as Congregationalists, Our Hope as Congregationalists, Our Sunday Schools and Their Work. The exercises were interspersed with song and instrumental music.

NEW ENGLAND.

Boston.

Shawmut. Dr. W. E. Barton preached last Sunday morning on different kinds of sinners and different ways of saving them. Referring to recent remarks of evangelists concerning churches in Boston he said, very wisely, that while there may be men in the churches living immoral lives he did not know of any such, and that whoever speaks as though they were common or in any sense representative of the spirit of our churches speaks falsely and slanders the bride of Christ.

Berkeley Temple. The annual meeting last Monday brought cause for rejoicing in the report of the treasurer to the effect that the income of the year more than met the expenses, leaving a balance in the treasury.

BRIGHTON.—Rev. Dr. A. A. Berle delivered the sermon at the Lodge of Sorrow held by Knights Templars at the First Parish Congregational Church, Charlestown, last Sunday, in memory of their deceased members.

Massachusetts.

BROOKLINE.—Harvard. The church and congregation gave the pastor, Dr. Reuen Thomas, a pleasant New Year's reception, Jan. 5, in the parlors of the meeting house.——Leyden. This young church is steadily growing, its career of less than three months being marked by unusual enthusiasm and harmony among the members. There were three accessions at the last communion. The family character of the church may be indicated by the fact that last Sunday four generations of a single family were represented in the congregation.

CHELSEA.—First has recently become incorporated, its governing body now being a board of 15 directors. The new year began with special services during the Week of Prayer, preparatory to a three weeks' series of special union meetings with a neighboring Baptist and Methodist church. Miss E. W. Greenwood, superintendent of evangelistic work in the W. C. T. U., is assisting in the work.

SOMERVILLE.—West has become incorporated. The building presents an attractive and beautiful appearance. Nearly every seat on the floor has been rented. The pastor, Rev. Peter MacQueen, has begun a series of meetings on The Claims of Christianity in the Thought and Work of the World.

Gardner.—First held a successful roll-call and supper Jan. 7. About 300 were present. Reports were followed by a few earnest words from the former pastor, Rev. F. E. Ramsdell.

North Reading.—Union joined with the two other churches of the town for Christmas exercises and the Week of Prayer. The Ladies' Aid and C. E. Societies have both held successful occasions of a social nature of late. The pastor is Rev. E. E. Colburn, formerly pastor of the Christian denomination.

Magnolia.—The Week of Prayer was anticipated by a week of revival services. Two persons were added to the church, Jan. 3, on confession and two by letter. Increasing spiritual interest encourages the workers. Rev. J. E. Enman is pastor.

Boxboro.—Rev. A. B. Peabody, for five years pastor, resigned at the annual meeting. The church requested by vote that he remain, and he has accepted.

Lowell.—The Week of Prayer was more generally observed than usual, the churches having hitherto found the Passion Week more convenient for special services.——Pawtucket, First Trinitarian, Kirk Street, High Street and Highland have held well-attended meetings each evening, and the First is holding such services this week. In addition union meetings have been held each afternoon in the Y. M. C. A. hall, Rev. W. A. Bartlett representing the Congregationalists among the leaders.

Franklin.—First held its annual meeting, supper and roll-call Jan. 1. The reports indicated a healthy growth during the year, 30 members having been added to the church, 23 on confession. For benevolence $532 were contributed and $10,700 used in current expenses. The Sunday school and Y. P. S. C. E. have made encouraging increase in membership. Rev. C. W. Longren is pastor.

Norwood has had a year of prosperity with a happy combination of social and spiritual life. During the year 41 new members have been received. The S. S. primary department of 115 members is notable for its excellent work and the home department has been efficient in increasing the interest. With modern equipment, fine choir and well organized departments the church has a hopeful outlook. Many generous gifts of money have been given for benevolent purposes. The pastor is Rev. C. F. Weeden.

Worcester.—Old South, the largest church in the city, closed a year of unparalleled prosperity with a membership of 894 and began the new year by receiving 37 new members, 22 on confession. The additions last year were 75. The total benevolences were $2,800. The S. S. departments number five with a total of 710 members and an average attendance of 475. The three C. E. Societies enroll 225 members. The Ladies' Benevolent Society enrolls 127 members, and has contributed $430 toward the church debt and $163 to benevolence. The Ladies' Missionary Society reports 65 members, $235 and three valuable barrels of clothing given to missions. The Little Light Bearers number 80 members and have sent $60 to Capron Hall, India. The A. E. Associates, a band of young men for purely spiritual work, has 32 members and is specially active. The Men's Union, organized two months ago, has 180 members. At the parish meeting, Jan. 5, it was unanimously voted to increase the salary of the pastor, Dr. A. Z. Conrad, $1,000, and extend his vacation from four to six weeks, but he has refused to accept the increase in salary, stating that it is not money but enlargement of the church he wants, and that under the present financial stress of the country and benevolent societies it would be injudicious for him to accept an increase.——Park has added 30 to its membership the past year, 18 on confession, and has a present membership of 219. Benevolences amounted to $350. The S. S. membership has gained 70 and numbers 330. The Church Helpers report 1,200 calls made ——Piedmont. The resignation of Dr. Elijah Horr, to take effect July 1, at the end of four years of service, was a surprise not only to his congregation but to the entire city, where he has become greatly appreciated.

West Brookfield.—Last year's benevolences amounted to nearly $900. The Dorcas Society gave clothing and other things valued at $200 to home missions. Deacon Curtis Gilbert has retired after 20 years of service.

Winchendon.—First was encouraged by the addition of six young people on confession the first Sunday of the new year, making 32 additions during this pastorate. Rev. G. W. Jones is pastor.

Oxford has just passed its most prosperous year for a long time, all services being better attended. Twelve new members were added on confession and three by letter. The benevolences were $791. The Sunday evening service is evangelistic in character. The pastor is Rev. A. E. Bradstreet. At the annual supper a large number of the members responded.

Palmer.—Second has had a new system of finance this year and for the first time for a long period it closed the year wholly out of debt. It has also made a final clearing of its roll. The Protestant churches have united this month in a general effort to reach the whole town, sending out printed greetings to the Christian people, stating the conviction that the time has come to unite in a persistent, earnest effort. The Week of Prayer was a time of special preparation for the undertaking.

Springfield.—First. Rev. F. L. Goodspeed is preaching evangelical sermons on the Prodigal Son, followed by after meetings. The attendance is large. The kindergarten class of the Sunday school has grown into a distinct department, and has just received a piano in memory of a deceased member of the school. A special service was held the first Sunday in January for the promotion of S. S. classes. The school is being slowly graded.——Eastern Avenue. A revised manual has recently been completed, also a directory, the latter presenting several items of interest: a historic statement and pastoral letter, etc, being among them. The congregations are steadily growing and spiritual interest is manifest. The C. E. Society gave over 20 members into the church during the past year. A kindergarten department has been added to the Sunday school. Rev. R. H. Bosworth is pastor.

North Adams.—A new gilded cross, larger than the former, has been erected on the spire of the meeting house. It adds not a little to the beauty of the edifice and shows distinctly from a distance.

Maine.

Bangor.—First observed its 86th annual meeting with interesting exercises. After the business period an abundant collation followed and the program of addresses included helpful topics. The pastor is Rev. C. H. Cutler.——Central has just held its 50th annual meeting, Rev. John S. Penman, pastor. The vestry has been much improved the past year. A bountiful spread was enjoyed. A high tribute was paid to the sexton who served this church during nearly all its history. He died the past year. The additions last year numbered 16 on confession, 6 by letter.

Woodford feels the need of the enlargement of its building. The increase of the S. S. primary department has necessitated larger accommodations there. A new room for the library has been finished in one of the towers, at a cost of $100. A successful course of entertainments under the direction of the Ladies' Circle has just closed and with the proceeds new carpets are to be provided for the social rooms. This is the ninth year of Rev. E. P. Wilson's pastorate.

Durham.—The supplying of preaching under the care of a committee of Cumberland North Conference has gone on since early in the summer. Most of the work has been done Sunday afternoons by the pastors of the conference. Seven pastors have served from one to four times each, but at present some of the supplies are drawn from the Bowdoin College faculty or students. At least nine graduates of Bangor Seminary are pursuing undergraduate studies in Bowdoin.

Gray closed its first financial year under the present pastor, Rev. E. M. Cousins, with gratifying results. While the expenditures have been nearly double those of recent years, the annual meeting found all bills paid and a balance in the treasury. The pastor has been invited to remain another year.

Island Falls.—Whittier Memorial is the first church in Aroostook County to assume self-support and considering the hard times this was unexpected news to the Maine Missionary Society. The church has a new and commodious house and a convenient new parsonage. The pastor is Rev. H. H. Noyes.

Waterville.—The new pastor, Rev. E. L. Marsh, has begun work, and received a New Year's greeting at the annual supper and roll-call. On the resignation of the former pastor, Rev. G. Y. Washburn, the church passed an appreciative expression of respect for him as pastor and preacher.

Rev. I. S. Jones has closed his labors at Pownal. ——Farmington Falls has received a 500 pound bell from Mr. Leonard Atwood of Philadelphia.——North Bridgton had the gift of a beautiful chandelier last month from a former member.

New Hampshire.

Exeter.—First. At the annual meeting 60 answered to the roll-call. Eight have united with the church, four on confession. The benevolences amounted to nearly $3,100.——Second. During the past year 12 new members were received, eight on confession. The benevolent contributions were $1,285. The location of the contemplated edifice has not yet been definitely fixed, as the town has raised objection to its proposed location on account of injury to its property thereby certain to accrue.

Hillsboro Bridge.—During the past year the average morning congregation has more than doubled, showing an increasing interest and prosperity. Rev. F. G. Love is conducting a series of union evangelistic services this month. Rev. F. W. Burrows is pastor.

Peterboro.—Union. The annual meeting was one of the best. The reports were satisfactory and a small financial obligation was easily met. The roll call and annual dinner were well attended and enjoyed. The pastor is Dr. W. H. Gane.

Acworth had a large attendance at the annual gathering and many kindly greetings were exchanged. A generous feast was provided. Congregational Work is being well taken. Rev. C. O. Parker is pastor.

Nashua.—First. A service was held Jan. 10, commemorating the recent death of Rev. J. P. Pillsbury, whose home was here before he went to California for his health. Last year nearly $1,900 were raised.

Keene.—Second had 42 additions last year, 22 on confession. The Week of Prayer was well attended and helpful. Increasing interest was manifest.

Bennington has gained six members the past year. Expenditures for the year were $808, besides the cost of repairing the edifice.

Vermont.

The birthday party in Benson given by the ladies netted about $200.——The Ladies' Aid Society in Jericho has voted to buy a new organ and new hymn-books for the church.

Connecticut.

West Hartford.—W. H. Hall, for 17 years secretary of the Connecticut S. S. Association and one of its most efficient field workers, has resigned, as it will not be convenient for him to do the work from a New Haven office, as planned by the new committee, and under a reduced salary. His action is learned with universal regret.

Norwalk.—First. New Year's eve the ladies of the church tendered a reception to Rev. Dr. and Mrs. T. K. Noble. At the conclusion of the reception the annual meeting of the society was held and the pews sold for the ensuing year. A deficit of a few hundred dollars in the current expenses was removed in a few minutes by spontaneous subscriptions, except $100 which has since been contributed by absent members. During the past year the C. E. Society raised $1,000 and paid for a new roof and the painting of the edifice on the outside.

Hartford.—South. The annual reports show that larger collections have been made during the past year for the reduction of the debt and for charities than during any previous year.——Glenwood. The second annual report shows the church well started and the outlook is hopeful. A small debt has been raised during the year, and 22 new members added.

New Haven.—United. The Men's Club service, Jan. 3, was addressed by Mrs. A. N. Lincoln of Boston and Mr. R. W. Gilder, editor of the Century, on The Housing of the People. Last Sunday evening Mr. T. H. Russell delivered an address on Toleration.

Falls Village has had a helpful revival. Fifty persons have accepted Christ. Whole families are converted. The work began by holding meetings in the schoolhouses. Neighboring pastors have rallied to assist. Rev. C. W. Hanna is pastor.

Rockville.—Union had a large attendance at the annual roll-call, and 282 members responded. The church is in a prosperous condition. The new pastor is Rev. C. E. McKinley. Since last June the women have collected $1,300, by small monthly subscriptions, towards payment of a debt of $6,000 on the church building.

Windsor Locks.—At the annual meeting last week the various reports were full of interest and showed growth. Deacon Hayden read a paper giving some valuable reminiscences of the early history of the church. He alone of the organizers of the church is living. Rev. Richard Wright is pastor.

At the annual roll-call in Chaplin 121 members out of 139 responded.——Putnam sent away two barrels last year valued at about $80.——Rev. W. C. Martyn preached lately with great satisfaction in the First Church, Derby, for his father, Rev. S. S. Martyn.——Chester gave $613 for missions last year.——The Ridgefield C. E. Society has secured five-year pledges enough to provide for the church debt.——West Woodstock has called Rev. Frank

Rand, a returned missionary who was driven from one of the islands in the Mediterranean by the cruelty of the Spaniards.——Stratford reports a balance in the treasury for the year just passed.——Fairfield gave $1,300 for charitable work in 1896.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

SYRACUSE.—Plymouth, Rev. E. N. Packard, D.D., pastor, recently had a band of Christian workers from New York city to assist in the Week of Prayer. A large attendance resulted.——Danforth, Rev. H. A. Manchester, pastor, has had evangelistic meetings, conducted by Rev. M. S Rees, which were largely attended and will continue another week.——Good Will, Rev H. N. Kinney, pastor, has been making a considerable payment on its debt, a part of the amount being the proceeds from the Ian Maclaren lecture.

ROCHESTER.—Plymouth, Rev. W. F. Kettle, pastor, is making encouraging progress. Prof. J. P. Silvernail, of the theological seminary, has organized a young men's S. S. class, which is one of the popular features of the church. The pastor has also recently started a class that promises well. The mid-week prayer meeting has been recently revived, and the spirit is excellent. The morning congregations are steadily increasing. The Endeavor Societies are flourishing.

ORIENT.—This oldest church in the State at its annual meeting had encouraging reports. Additions last year numbered 25, all but two on confession. The benevolences amounted to $538. The roll-call was responded to quite generally. Rev. J. N. Taft is pastor.

CORNING shows great zeal in building a large edifice in these hard times, and is being spiritually and financially prospered. The exterior of the building is nearly finished and the whole is rapidly approaching completion. The pastor is Rev. N. E. Fuller.

BROOKLYN.—Plymouth, at its adjourned annual meeting last week, had an hour of practical illustrations and reports from its various departments. Dr. Lyman Abbott, the pastor, discussed the work of the future.

CHENANGO FORKS.—While the pastor and his family were absent at prayer meeting New Year's eve some friends gathered at the parsonage with many beautiful gifts.

BINGHAMTON.—Plymouth held evangelistic services during the Week of Prayer with the assistance of Rev. Thomas Clayton of Boston. Good results followed.

NEW YORK.—Manhattan. The quarterly report of the trustees shows a balance of $500 on hand after all expenses have been paid.

Sixty-five per cent. of the resident members responded to the annual roll-call of the West Bloomfield church.——The annual meeting in Wellsville showed advance in all departments last year.——The new pastor at Sidney, Rev. W. T. Edds, has begun work.——Each attendant at worship in Norwich Jan. 3, received a gift from the pastor, Rev. W. H. Scudder.

New Jersey.

CHATHAM.—The Ladies' Society has sent away a missionary box valued at $60. At Christmas the Junior Society packed a box of presents, valued at about $5, for the New York Flower Mission for sick and poor children. New Year's Day the pastor and his wife gave a reception to the congregation.

NUTLEY.—At the annual meeting a check for $90 was given the pastor, Rev. J. A. Fairley, by the congregation. The church expects to build on its newly secured lot in the spring.

PASSAIC.—Rev. W. I. Sweet begins this week a series of fortnightly addresses, illustrated by stereopticon, on his bicycle tour through Europe last summer.

EAST ORANGE.—First has received 15 new members. A recent pleasant occasion was a sleigh-ride social, under the auspices of the young people.

THE INTERIOR.

Ohio.

CLEVELAND ministers at the January meeting discussed: What Should We Expect from the Week of Prayer? with an opening address by Rev. Dr. H. A. Schauffler.——Most of the churches held special services last week, but an increasing number defer them until just before Easter.——Union in its 10 years' history has not lost a member by death until recently, when it was bereaved greatly by the death of a prominent member. The Sunday school now exceeds the seating capacity of the building.——Trinity observed the Week of Prayer with special meetings for men, women, young people and many of its older S. S. classes, in addition to the usual evening gatherings.——Under the untiring leadership of Dr. H. A. Schauffler of Bethlehem Church a promising new work has been started among the Magyars, the ruling race of Hungary, which is largely represented in Cleveland. Services are held in a building of the Evangelical Association, with assistance on Sundays from students in Oberlin Seminary. Prayer meetings are held in private dwellings. At some of the Polish meetings, conducted by Rev. John Dessup, many children from a new independent Polish Catholic Church attend with the full approval of their priest, who joins in patriotic meetings with the Congregational pastor.——Hough Avenue, after six years in the present building, finds it entirely too small for its growing congregation and Sunday school. It has purchased a new lot, 110 by 210 feet, about 400 feet west of its present location, and hopes to proceed at once with a new structure. The old lot is worth for business purposes not less than four times as much as it cost seven years ago and the removal will provide a balance of several thousand dollars toward the new edifice. The church has grown during the three years' pastorate of Rev. C. W. Carroll from 270 to 470 members. As a beginning of institutional work classes are conducted this winter in English literature, sociology and German. The new house will have a gymnasium and facilities for various lines of institutional work.

COLUMBUS.—Eastwood will be supplied for the present by Rev. Dr. J. C. Jackson, D. D., a prominent Methodist minister of the city, who is temporarily engaged in local benevolent work.

ROCKPORT is prospering under Rev. C. W. Rice. It has a strong C. E. Society, which raised over $100 last year for repairs on the building.

Illinois.

CHICAGO.—Green Street. Rev. J. P. Burling has resigned with the conviction that having been in his present field two years it would be better for another to cultivate it. The separation takes place with the best of feeling. The church was established by the City Missionary Society and although it has had an extraordinary growth it is not very strong financially.

JOY PRAIRIE closed the year without a deficit, as usual, and kept up well its benevolent record. In view of removals and financial losses not so much can be expected the coming year.

Bowen has just completed a parsonage costing nearly $2,500 without incurring debt.——Chandlerville is making similar provision for its pastor.

Indiana.

INDIANAPOLIS.—Mayflower at its annual meeting had an attendance which was a large proportion of the membership. Written reports from all departments showed the year to have been one of harmonious activity. Rev. J. W. Wilson is in his sixth year as pastor. During this time the church has relocated at a distance of a mile from its old site, purchased a lot for $7,500 and erected a substantial brick building which, when the main house is built, will serve as a chapel. The membership is now a little upwards of 200. The receipts for expenses last year were about $3,000, and the benevolences were $400. A small deficit was promptly made up at the annual meeting. The additions last year numbered 17.——Southside has taken on new life since Rev. F. E. Jeffery came in August. A strong Ladies' Aid Society, a large S. S. attendance and flourishing Y. P. S. C. E. and Juniors are good signs. A birthday party recently netted $30, and the ladies have raised $100.

ALEXANDRIA.—The new church is prospering under the efficient lead of Prof. J. C. Smith formerly of Butler College. He is much beloved and the congregations are growing. Worship is held in a vacant storeroom. Mrs. Haskell and Miss A. E. Sanborn of Michigan City have made gifts towards a lot. There are now 14 factories in the town with 4,500 employés part of the time. Singing books are needed and the church will pay expressage upon them.

HARRISON COUNTY churches, numbering three, located below Louisville, are now under the efficient lead of Rev. E. W. Murray. A new parsonage at Central has been erected and paid for without aid. The churches are being thoroughly organized for work.

Michigan.

GRAND RAPIDS.—The seven churches begin the year with courage. Their total membership is 1,700 and the total S. S. enrollment 2,400. Every church is well manned and the pastors meet weekly for conference.——First has made a net gain of 15 members besides sending out a swarm of 12 to form the seventh church and sustaining a loss of 20 by death. It has put $3,000 into improvements and paid off $2,000 of its parsonage debt. It has contributed $700 to build the Barker and East Churches, spent $300 in its Sunday school missions, $1,100 each in city missions and State home missions and $800 for foreign missions. The total benevolences aggregate nearly $8,000 and the home expenses $11,500. Its total S. S. enrollment is over 1,000.——Second rejoices in the eighth year of its pastor, Rev. J. T. Husted. It has gained seven members, has paid all its expenses and maintained its regular benevolences.——Barker Memorial, whose house and lot are a gift from First Church, began its independent existence Dec. 31 with 14 members and no debt, and a Sunday school of 120. It is located in a populous section a mile from any English-speaking church. A young layman, Mr. Van A. Wallin, has been the chief promoter of the enterprise. The pastor is Rev. C. I. Taylor.

DETROIT.—Seven of the nine churches observed communion this month, six receiving new members aggregating 64.——Old First received 26.——Brewster has had an encouraging year. Though it is the youngest church, it is fast becoming one of the strongest in the city. All departments of work are being pushed forward.——The latest monthly Ministers' Meeting had as the topic Conversation. The Round Table was entertaining and instructive.

PORT HURON.—Ross Memorial, organized less than a year ago, has now 91 members and a large Sunday school. It has started and maintains two mission schools with an aggregate enrollment of 200. The church is practically self-supporting. Rev. B. F. Brundage has made 4,300 pastoral calls during the year.

SAULT STE. MARIE.—Progress has marked the year just closed. There has been a steady increase of members, activity and consecration in all departments, and a newly formed Men's Sunday Evening League has been vigorous.

Wisconsin.

BELOIT.—The Week of Prayer was begun with a union fellowship meeting of deep interest, five churches of different denominations co-operating.——Second had a roll-call of the entire membership in connection with its annual meeting. The attendance was large, and letters from absent members were a feature of tender interest. The Endeavor Society served refreshments during the social hour that followed, and a series of half-hour watch night meetings brought to its close one of the most delightful and inspiring meetings ever held by this church. Sixty new members were added in 1896, 52 on confession.

MILWAUKEE.—Hanover Street, Rev. S. S. Mathews, pastor, had a pleasant review of the year Jan. 6. Besides paying the current expenses of the year, a mortgage debt was reduced by $4,100 and a floating indebtedness incurred several years ago by $400. Twenty-three new members have been received, a Boys' Brigade has lately been organized, the Ladies' Union has earned nearly $1,500, the two sewing schools showed a membership of 203, and the various other organizations seemed in usual activity. The pastor has lately started a Bible class, which meets in the main auditorium.

PLATTEVILLE.—Last year 46 accessions were received. During the Week of Prayer evangelistic services were conducted by the pastor, Rev. C. A. Wight.

THE WEST.

Missouri.

ST. LOUIS.—First and Pilgrim united in observing the Week of Prayer. Ballington Booth spoke to a large congregation in the latter church Jan. 3.——Hyde Park. The pastor, Dr. W. M. Jones, estimates that 50 persons professed conversion during the recent union services, about 15 of whom have united with this church.

KANSAS CITY.—All the Congregational churches in the city united in afternoon services during the Week of Prayer. held at 5 o'clock in the edifice of First Church, which is near the center of the business section.

Iowa.

BLAIRSBURG.—This church, five years old, with a membership of about 100, stands alone in a village of about 300 persons. Its first meeting-house, small and plain, was outgrown long ago by the congregations. Now a beautiful edifice, seating comfortably 300 persons and costing nearly $3,000, has been built, and was dedicated Dec. 27. Rev. A. W. Moore, the pastor, was assisted in the services by Rev. T. M. Price of Iowa Falls and Sec. T. O. Douglass, the former preaching the sermon, the latter raising $800, the sum needed to free the building of debt. At the evening service $300 were raised toward the debt on the parsonage. The various sects in the community cordially join in carrying forward this work.

MCGREGOR celebrated its 40th anniversary Jan. 3, 4. The pastor preached a memorial sermon Sunday morning, and letters were read in the evening from former pastors and members. Monday evening the program included papers on The History of the Church, The Day of Small Things, The Sunday School, The Choir, The Woman's Missionary Society. This is one of the solid churches of the State, "steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord."

SLATER.—Among the presents distributed at the Christmas festival was one to the church itself, which was a general surprise. Mrs. H. S. Caswell, of the C. H. M. S., learning that the pastor had asked Secretary Douglass for a second-hand communion service, asked the privilege of furnishing a set. The gift is heartily appreciated.

CORRECTIONVILLE, Rev. J. B. Chase, pastor, observed its fifth anniversary Dec. 28, in connection with the annual business meeting. Its struggles have been rewarded with a fair degree of prosperity. The membership has grown from seven to nearly 100, and a comfortable house of worship has been secured.

Congregational Iowa, which has been published monthly at Grinnell for the past 13 years, now moves to Des Moines. The sheet is to be enlarged, the form changed and the issue doubled. The editors are Sec. T. O. Douglass, Dr. A. L. Frisbie and Rev. Benjamin St. John.

CRESTON.—The Men's Club, organized a few months ago, is studying sociological problems and helping to solve the problem of the Sunday evening service. A fair recently held by the Ladies' Aid Society netted over $100. Rev. D. P. Breed, D. D., is pastor.

SIOUX CITY.—The pastor, Rev. M. W. Darling, never allows his people to forget Forefathers' Day. Though the church has lost more members the past year than in any previous one, its roll shows exactly the same number as a year ago.

The energies of the church at Hampton are largely concentrated on the building, which nears completion. Fifteen members united in 1896.

A powerful revival, with growing interest, is in progress at Salem, under the care of Evangelist Hartsough.——Meetings are also held at Thompson, led by Evangelist Fred B. Smith.——Special services at Hiteman, in which the pastor, Rev. Owen Thomas, was assisted by Rev. J. S. Norris, resulted in over 30 accessions.——At Quasqueton union meetings, under Evangelist Cordner, have been marked by over 15 conversions in Congregational families.

Minnesota.

MINNEAPOLIS.—Robbinsdale. More money has been raised this year than heretofore. The benevolences especially have increased. The church is making a steady growth under Rev. S. J. Rogers.——Bethany. The pastor's evangelistic band held meetings for two weeks with conversions and the quickening of members. Five persons were admitted on confession. The church is well organized for work, the lookout committee for strangers being especially useful.——Thirty-eighth Street Mission. The house of worship has been enlarged and rededicated, Pres. Cyrus Northrop giving the address. Rev. A. P. Lyon is serving here.——Plymouth. Dr. D. N. Beach made a flying trip East, returning for the January communion, at which 17 persons were received into the church, six upon confession.——Lyndale, upon petition of the families in a district just vacated by a Presbyterian church, has opened a branch Sunday school.——Hartland, which has been practically dead for years, has been reorganized with the addition of eight members and the prospect of permanent preaching and growth in the future. It is supplied by Rev. F. H. Oehler of New Richland.

WALKER.—The work has opened favorably under the pastorate of Mr. W. A. Kennedy. This being the only church in the place, it is attended by all classes. The residents assisted in the Christmas exercises and a present was given to every child in town.

LYLE is greatly strengthened by securing the new $1,000 parsonage. The Sunday school, which has been a union movement, is now under Congregational control. Congregations are increasing and the church is planning for a large spiritual advance.

HIBBING.—Rev. C. B. Fellows, who has been commissioned as general missionary, is in charge here. Work has been interrupted for some time and the financial condition of the country has affected the community unfavorably.

Kansas.

OLATHE.—On Christmas Eve, the 20th wedding anniversary of Rev. D. R. Steiner and wife, they entertained their people at the parsonage. During the evening a number of the guests secretly took possession of the kitchen, and substituted a fine range for the old cook-stove. In the dining-room they set a new table, fully furnished, from snowy linen to finger bowls, and arranged other valuable presents about the room. After recovering from their surprise the host and hostess expressed their hearty thanks.

ONEIDA, which lost its building by cyclone last May, recently dedicated a new one of modern style, which pastor and people have worked heroically to procure. Including pledges on dedication day and gifts expected from other churches, the cost of rebuilding is substantially provided for. State Evangelist Veazie began a series of meetings in the new edifice the day following its dedication.

TOPEKA.—Central spent Christmas Eve in an unusual and profitable way. A social for old and young was held, with an inexpensive entertainment. But a debt of $611 was quickly wiped out with cash. The year has been prosperous in all respects, and new spiritual fervor is observable since the debt was paid.

LAWRENCE.—Plymouth observed the Week of Prayer with more than usual fervor.——Pilgrim has held special meetings, with five conversions and growing interest.

Nebraska.

CRETE.—Rev. M. W. Morse, pastor, finding that the various activities of the church have so multiplied that it is impossible to bring their reports and the business of the annual meeting within the compass of a single evening, has adopted a new plan this year. The reports having to do with the spiritual interests of the church were given Sunday evening, Jan. 3, those dealing with finances and other business being deferred until the following evening. The various societies reported a year of progress; 29 persons have united during the year, 14 on confession. The roll has been revised, and many persons absent for years have been persuaded to take letters. Hence the membership reported, 301, is somewhat less than a year ago. Though a small deficit appeared in current expenses, owing largely to the long interim between the death of Rev. W. P. Bennett in March and the coming of the present pastor, it was understood that this amount would be raised in a few days.

Colorado.

LONGMONT.—Rev. H. E. Thayer has resigned, to take effect Feb. 1. During his seven years' pastorate the church has grown, and a new building has been erected. He has a strong hold upon the young people, has taken great interest in the country in and about Longmont, and through his efforts a church was organized at Ward, a gold-mining camp.

SILVERTON has had a prosperous year under Rev. W. T. Jordan. The membership has more than doubled during his pastorate, and the benevolences amounted to $222 the past year.

HARTLAND, Minn., reorganized with eight additional members, 15 in all.

Miscellaneous.

BOYER, Virgil O., a graduate of Pacific Sem., will supply First Ch., Marietta, O., until March 15, when the pastorate of Rev. J. R. Nichols will begin.
FAIRBANKS, Francis J., and wife of Royalston, Mass., gave a New Year's reception to the people of First Ch. The attendance was unusually large.
FRENCH, Geo. H., and wife, Westmoreland, N. H., celebrated their silver anniversary Dec. 28. Among the gifts was a generous sum of money from the church.
HAYWARD, John S., who recently closed work at Benson, Minn., has removed to California.
KEBBE, David L., Emmanuel Ch., Springfield, Mass., was given a New Year's surprise party by 75 parishioners and friends, which proved a social and happy occasion.
MANK, Herbert G., of New Gloucester, Me., who broke his leg in November, was able to be carried to the church, Jan. 3, and to conduct the services.
McCALLUM, J. W., the pastor at Charlevoix, Mich., has been seriously ill with la grippe, in which all the members of his family unfortunately shared. All are convalescent and the pastor has been voted a short vacation to recuperate.
REID, Matt. D., has closed his labors at Gardner, N. D., and is invited to supply at Dawson.
TEAD, Edward S., and wife tendered a New Year's reception to their parishioners of Prospect Hill Ch., Somerville, Mass.
TOTTEN, Matt J., formerly of Rose Valley, N. D., is spending the winter with friends at Virden, Manitoba. Rev. M. H. Mayer (Bapt.), of Cleveland, O., is supplying the pulpit temporarily.
WEBSTER, Franklin G., and wife of Oswego Falls, N. Y., sailed for Bermuda Dec. 30. During their absence the pulpit will be supplied by Rev. Mr. Young of Oswego.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES.

Iowa workers, who have labored much among prisoners, are turning their attention to helping them after they are at liberty. They also propose to put Bibles, the Colportage Library and other books and papers in each county jail.

Extracts from the State laws as to Sabbath breaking, liquor selling and other evils are furnished the Florida societies by the superintendents of Christian citizenship work, together with an appeal that the societies see that these laws are enforced.

Two buildings, with a capacity of 17,000–18,000, have been secured for the San Francisco convention, and choruses are forming in different cities in California. The number of members on the different committees varies from five for the transportation committee to 900 for the reception committee. The Trans-Pacific Steamship Company has offered a special round-trip rate for the benefit of missionaries in China and Japan.

MR. MOODY'S BOSTON CAMPAIGN.

Mr. Moody says that he is pleased, very much gratified in fact, with the result of his first week of labor in Boston, and as the second week begins there are no signs of any setback. Tremont Temple has been crowded every afternoon, and there have been but few seats vacant at any of the morning meetings. Many of the attendants are women, as was to be expected, but they have not preponderated, and of those present not a few have given evidence of conversion or reconsecration. The choir, led by Professor Burke, has done well, and may be expected to develop even greater capacity to lead the great audiences.

The platform usually has been filled with clergymen from churches in and around Boston, Drs. Lansing, Little, Plumb, Thomas and other of our own churches being present to show their sympathy with Mr. Moody.

Mr. Moody has devoted the morning hours to exhortations calculated by him to increase reverence for the Bible as the infallible Word of God, and intended to provoke his hearers to more diligent study of the Bible and greater reliance upon it as a rule of daily conduct. At the afternoon sessions Prayer, Its Qualities and Powers, have been described, and a spirit of prayer awakened which has converted the vast audiences into prayer meetings throbbing with spiritual power.

In discussing these great subjects Mr. Moody has not used methods or advanced arguments which indicate that he has essentially changed since he last labored in Boston. He has the same unquestioning faith in God, in God's word and God's accessibility through the prayer of the penitent sinner or loving child that he used to have, and he sets forth his belief in the same blunt, and for many winning, way.

He has much to say about the dearth of spiritual life in the church and hard hits for sinners in high ecclesiastical places, all of which is true and needs to be said, and as said by Mr. Moody it can be taken as the faithful counsel of a genuine friend of the church. But as much cannot be said for the utterances of Sam Jones of Georgia, whom fate has brought to Boston at the same time to parade his vulgar scoldings.

Thus far the attendants at the meetings have contributed generously to defray the expense incurred, so generously that Friday afternoon Mr. Moody felt free to set aside the collection then taken to help him in his work of putting tracts and pious literature in the hands of all the incarcerated criminals in this country—a work, by the way, into which he is entering with all his heart and from which marked spiritual results have already come.

In fact, Mr. Moody just now is in love with the printing press and disposed to use its product lavishly for Christ. Hence his successful efforts to get and keep in touch with the daily press, which of late has shown unwonted zeal in reporting his addresses and spreading broadcast his views, so that rightly to estimate the influence of the work he is now doing you must trace to every remotest hamlet in New England the journals which go forth by the million each morning from Boston. The Journal each day has had a special message from Mr. Moody.

The attendance and enthusiasm on Monday of this week showed that the tide is still rising. Mr. Moody had spent the Sunday in New York addressing great mass meetings, but was as fresh and vigorous when he stepped on the Tremont Temple platform as if he had spent the Lord's Day resting. Professor Towner, who has worked so many years with Mr. Moody, is to have charge for the present of the chorus.

After the afternoon service, in response to a special summons from Mr. Moody, 300 or more local ministers met him for a conference. He submitted to them the question as to whether it is advisable to continue the present plan of day meetings only. General sentiment favored its continuance.

An amusing incident of this after-gathering arose from the effort of a Boston paper to secure a picture of the group of clergymen. When they were about to assume the proper facial expression some one shouted out, "Is this for the Sunday edition?" The man at the camera not responding definitely, the body rose with one accord and disintegrated so rapidly that the picture, if taken at all, must have been a curious affair.

To me the modern newspaper is so vast and comprehensive that I can never contemplate its possibilities without becoming both interested and enthusiastic in the subject. Why, to be a real, capable and worthy journalist—wise, honorable and efficient—is to attain the highest plane of human opportunity and usefulness. To love and proclaim truth for truth's sake, to disseminate knowledge and useful information, to correct misimpressions, to enlighten the misinformed, to "feed an expectant and anxious people" with the occurrences of the world daily—indeed, almost hourly—to discover and correct abuses, to fairly and honorably advocate a great cause, in short, to mold and direct public opinion, which is always the mission of journalism, is surely the noblest of professions.—Hon. William McKinley.

Mistaken.

In a bric-a-brac shop, half hidden among a heap of statues, furniture, cabinets, armor and trappings, a woman who was looking for curiosities noticed a quaint figure, the head and shoulders of which appeared above the counter.

"What is that Japanese idol over there worth?" She inquired.

The salesman replied, in a subdued tone: "Worth about $50,000, madam; it's the proprietor."

You see even art connoisseurs are sometimes led astray. But there is no chance of a mistake in regard to this table. Its genuine oddity is unmistakable.

From its veined Flemish top down through the old Dutch carved legs to the ball feet the true flavor is all there. The inside finish is bird's eye maple. The corners and edges are all rounded. The top measures 49 inches by 31 inches. The great lower shelf is but little less in capacity.

This is one of over fifty new patterns.

DRUMTOCHTY IDEALS RUTHLESSLY SHATTERED.

Mr. Clifton Johnson's description, in The Congregationalist of Dec. 3, of Logiealmond, the "Drumtochty" of Ian Maclaren, has shattered at one blow many ideals. How I loved to read of this delightful glen, and well-nigh worshiped Weelum MacLure and the saintly Marget Howe. I could almost forgive the cunning speech of Drumtochty, which lied when it called a downpouring rain "a bit moist," for fear of having no adjective for the deluge, and covered up its good deeds by wholesale falsehoods to save a false modesty. How hard it is to have one's idols fall, like Dagon before the ark, and all their fair proportions dashed to fragments!—to find but one man recognizable, and he one of the minor ones, who says point-blank the books are two-thirds lies? Is there not enough of real pathos in life, enough of comedy and tragedy, too, that we must idealize in order to have our hearts touched?

I have been entranced by Balzac, laughed with Dickens, reveled in Sir Walter Scott, had my heart wrenched in Tess and tortured by the Manxman, but I got over them; but, somehow or another, I hate to give up Burnbrae and Hillocks, Saunders and the rest. I cannot bear to see Drumsheugh dragged into "the seconds" snoring drunk, and splendid Jemmy Soutar's legs tangled worse than they naturally were by the "dew of Ben Nevis and gatherings of Long John"; to feel that bonny sweet Marget Howe may dissolve into a common wife, and Elspeth McFadyen turn to a village gossip; to have a race of giants dwindle to ordinary men.

O, why did any one try to find Drumtochty and steal away the subtle essence of her sweetbrier? To have a tipsy doctor belaboring poor Jess as she flounders through the drifts of Glen Urtach is too much. Would that the mists from the Grampians had shrouded Drumtochty from mortal eyes, and at least left us fondly hoping it were true. Why should an artist go to draw pictures of it? Why not idealize the whole thing? Make Marget Howe's garden like Kew, with a palm house. The Drumtochty could be represented by the Missouri, Drumsheugh's house could be drawn after the plans of a feudal castle, and the Grampians—well, a few photos from the Yellowstone might answer. Why not? Why should the surroundings be taken as they are and the people lifted as far above the real as the above would be beyond the actual scene?

When one is idealizing life might be spared. Marget Howe need not have lost her boy, "the lad of pairts," but he might have lived to cheer his fond mother's declining years. But so it is. The ideal must be killed because the genius that brought it to life cannot sustain it. So even must Mrs. Humphrey Ward kill her hero just when he is ready for work, and our own Mrs. Ward's hero of A Singular Life must meet an awful death. Strip the ideal from history and how commonplace much becomes—but it would be real, it would be true, and that which was good would be emulated.

I do not mean by this that we should not have our ideals. We should never rise but for ideals. Thoughts come before deeds—but why take that which is common and low to form our ideals from? Why throw the glamour of genius over the commonplace? Such are some of the thoughts that come to me as the real mourning in the glen saddens my heart, with nothing left to comfort it but the honest guard of the Muirtown train.

PLACES STILL NEEDED.

Several interested readers would like to know more about the plan of placing Armenian refugees in American homes. Are the strangers received into the homes as guests, or boarders, or help? Where in Boston is the proper place to make inquiries and arrangements for receiving them into good families?

An Old Subscriber.

Perhaps 100 Armenian refugees, mostly men, have come to Boston during the last month or two, and quite a number have already found places. They become house servants or laborers, and in some cases take higher positions, for which many by native gifts and education are well fitted. In case no wages can be given, they are willing to work for their board, but a number have already proved themselves worthy of remuneration. Inquiries in reference to them should be directed to H. Bogigian, 22 Beacon St., or Mrs. Ruth Baker, 371 Tremont St., Boston.

CONGREGATIONAL WORK.

Your recent announcement of the new missionary monthly will give satisfaction to many who are interested in our missionary work. This is in practical furtherance of the wishes of the churches as expressed in the National Councils of 1889 and 1892 and is entitled to their support. When the intelligence concerning our missionary work is suitably arranged under one cover, it is to be hoped that it will be more carefully studied. A striking illustration of the lack of such study under present conditions was given in the recent meeting of a State conference, when a reference was made to office expenses in a statement of "per cent." and no one in the whole body was well enough acquainted with the subject to recognize what the "per cent." was of—whether of contributions from the churches or of aggregate receipts from legacies, invested funds, tuition, sales of real estate, etc. Our societies send to the pastors accurate and full financial statements, but there are so many different pamphlets that they seem to be all passed over with little attention.

THE NEW BIBLE AGAIN.

A correspondent, after reading Prof. Irving F. Wood's article on the New Bible and Rev. C. W. Greene's criticisms in our issue of Oct. 22, is moved to ask Mr. Greene some questions:

In the first place, what does Mr. Greene mean by the "new Bible," or, as he seems to indicate that there are a number of them, What is "a new Bible"? What is "Dr. Driver's Bible," or "Dr. Briggs's Bible," and how do they differ from "the Bible"? He says we need a Bible of which we can say after reading any part of it, "Thus saith the Lord God Almighty." But there are many statements in the Bible which the Lord never uttered and never sanctioned. Notably Gen. 2: 3, 4. Would he explain this? In contradistinction to this he speaks of "robbing the book of its power over the soul and making it a doubtful book." What is there that is "doubtful" in his so-called "new Bible"?

He also speaks of the "fog of criticism," which makes "a young man full of zeal for God and love of the Bible" feel "his zeal cooling and his love dying." It is difficult for me to imagine a young man of this description, possessed of ordinary intellect and the ability to use it, being in any sense weakened because any number of men begin by honest search and careful study to clear up some of the erroneous ideas which have possessed us and our ancestors for generations past.

Permit me to say that I love the grand old Bible, The Bible, for there is only one, and never will be more than one, any more than there can be any other God or any other revelation of him. But this dear old Bible has been presented to us in a new and grander light in these later years, since men have been trying to find the truth and dispel the error.

CHURCH LOTTERIES.

Do you think it right and proper to raise money at church festivals by voting on bedquilts, or other things, or to dispose of such articles by tickets, drawing and like methods, with the full expectation that a sum will be realized far in excess of the value of the article sold? J. A. H.

These methods of raising money violate the spirit, if not the letter, of laws against lotteries. Churches which adopt them greatly weaken thereby their influence in behalf of righteousness in the community.

HO! FOR THE PACIFIC COAST IN 1898!

Ever since the decision of the National Council to hold its next session in Portland, Ore., there has been manifest a new interest in the council and a new tone of hopefulness in the denominational life of the Northwest. No wiser movement than this has marked the action of the council since its inception.

The next logical step is to hold the annual meeting of the A. B. C. F. M. for that year in California. The two bodies have met in neighboring places and on consecutive weeks for fifteen years past, and the happy conjunction may have a felicitous effect if the Board, in '98, shall meet in the First Church, Oakland, whose new pastor, Rev. C. R. Brown, has just been elected a corporate member.

The Eastern brethren can be provided with transportation through the northern country and Puget Sound region to Portland, thence via Mt. Shasta route for 900 miles of coast line to California, and eastward by the Central, thus covering an immense area of home missionary territory, and giving the impulse of new life and quickened pulse to the entire Pacific slope. The benefit of this Western tour will be not less to the Eastern brethren, in affording an intelligent glimpse of this vast field, than to Western churches in the new vigor and wholesome cheer which will be imparted by their presence and wise speech. L. H. H.

CURRENT THOUGHT.

AT HOME.

It is a virile, optimistic note which Theodore Roosevelt strikes in his Forum review of Brooks Adams's book, The Law of Civilization and Decay. He concludes thus: "While there is in modern times a decrease in emotional religion, there is an immense increase in practical morality. There is a decrease of the martial type found among savages and the people of the Middle Ages, except as it still survives in the slums of great cities, but there remains a martial type infinitely more efficient than any that preceded it. There are great branches of industry which call forth in those that follow them more hardihood, manliness and courage than any industry of ancient times. The immense masses of men connected with the railroads are continually called upon to exercise qualities of mind and body such as in antiquity no trade and no handicraft demanded. There are, it is true, influences at work to shake the vitality, courage and manliness of the race, but there are other influences which tell in exactly the opposite direction, and, whatever may come in the future, hitherto the last set of influences have been strongest. As yet, while men are more gentle and more honest than before, it cannot be said that they are less brave."

Rev. Henry Van Dyke in the January Bookbuyer, commenting on and reviewing Rev. Gerald Stanley Lee's book The Shadow Christ, says he admires it most for its "distinct and luminous utterance of the central truth of Christianity—the veritable incarnation, the inevitable and actual human life of God. That God himself has always been willing to do precisely that which he has required men to do, to live a finite, tempted, suffering life and to be good outside of heaven, in contact with sin and death, that he has really done this in Jesus Christ and accomplished his own will in and with and for humanity—this, it seems to me, is the core of prophecy and the heart of the gospel. Because God is light and love, because man is sinful and sorrowful, God could not help becoming man. This is the greatest truth in the world."

ABROAD.

The British Weekly, in which Ian Maclaren's work first appeared, commenting at length on The Cure of Souls, the book which contains his recent lectures at Yale Divinity School, says of its author: "He is now far beyond the need of mere eulogy, and the best service that can be done him is that those who feel that there is something wanting in his presentation of the gospel should say so with all affection and respect," and this its editor, W. Robertson Nicoll, Dr. Watson's intimate friend, proceeds to do. He misses the note of any passionate yearning for souls, any drawing of the line between the church and the world, and he finds Dr. Watson's references to the atonement "invariably unsatisfactory." Elsewhere in the same issue of The Weekly Dr. Nicoll says that during the past year he has heard twelve sermons by very young preachers, and in not one of them has he heard "the faintest approximation to saving truth, the faintest indication of how a sinner might find the Saviour." "To be conscious of no sin is the deadliest sin of all," said Carlyle, and there be many now who sin thus. Prof. O. A. Curtis, recently installed as professor of systematic theology in Drew Seminary, said in his inaugural address what few can honestly disclaim: "In Christian communities, and even in the church itself, today there is almost no sense of sin. . . . The very tone in which the average man now enters the kingdom is utilitarian."

Rev. Dr. J. Guinness Rogers, the Nestor and leader of independency in England, in The Independent, responds heartily to The Guardian's recent suggestion that "the first step towards reunion, and a step which is in our own power, is personal knowledge. If Churchmen and Dissenters saw more of each other they would, on the whole and in the long run, come to think better of each other" Dr. Rogers says, "The influence of centuries cannot be speedily effaced, nor is it to be supposed that men hold their principles so lightly that they will easily modify them under the gracious experiences of a kindly fellowship. But such fellowship has a sweetening, a mellowing, a widening influence whose beneficial effects cannot easily be estimated. I therefore heartily thank those who have made these advances, and can confidently promise that we, on our side, will show a like spirit of unity."

Michael G. Mulhall, the highest authority Great Britain has among statisticians, writing in Good Words, concludes an article on Progress in Locomotion in the Victorian Era thus: "Of all the errors that statesmen can fall into, the most deplorable and far-reaching are those that arise from ignorance of economic laws or from defiance of them. If Lord Melbourne, Mr. Baring or Lord Palmerston had taken heed, in 1837–40, of the inevitable result of handing over the means of transit of the three kingdoms to private companies, they would have boldly admonished Parliament of the tremendous monopoly that would thus be created. At this moment the agriculture, manufactures and commerce of Great Britain and Ireland are groaning under a tyranny that has no excuse or palliation except the sordid plea of big dividends for shareholders."

BRONCHITIS.—Sudden changes of the weather cause Bronchial Troubles. "Brown's Bronchial Troches" will give effective relief.

EXPOSURE to disease does not necessarily mean the contraction of disease provided the system is in a vigorous condition, with the blood pure and all the organs in healthy action. When in such a condition contagion is readily resisted and the disease germs can find no lodgment. Hood's Sarsaparilla is the best medicine to build up the system, because it makes pure, rich blood, and pure blood is the basis of good health. In cold weather it is especially necessary to keep up the health tone, because the body is subject to greater exposure and more liable to disease. Hood's Sarsaparilla is the safeguard of health.

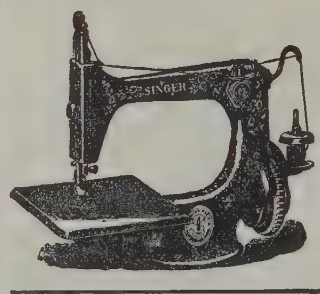
The Delicate Woman

unable to operate the ordinary form of sewing-machine without fatigue, can use the SILENT SINGER AUTOMATIC with the greatest ease. The acme of perfection in construction and artistic finish, this machine is positively the lightest-running of any. Its low, broad treadle enables frequent change in position of the feet, or it can be furnished in a portable form to be effectively run by hand if desired. It has neither shuttle nor bobbin, and no tensions to adjust, but is ready for use when the needle is threaded.



Simple and compact, this machine is more easily understood, its parts are better protected from dust, it has more room under the arm, and is capable of a greater range of work, than any similar device.

The Silent Singer

has many points of preference that can easily be demonstrated by examination and comparison with similar machines.

Athleticism is a good thing, if kept in its place, but it has come to be very much overpraised and overvalued. True manliness is as likely to be found in a weak as in a strong body. Other things being equal, we may perhaps admit that a man with a highly trained and developed body will be more courageous than a weak man, but we must take this caution with us—that a great athlete may be a brute or a coward, while a truly manly man can be neither.—Thomas Hughes.

MISS MOLINA S. CAPRON.

A good and useful life ended Sunday, Dec. 13, 1896, when Molina S. Capron passed from temporal to eternal scenes. She was the daughter of the late Sumner E. and Sabra A. Capron, and a sister of Mary J. Capron, who was editor of The Child's Hour until her death five years ago. Miss Capron has always been a resident of Attleboro, Mass., and for forty years as a member of Christ's church she has served his cause well. She and her sister Mary were untiring workers in all benevolent efforts, both at home and abroad, and have left legacies to several Congregational benevolent societies.

Her last days were full of wonderful peace and she longed to be with Christ, which she knew was far better. She has joined the unbroken family circle on the other side. She has left behind the legacy of a true, earnest, consecrated life, and her church can truly say: "Her name is fragrant to all who knew her."

E. L. H.

MRS. MARY JANE FLAGG,

the wife of Mr. E. C. Flagg, died in Upton, Dec. 30, aged sixty eight years. She was a member of the First Congregational Church, the Woman's Christian Temperance Society and the Woman's Board of Missions. She was a faithful and loved Sunday school teacher, a devoted Christian, active and efficient in all the interests of the church and community. She was a faithful wife and mother, unusually kind to the sick and the poor, unassuming and discreet, and will be greatly missed and deeply mourned. The funeral services occurred in the church and were attended by an unusually large number of relatives and friends. Mrs. Flagg leaves a son, a husband and mother. The latter is eighty-eight years of age and very feeble. The family have the genuine sympathy of the village. "He giveth his beloved sleep."

DRS. KIMBALL AND FARNSWORTH SPEAK.

Gray skies and wet streets did not prevent many friends of missionary work from gathering in Park Street Church on Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 5, at the invitation of the Woman's Board of Missions. Although the meeting was under the leadership of Mrs. Judson Smith, the three secretaries of the American Board and Editor Strong were also upon the platform, by their presence showing honor to the sister organization that is such a source of help.

After the usual opening exercises, prayer being offered by Dr. Smith, Dr. Grace Kimball, recently of Van, gave in a clear, concise, rapid way a fine outline of the political condition in Turkey. Of the two races in the country the Armenians are by far the most industrious and energetic. Sadly oppressed by the ruling government, taxed beyond measure, commerce restricted, it is small wonder that a party has arisen among the young men who have been educated in England and America to raise the people from their bondage. Their methods may not be wise, but their motives are not to be criticised by Americans, who revolted from their mother country. It is quite unjust, however, to call all the Armenians revolutionists, as it is probable that less than one-third of them know about the party.

The relief work, which was carried on so superbly last winter by Dr. Kimball and her fellow-workers, kept 20,000 persons from starving. Pitiless as it may seem, help was never given to one who by any possibility was able to provide for himself one meal a day. This succor was made possible only by the generosity of friends in Germany, England and America. Whether Russia takes possession of Turkey, or the sultan reforms his own government, there will still be an increasing demand for gospel teaching, and the support of our missions there should not falter. Dr. Farnsworth, who has given forty-five years of his life to that country and who hopes to return soon to continue the work, gave some startling comparisons between the number of deaths in the Civil War and in the recent massacres in Turkey. He urged renewed devotion and enlarged contributions. He spoke a good word also for the Armenian refugees in this country. Dr. Barton led in the closing prayer.

A pleasant subsequent event was a reception to Dr. Kimball in the rooms of the Woman's Board, which were made attractive by flowers and other concomitants of afternoon teas, as well as by several gay cloths brought home by Miss Child. Among the missionaries present, besides the speakers of the afternoon, were Mrs. De Forest and Mrs. Pedley of Japan, and Mrs. Browne of Harpoot. Consul Jewett of Sivas was also a guest.

WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING.

CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, JAN. 8.

Mrs. Henry L. Albee, the leader, read the 121st Psalm and a passage from Mark, sixth chapter. She dwelt upon the sure relief in trouble which comes from God, and quoted Whittier's lines,

I know not where his islands lift
  Their fronded palms in air;
I only know I cannot drift
  Beyond his love and care.

Mrs. Billings testified to the presence of the Spirit in the prayer meeting of Suffolk Branch, held the previous day in the chapel of Shawmut Church from 10 to 4 o'clock, with different leaders for every hour; no matter what the topic chosen by the leaders of the successive hours, the theme proved the same—the power and presence of the Holy Spirit; and during the last hour, led by Mrs. Capron, the names of missionaries were called for who were personally known to any in her audience. Miss Kyle, following Mrs. Billings, spoke of the great number of missionaries thus mentioned, and thought the prayers for missionary wives left in this country by their husbands, and for mothers who had left their children here, specially helpful through the individualizing of the missionaries.

Mrs. Schneider spoke of the multitude in mission fields who, during this Week of Prayer, slipped out in the early dawn to the daily prayer meeting; of a cheerful note coming back from Turkey, there being audiences in two Gregorian churches in Aintab, listening and not willing to leave; in Oorfa six Bible women at work, 150 being taught in their homes and 1,400 in schools; the pastor and a deacon from Aintab preaching to crowds in Gregorian houses, Miss Shattuck herself having obtained permission from the bishop for the work to go on. From Hasskeuy Miss Gleason writes that Pastor Asadoorian had 150 women to hear him preach on a stormy, cold day—so different from the old days of indifference natural in a large, worldly city like Constantinople.

Mrs. Doremus Scudder of Woburn reported fifteen attracted to their missionary society this year. Mrs. Browne of Harpoot brought news of fifty villages in that field on the verge of starvation and death. The letters expressed gratitude for prayers and help, and they do not want either to cease. Miss Kyle read an interesting letter from Miss Farnham of Adabazar, which was followed by a prayer of thanksgiving for our Christian homes. Mrs. Noyes told of a little girl who sold fifteen prayer calendars. Mrs. Judson Smith mentioned the dream of Dr. A. J. Gordon, in which he saw a poor man in his audience and afterwards learned that he was Christ, the dream so influencing him that ever afterward his preaching was as if he saw Christ before him. She reminded her hearers that though the foundations of the Woman's Board had been laid with such skill and wisdom, yet the work would not continue unless individual members did each her part.

BRYCE'S TESTIMONY TO OUR MISSIONARIES.

With the record before us of the missionaries who have devoted their lives to save their fellowmen in Armenia, it ought to be unnecessary to say one word in their defense. But since, strange as it may seem, here and there false accusers, like F. Hopkinson Smith, beg an audience before which to calumniate these self-sacrificing men and women in the midst of their labors and trials, the testimony of Mr. James Bryce, M. P., who has been a member of the British Cabinet and is thoroughly informed on Turkish affairs, is well worth quoting. In the new edition of his work, Transcaucasia and the Ararat, he says:

> I cannot mention the American missionaries without a tribute to the admirable work they have done. They have been the only good influence that has worked from abroad upon the Turkish Empire. They have shown great judgment and tact in their relations with the ancient churches of the land, Orthodox, Gregorian, Jacobite, Nestorian and Catholic. They have lived cheerfully in the midst, not only of hardships, but latterly of serious dangers also. They have been the first to bring the light of education and learning into these dark places, and have rightly judged that it was far better to diffuse that light through their schools than to aim at a swollen roll of converts. From them alone, if we except the British consuls, has it been possible during the last thirty years to obtain trustworthy information regarding what passes in the interior.

DON'T dally with rheumatism. Purify your blood and cure it at once by taking a course of Hood's Sarsaparilla.

A CURIOUS TABLE.—Art connoisseurs will be greatly interested in the lines of a new table of which we show an engraving in another column over the signature of the Paine Furniture Co. The design is strikingly original, the whole depth of the side being covered with vigorous carving. The legs are massive posts, carved in spiral flutings. There is a lower shelf, and all angles and corners are rounded. It is one of half a hundred new patterns just received by this firm.

Scott's Emulsion makes the blood richer and improves the circulation. It increases the digestion and nourishes the body. It corrects diseased action and strengthens the nervous system. In a word, it places the body in the best possible condition for preventing the germs of Consumption from beginning or continuing their work. In that one sentence is the whole secret. Book covering the subject very thoroughly sent free for the asking.

The West Coast of Florida combines to a more perfect degree the desirable features of an ideal winter resort region than any other section of America. The land is high and the air free from dampness. The Gulf of Mexico indents the shores with innumerable beautiful bays, adding variety to the scenery. There are almost endless forests of pine trees, adding health-giving qualities to the atmosphere. There are innumerable towns and resorts, all having attractions peculiarly their own. Good roads for wheeling; shooting and fishing unexcelled anywhere.

The most beautifully illustrated book on Florida ever issued sent to any address upon receipt of four cents in stamps.

The Book of The Pilgrimage
An Appreciation from
The Independent (New York)
"That was an ideal pilgrimage to England and Holland that was organized last summer by The Congregationalist to celebrate the completion of its eightieth year. It was a Congregational pilgrimage to points of historical interest to Congregationalists of the New World, and its representative character caused it to be received with special cordiality and hospitality wherever its itinerary led. Nearly fifty Americans were of the party, and their doings and wanderings were recorded, week by week, by Miss Frances J. Dyer, and published in The Congregationalist, on whose editorial staff she serves. These letters, with other souvenirs of the trip, have been collected and issued in a sumptuously illustrated volume, dedicated to 'Our Hosts in England.' Nearly seventy names, ministers, deans, archdeacons, canons, bishops, archbishops, mayors, earls, and one general, the 'Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod,' make up the distinguished list whose hospitality is recorded in this Book of the Pilgrimage. One special feature of the trip was the laying of the corner stone of the new John Robinson Memorial Church, in Gainsborough, by Ambassador Bayard. The trip was a brilliant idea of The Congregationalist, carried out to perfection, and worthily recorded in the volume before us."

MR. MOODY'S SECOND WEEK.

The Tremont Temple audiences have reached the superlative degree of fullness, and the popular response to the efforts of Mr. Moody and his corps of helpers is measured now in part by the number of disappointed ones who would pass closed doors. The continuance of the centralization of efforts at and near the Temple has made the hub verily "the bull's eye of New England," as Mr. Moody puts it. The admission tickets, freely distributed for specific dates ahead, are ordinarily exhausted several days in advance. A glance at the large audiences makes it plain that suburban and country neighborhoods are to all appearances taking advantage largely of the special opportunity of hearing the Northfield preacher. The ministers also, judging from the platform attendance, have benefited more largely by the accommodations reserved for them.

The morning meetings have not been quite as large as those of the afternoon. They certainly have attained larger success than anticipated. The early meeting last Thursday, on the special day of fasting and prayer, was earnest and helpful.

The increase of numbers has enlarged the enthusiasm. The pressing and hurry at the entrance and through the corridors of the temple commence and continue more than an hour before the meetings. The song services, varied by selections of the chorus, congregation and soloists, has begun at an earlier hour than at first, and at the arrival of the hour of the meeting the fervor of praise is well fired.

What Mr. Moody would have on the part of Christians, judging from the general line of his talks the past week, he has expressed in the homely phrase: "Get up and go to work." He addressed the suggestion to parents, church members, neighbors, pastors—to all who would have power through the grace of God. No doubt he has already made more than a surface impression on the minds of his auditors. But while he is giving thanks for that Mr. Moody craves a deeper arousing. His courage is stimulated by signs here and hopeful indications in the adjoining towns and cities.

Mr. Moody gives hearty sympathy and frequent indorsement to Mr. Murphy's temperance campaign now going forward at Berkeley Temple every evening. Hundreds have signed the pledge there and at Faneuil Hall, where crowded noon meetings were held last week. Sam Jones having pre-empted the historic edifice for this week, Mr. Murphy has taken possession of a store on Bedford Street, in the heart of the business section, where he is speaking with good effects every noon.

The address of Mrs. Ruth B. Baker, who is securing homes for Armenian refugees, was incorrectly stated last week. It should be 171 Tremont Street, Boston.

*"Rev Floyd W. Tomkins' The Christian Life: What It Is and How to Live It (E. P. Dutton & Co., New York. Price, 75 cents) is pre-eminently a book for earnest Christians. It is full of practical good sense and interest from cover to cover. It reminds one of Henry Drummond's books and James Stalker's in the virility and beauty of its style. The writer knows his subject well and tells about it with a simplicity, vigor and truthfulness infinitely refreshing to men who are troubled and puzzled by the complicated questions of existence and only more confused by many well-meaning writers who undertake to guide them to the Christian life. There are eight chapters of a dozen small pages each, dealing with 'Life,' 'Responsibility,' 'Prayer,' 'Bible Reading,' Christian Worship,' 'Christian Fellowship,' 'The Holy Communion,' and 'Joy in the Holy Ghost.' They furnish an excellent series of topics for prayer meetings, the leader to read a chapter and the members to discuss it. This is a practical suggestion worth noting. Every one would do well to straighten himself out by reading this book, and to have it at hand to straighten out puzzled friends."—Christian World.

JUST READY.

On Many Seas.

The Life and Experience of a Yankee Sailor.

By FRED B. WILLIAMS. Edited by his Friend, W. S. BOOTH. Cloth, 12mo, $1.50.

The book is dedicated to the sailors who have made the American flag known and respected in every harbor of the world.

The book is written with all a sailor's vitality, his strength of imagination, and the dramatic skill of a born story teller.

It is the record of a phase of life utterly vanished, but once familiar to many an old family of New Bedford, Salem or Gloucester, and in many a town which, like Salem, has still its Museum of East Indian curiosities, brought home by captains in the merchantman trade with the far East.

A New Volume by Goldwin Smith, D. C. L.

Guesses at the Riddle of Existence.

With Other Essays on Kindred Subjects. Now Ready. Cloth, 12mo, $1.25.

The papers are the work of a man who reads all that the best of recent thinkers have to offer—men like Drummond, Kidd, Balfour, etc.—and passes criticism on it in a pungent, or keen, incisive style, destructive in aim, brilliant in execution.

The titles of the "Other Essays" are:

The Church and the Old Testament; Is There Another Life? The Miraculous Element in Christianity; Morality and Theism.

A Timely Reference to the Armenian Question.

TWO RECENT LETTERS FROM THE FRONTIER.

Another year has begun, so I think about my papers. I prize The Congregationalist very much. I thank you for sending it to me free; it is a great favor. I have been preaching for home mission churches. The church at —— does not pay me quite $400. Yet in view of the condition of the C. H. M. S. we did not apply for aid. Now I am in straits. I have grandchildren in —— College. I have been aiding them a little and they are working their way. I have preached fifty-two years, never been out of employ for a day. I am now seventy-eight years old, and I never wanted money more than now to help others, but I am now receiving the least I ever did for work. I shall be very thankful to have the paper continued.

By your courtesy through your missionary fund I have been an interested, instructed and edified reader of your paper, and now at the beginning of a new year I am wondering if it is right for me to continue to be thus on your list of beneficiaries. I was in hopes that in time I could subscribe and be independent, but salaries of Western missionaries have been cut to meet the conditions of hard times and droughts and storms. Mine has dropped from $800 when I first came here in 1890 to $525 now. I am trying to feed, clothe and educate five children. My oldest daughter is a volunteer missionary, fitting herself for the foreign work if the Lord open the way.

MR. MOODY freely criticises ministers and churches, and naturally enough they criticise him. He perhaps would admit that he is as much open to criticism as they are. But no one can know Mr. Moody, or hear him speak or join with him in prayer, without the conviction that he loves the church with all his heart, that he longs intensely for the salvation of men, that he lives near to God and wants to get nearer to him. His impatience with Christians for not living holier lives and working more earnestly to win others to Christ is just the feeling that he exercises toward himself. He has long had, and continues to have, wonderful evidence that he is used by God to bring men to repentance for sin and into new life in Christ. We say, God bless him for that and bless his work. For every sinner born anew by the Holy Spirit through Mr. Moody's preaching and every Christian lifted to a higher plane of spiritual life we thank God. The church will survive unjust criticism from those who seek her prosperity, and will gain strength through every impulse toward holiness aroused by the trumpet calls of men who feel, as Mr. Moody does, the Word of God in their hearts as a fire shut up in their bones.

The colleges of the land, like the churches, may be looked at from two points of view. Without much trouble we could find indications of spiritual apathy and even of lapses from the moral code. On the other hand, tokens of genuine religious life and of whole souled devotion to philanthropic and Christian service are, when sought for, equally evident. Substantial testimony to this fact is furnished by the reports which appear elsewhere in our paper this week. They have been obtained from observers on the ground who in every case speak intelligently and fairly. The showing we submit is, on the whole, a favorable one. The amount of systematic Bible study and the hold which devotional meetings have upon the students are to be specially noted. There is evidence, too, in the support of foreign missionaries, of college settlements and of Christian work in and about their respective communities that collegians to-day are touched with the altruistic spirit of the age. Let us note these signs for good as the Day of Prayer for Colleges—Jan. 28—approaches, with due thankfulness to God that our colleges continue to be places where true Christian lives are led and whence go forth throughout the world purifying and uplifting influences.

To many the literary study of the Bible seems to be a hindrance to its spiritual use, and much of the opposition to the scholarly examination into the history and structure of the sacred books arises from a feeling that the divine messages which they are believed to contain are thus obscured. We are confident that all persons who on these grounds deprecate modern criticism of the Bible will find help by reading Professor Sanders's article this week on The Literary Approach to the Old Testament. We feel equally confident that those who have not read the preceding articles in this series will turn back to them after reading this one. The thought of God as presented to us in the Bible is interpreted and illuminated by discovering the human motives which prompted its expression and the circumstances which called it forth. The same Holy Spirit which moved men to utter it guides those who now seek to understand it, if they use to this end the means at their disposal. Professor Sanders shows practical ways by which Bible students may enter more deeply into its meanings and more clearly understand them. His suggestions will be welcomed by every devout seeker after God.

The glory of New Haven and of the State of Connecticut has been Yale University. One would think the citizens of that city would welcome the hundreds of thousands of dollars which have annually been given to increase the usefulness of its splendid institution of learning, and would seek with equal generosity to promote its success. Instead of this the assessors of New Haven have suddenly increased about eightfold the taxes on the property of the university, and if they are successful in collecting these taxes they will seriously cripple the university. The people of New Haven are not so poor that they need to rob Yale in order to provide for the needs of the municipality. If they were, we would still commend to them what Epictetus once said to his fellow-citizens: "You Athenians will confer the greatest benefit on your city, not by raising the roofs of your dwellings, but by exalting the souls of your fellow-citizens; for it is better that great souls should live in small habitations than that abject slaves should burrow in great houses."

In our Church News columns is a sketch of the fraudulent career of a man who for the last six years or more, under different names, has acted in the rôle of a Congregational minister. We have published this for two reasons: first, to put other churches on their guard against admitting this man into their pulpits, and second to call the attention of the churches to the ease with which a bad man may get into pastorates and even into ministerial associations. This man, who has never been ordained, by unscrupulous and continuous lying, has become successively pastor of three Congregational churches not far apart, and, after having been exposed and publicly expelled from the Cumberland Association in Maine, went across into Vermont with his family and, under another name, has served one of our churches for nearly a year and a half. This church, which has our hearty sympathy, is sadly injured through his wickedness. But we hope its members will stand together unitedly and soon secure a worthy pastor. If ministers were more careful to learn the antecedents of strangers who apply for membership in the associations and conferences, and churches took more pains to learn the history of candidates, these lamentable scandals would be prevented. In ninety-nine cases out of the hundred these candidates would be found honorable men. But all parties concerned suffer through the rascality of the hundredth man. We have known a man of this sort to have been expelled from a Baptist church, then from a Congregational church, then to appear in good standing in a Congregational association, next to accept a call to a Presbyterian church and at last to return to a Congregational church. In every charge he was a popular pastor and did much mischief. But the responsibility for these things rests with the churches and associations which allow themselves to be imposed on.

Only two weeks ago we announced that Colorado College, spurred on by Dr. Pearsons's conditional offer of $50,000 in addition, had raised $150,000. We are glad to follow this with the news that Pomona College in Southern California has secured subscriptions amounting to $100,000. Of this amount $25,000 was promised about a year ago by Mr. and Mrs. Harlan P. Page of Philadelphia on condition that the remaining $75,000 should be pledged by Jan. 15, 1897. California friends have raised $55,000 and Dr. Pearsons last week promised $20,000. Both these institutions are an honor to our denomination and to the country. We do not know of any colleges more worthy to receive gifts than these, and the raising of so large sums in times like these shows how highly Christian education is valued for the stability it gives to the nation.

Religious beggars are the most successful of all mendicants and do much mischief in hindering the work of genuine philanthropy. The more pious emotions they can show the larger their revenue. A case has recently been brought to light in England of a man who had been a Nonconformist minister, who for the last eight years has gathered in an annual income of $5,000 by begging letters and other fraudulent pretenses. He wrote to gullible religious people, telling them that he was doing a great work "with the object of advancing the glory of God," and that he was wholly without money. He even secured from Mr. Balfour a grant of $1,000 a year out of the national fund for deserving authors. But this last scheme finally led to his downfall. We have known persons who regularly prayed with and preyed upon the churches, whose friends indignantly repelled evidence that they were impostors. There are good men who seem to believe that the exposure of such frauds is a genuine injury to Christianity, and that it deprives the churches of earnest workers.

Another form of collecting money with the claim that it is for charitable purposes seems hardly less selfish, though it cannot be called fraudulent. We have known of several instances of financial agents of benevolent and educational institutions whose total collections were not more than sufficient to pay their salaries and expenses. They have gone on for years "working for the Lord" without turning a dollar into the treasuries of the institutions they represented above what they took out again, and have given up their labors only when compelled to do so by trustees whose patience was worn out. The patrons of these financial agents never see any reports of receipts and expenditures of the institutions to which they suppose they are giving which enables them to know what becomes of their money. But they listen to glowing accounts of "the blessed work of the Lord" in these institutions, and their indiscriminate giving makes them feel good. Meanwhile deserving and carefully managed academies, colleges and societies suffer reproach which is not their due from those who know that these practices are carried on, while their work seems prosaic as compared with brilliant general reports which will not bear the scrutiny of close examination.

Last week we animadverted, somewhat harshly, perhaps some thought, on the procedure which made Dr. Temple Archbishop of Canterbury. It is to be remembered that Canon Gore has publicly called the ceremony "a farce" and appealed for aid from secular agencies to relieve the church from the just charge of hypocrisy.

HONORED PASTORATES.

The three faces on our cover page are familiar and welcome to Boston audiences, and will be recognized by many of our readers throughout the country. It is a fact of much significance in the religious history of Boston and its vicinity that these three ministers are celebrating at this time anniversaries of their settlement in their present fields of labor, covering a quarter of a century or more.

Dr. McKenzie has been thirty years the pastor of the First Church, Cambridge, the latest of an honored succession of ministers reaching back 260 years. He is the one minister on the Board of Overseers of Harvard University, and the First Church always has in its congregation a large number of the students. Dr. McKenzie has long had national fame as an orator and, while he is always welcome at Cornell and Yale and other universities, he is not less popular as a preacher to the people.

Eliot Church, Roxbury, has well earned the title often given to it, the Mother of Churches. It sent off some of its choicest members in 1857 to plant what is now the flourishing Immanual Church, while within about two years of the time when Dr. Hamilton came to the pastorate, a little more than twenty-five years ago, it dismissed a colony to form the Highland Church and another to form the Walnut Avenue Church. The neighborhoods where these are situated, particularly the latter, have grown rapidly, while removals and deaths have taken many from the mother church. But its people have been loyal to their pastor, who has turned aside from invitations to other fields to continue in the work which needed him most. And in spite of losses Eliot Church has held its ground and maintained its honored position among the churches.

Walnut Avenue, the youngest child of Eliot, in its beginning in 1870 turned to Dr. Plumb of Chelsea and persuaded him to become its pastor. From Highland Hall, where he was installed, it moved in due time to its present location and erected a splendid edifice. A quarter of a century passed, pastor and people are wedded more closely than ever, and his loving ministrations are as dear to the children of those who called him to his office as they were to their fathers.

These three, with Dr. Herrick, who celebrated the quarter centennial of his ministry with the Mt. Vernon Church about a year ago, are, we believe, the only ministers of any Protestant denomination in Boston or its vicinity, except Dr. E. E. Hale, who have continued in their present pastorates for twenty-five years. It would be easy to show how their work has been cumulative, not only with their own people, but throughout the land. Their history is wrought into our benevolent societies, of which they have been and are directors. Their influence has been of great value to younger ministers who have come to work beside them. In civic reform, in temperance work, in revival seasons, in all that makes for the highest welfare of the community, they have had an influence more effective and permanent because they have come to be known and trusted through long and faithful service. It is a matter for congratulation to our denomination that these brethren have so long led their churches in work which has strengthened Christian-forces throughout the world, and that they turn to the future with good promise of years of continued usefulness.

THE TREATY OF ARBITRATION.

The treaty signed Jan. 11 by the official representatives of Great Britain and the United States is the culmination of efforts made by many prominent men in both countries during the last year to insure peace between them and co-operation in promoting the welfare of the world. Public sentiment in both nations overwhelmingly favors it. For such a movement the prayers of the Christian Church have long been united. Statesmen and philanthropists of many lands welcome it with joy. The business world sees in it a much needed assurance of the stability which is essential to prosperity. Everywhere it is hailed as a sign of a new era of peace on earth, good will to men.

It can hardly be supposed that the movement which has come so near to its consummation will be frustrated by the failure of the United States Senate to confirm the treaty. That it should be carefully scrutinized is right and necessary. Its provisions should be deliberately weighed, its possible defects discussed, its consequences carefully considered. The people will not be impatient of reasonable delay for this purpose. But the public sentiment which made the negotiations possible is far stronger now that they have resulted in a treaty agreed on by the highest authorities in both governments. That same public sentiment will guard against possible abuses of an agreement some features of which, as President Cleveland says, "will assume a tentative character looking to a further advance." It is made to the advantage of each nation as never before to guard the other's interests as well as its own. They now have unitedly taken among civilized governments a position of leadership whose responsibilities have at once removed farther than ever before the possibilities of war between them. And thus they have made war to appear more barbarous and unworthy as a means of settling disputes between intelligent and honorable peoples.

The Senate cannot remain in doubt as to what is expected of it in this matter. Pulpit, press and platform will speak concerning it with a unanimity rarely realized on any subject. Both nations will come to a new consciousness of national honor higher than any reached by victories won in battle—the honor gained by self-restraint, by guarding the larger interests of mankind, and by maintaining righteousness for all in the dignity of Christian manhood. By the consummation of this treaty we trust that the year 1897 will be among the most memorable in the history of the Christian era.

SUNDAY REST FOR WORKING MEN.

The movement for shorter hours for a day's work within reasonable limits has the sympathy of the public. Work is better done when those who do it are at their best, and men are not at their best when they are physically exhausted by continuous labor as long as they can bear it. But a weekly rest day is fully as important as reasonable limitations to the work day, and it is surprising that labor organizations have not more strenuously insisted on it. The classes of men who are compelled to work seven days every week are constantly increasing, and that mainly by the pressure of public demand. Street railways often do their heaviest business on Sunday. The habit of more extended travel on that day is growing, and Christians, even if they do not engage in it, are becoming indifferent to it. Merchants want their goods moved from one section of the country to another without delay. Many kinds of work in which the public are directly interested, such as track laying, road mending and building sewers, are pushed on Sunday as on other days on the ground of public convenience, and the slightest excuse is often counted sufficient. In many States Sunday excursion travel in summer, with the business of keeping open places of public resort, has reached enormous proportions. Of course private enterprise will more and more follow public custom.

In all these ways heavier burdens are laid on laboring men than they ought to bear, and the public is responsible for it. Much of it is done in defiance of law, which weakens popular respect for government. The Railway Review, discussing Sunday railroad work, says that employés are impressed with the idea that regard for law is a matter of convenience rather than necessity. They have a feeling that Sabbath hours are theirs, and when they are robbed of these they have a rankling sense of injustice which rises to the surface as an element imbittering strikes when they come to resist law in the effort to obtain what they believe to be their rights.

We believe that the law of God and the law of man's physical nature give to every one a weekly rest day. We believe it would promote the well-being of the State and of society to provide a statute law giving to every working man one day in seven for his own, and we believe that such a law, independent of the Sabbath question, would make for public safety and peace, and indirectly for the sanctity of the Lord's Day. Such legislation in Massachusetts, we are confident, would find hearty support.

OUR OWN CHURCH COVENANT.

A church's covenant too often is treated as if its acceptance were a mere formality, not intended to be taken very seriously. And the evident difficulty of keeping it faithfully and fully, especially in the cases of large churches, is allowed to justify its neglect. But such a mutual pledge is too grave to be dealt with lightly. It should be interpreted reasonably, of course. Its obligations are to be fulfilled with good sense and tact not less than with spiritual fidelity. It implies the exercise of sincere friendliness rather than of a critical, censorious spirit. But it is real and solemn. In the case of a small church, of which most, if not all, the members are mutually acquainted, to be faithful to it is comparatively easy; and in that of a large church, including several hundred members, in which only certain officials can readily know all personally, nevertheless it is each one's duty and privilege to promote loyalty to their common covenant as far as possible.

Of course the purpose of the covenant is to secure mutual spiritual harmony and coöperation. No one is supposed to have entered into it who is not in essential agreement with the Christian doctrines avowed by the church, with the common purpose to live a consecrated life, and with the necessary and proper aims of the church to win the unconverted to Christ and to carry on his helpful and beneficent, as well as his spiritually saving, work in the community. To these objects all who join in covenant pledge themselves, and the pledge implies, and often distinctly demands, mutual sympathy, confidence, forbearance, watchfulness and aid. It emphasizes the importance of the distinction which is insisted upon so rightfully in international strife between organized and guerrilla warfare. Any army, large or small and whether engaged in earthly or spiritual conflict, can accomplish more and accomplish it better if covenanted together than its individual members possibly can accomplish separately, even if animated by equal zeal.

The greatest benefit of a church covenant, however, lies in the tender, spiritual intimacy between individuals which it aids to promote. By bringing them closer in understanding and sympathy to one another, it brings them all closer to Jesus Christ. Words of consolation, encouragement, advice and even warning pass from one to another with a power which they would not have but for the mutual covenant. A genuine and proper esprit de corps exists and has immense value. The church in which the covenant is most of a reality is sure to be that most harmonious, energetic, fruitful and honored, not only for its deeds but even more for its spirit. "See how these Christians love one another," the ideal testimony to the success and value of a church, never is heard of a church the members of which are indifferent to their covenant.

CURRENT HISTORY.

The Anglo-American Arbitration Treaty.

This treaty, which in its complete form was first published in the London Chronicle and the Boston Globe, thanks to Secretary Olney's intimate relations with the gentleman who represents those papers in Washington, is now in the hands of the Foreign Relations Committee in the Senate. And notwithstanding the joy which the treaty has created in the hearts of the people in this country, it is possible, nay, even probable, that it may not be ratified by the Senate of this Congress. Several causes operate to cause this attitude. Secretary Olney's promulgation of the text of the treaty before it had been read to the Senate was an act characteristic of him, but it was unprecedented and impolitic, and not calculated to smooth the way for prompt or favorable consideration. His recent defiance of the Senate and contempt for its prerogatives have made new enemies for him and the Administration. The almost complete alienation between Mr. Cleveland and his party leaves him but few party champions in the Senate, and his persistent official and personal hostility to the silver propaganda has earned for him the enmity of men of both parties in the Senate. For these reasons it might seem as if it were unlikely that the treaty would be ratified at this session, but we are confident that if there were no other reasons for delaying ratification popular opinion would make itself felt in such a way as to cause the Senate to ratify. But there are men like Senators Davis of Minnesota, Gray of Delaware, Hawley of Connecticut and Morrill of Vermont who are opposed to ratification on grounds that merit careful consideration. They differ somewhat on details, of course, but their main contentions are that the results of arbitration in the past have not been entirely satisfactory to the United States; that King Oscar of Norway and Sweden is not impartial enough to be the person who shall name the final umpire; and that by the provisions of the treaty we would be compelled to arbitrate the Monroe Doctrine and all other contentions that we have stood for respecting the future course of events in Cuba, Hawaii, Alaska and Central and South America. It is asserted by those who favor the immediate ratification of the treaty that Great Britain has already accepted the Olney version of the Monroe Doctrine in the recently signed treaty respecting the settlement of the Venezuelan dispute, and that Great Britain either has been or can be committed to a satisfactory understanding respecting Cuba and Hawaii. Apparently there is to be careful consideration of the matter before action is taken, and no one can object to this. In so doing the Senate is justified. But final action should be based on conviction, not pique or hatred.

The comment of European journalists and statesmen upon the treaty is profoundly significant, indicating their appreciation of its significance, and revealing a disposition, especially on the Continent, to use it as the text for preaching the necessity of disarmament and ushering in the era of international peace. The moral significance of the prospective alliance few fail to discern, and speculation concerning its political bearing is rife, as might be expected. For European diplomats are not so dull that they cannot see that it may be the beginning of a defensive, if not offensive, alliance of English-speaking peoples. Once this is created any domination of the world by a Slav-Mongolian alliance is postponed—to say the least.

The Gold Standard and Currency Reform.

The convention of business men held in Indianapolis last week, in which were enrolled 270 delegates representing trade and commercial organizations from more than sixty cities in all sections of this country, will, we are sure, have a decided influence on the course of events in this country during coming years. It marks the beginning of a new era in our history. When representative merchants of Boston, Mass., Charleston, S. C., Dallas, Tex., and Minneapolis, voicing the opinions of business men in those communities, can meet calmly and plan how to bring pressure to bear on our lawmakers to secure legislation which will give us a stable monetary and a flexible and adequate currency system, then the era of sectional misunderstanding and of partisan blindness has begun to fade away, and a new and more prosperous period of our history has begun. There were radicals and opportunists in the convention at Indianapolis, and it was, therefore, all the more surprising and gratifying that, after strenuous discussion, the convention could adopt a platform on which all will stand. Below will be found the resolutions embodying the sentiment of the delegates:

> This conference declares that it has become absolutely necessary that a consistent, straightforward and deliberately planned monetary system shall be inaugurated, the fundamental basis of which should be:
> First, That the present gold standard should be maintained.
> Second, That steps should be taken to insure the ultimate retirement of all classes of United States notes by a gradual and steady process, so as to avoid injurious contraction of the currency or disturbance of the business > interests of the country, and that, in such retirement, provision should be made for a separation of the revenue and note issue departments of the Treasury.

> Third, That a banking system be provided which should furnish credit facilities to every portion of the country and a safe and elastic circulation, and especially with a view to securing such a distribution of the loanable capital of the country as will tend to equalize the rates of interest in all parts thereof.

A practical plan for securing such legislation also was devised.

We cannot believe reports from Washington which describe Congressmen as indifferent to the proceedings of this convention. If they are found to be so it will simply confirm public distrust of Congress. Certain it is that if the representatives of the men who met at Indianapolis meet with anything like contempt or disrespect when they appear in Washington to press their demands, they can rally a constituency which will see to it that men are elected to Congress who will give ear to the business men of the country.

The Character of the United States Senate.

Senator Lodge of Massachusetts, in a recent article, contended that the United States Senate was quite as worthy of respect and confidence as it ever was, and Senator Hawley of Connecticut has just come to the defense of his colleagues in the same vigorous way. It doubtless is true that the senators drink less, fight fewer duels and are thriftier and more intelligent. But that they are as concerned with the public welfare, as able to deal with large questions in a profound way, and as near the common people as their ante-bellum predecessors were is not the opinion of many men without the Senate, whose perspective probably is better than men in the Senate. Nor is this strange, considering the two distinct types of men who have found favor with our State legislators of late. What valuable contribution to public life or debate on representative institutions can a "party boss" or a plutocrat make? And yet, these are the men that some of our oldest and best commonwealths persist in sending to the Senate. Each of the great parties is equally guilty, and the North is a greater sinner than the South. Nothing but a public uprising has just saved Illinois from having a ward-heeler put in the place of Palmer, and in line with a succession of men like Trumbull, Washburne and Logan. Pennsylvania has decided to give Mr. Quay a colleague who is to be his tool, not a servant of the people. Indiana will send an able Methodist lawyer, whose wealth has come largely from fees from corporations. Connecticut wisely decides to return Mr. O. Platt, but her conservative good sense only serves to accentuate the folly of some of her sister States. As for New York, the seven votes cast for Mr. Joseph Choate in the Republican caucus are the true measure of the degree of independent thought and patriotism which obtain among the Republican politicians of the Empire State. Hence Mr. T. C. Platt will return to the Senate, as his own choice, nominally the representative of his party and the people, but really the creation of venal underlings, whose votes he controls because he gives them patronage and pays their campaign expenses. Rev. Dr. Storrs has recently summed up the situation thus, and who will challenge the truth of his saying, "The State is disgraced, the legislature degraded and the moral cohesion of the Republican party gone utterly."

Who Shall Represent the United States in Turkey?

While politicians are speculating as to the personnel of Mr. McKinley's Cabinet, and while thoughtful men of all parties and in all walks of life are devoutly praying that he will call about him men of high character and positive convictions, it would be well also if some attention could be given to consideration of the character and ability of those who will represent us abroad. Already we hear rumors of decisions as to those who are to go to London and Paris. May it not be well also to think of Constantinople and our interests in Turkey? The present minister's incompetency and lack of character have made it all the more necessary that his successor should be a man of experience, sagacity, and sufficient sympathy with mission work to make him as alert in protecting missionary and educational interests as in guarding merchants and merchandise. Assuming that the new Secretary of State will be the right sort of a man, can he not have as an effective servant and subordinate in Constantinople an ambassador, not a minister, one who can by reason of his rank be taken into the confidence of the representatives of other Powers, and by reason of his ability and surroundings command the respect of the Turkish officials? As it is not probable that Turkey will raise her representative at Washington to the rank of ambassador, and thus make it possible for us under our present law to raise the rank of our representative in Turkey, can there not be special legislation, thus making it probable that men like ex-Secretary of State J. W. Foster, or ex-Ambassadors J. B. Angell and Andrew D. White would consider it less of a sacrifice for them to accept a nomination to this important position should Mr. McKinley proffer it? In any case, whether such legislation is secured or not, the man for us at Constantinople during the coming four years must be of the very highest type, and men who think so and have influence with the incoming Administration should at once make their convictions known in an effective way. It would be well, also, if our present competent and long-tested consul at Sivas, Mr. Jewett, now in this country on a furlough, could be promoted to the post of consul general at Constantinople.

A God-fearing Statesman.

The address of Hon. Bourke Cochran at the meeting of the Boston Merchants' Association, last week, will with difficulty be forgotten by those who heard it. It was surcharged not only with good sense and eloquence, but also with implicit faith in God and the moral law, as the following quotations from it will show:

> The road to wealth lies through obedience to the law of God. When the first man was excluded from a life of ease, the merciful God that sentenced him to support his life by labor showed him in that sentence how the penalty could best be borne. Nothing that man can make, nothing that he can enjoy can be his except through the product of his labor. The law which compels him to work he can neither evade nor revise. It has governed his being from the hour of his fall. It will govern him until the hour of his last judgment. . . .
> The true lesson in political economy is not to be found even in Adam Smith, certainly not in populistic rhetoric. We find it formulated on the shores of Lake Galilee 1900 years ago, when the Saviour of mankind declared that, next to the love of God, the supreme duty of man was to love his neighbor as himself. Economists, who in the light of civilization have studied the problem of life, agree today that every man must serve his neighbor as he serves himself. . . .
> How can a movement which is leveled against co-operation of man, which is based on distrust between the different elements of society, how can it ever hope to triumph over the government which is based upon these principles of truth and justice, truth eternal as the hills, which come not from man but descend from heaven? . . .
> So, whatever men may say and whatever men may do, however disturbances may arise to shock credit, however commercial panics may be precipitated by the incendiary utterances of persons raised to a brief authority, whatever clouds may darken the sky and whatever disturbances may agitate our thoughts, we know that in the end throughout this country truth, justice, law must triumph, because this Government is based on that word which was in the beginning, and that word was God.

Mr. Cochran was driven out of Congress because he failed to crook the knee to Richard Croker, Tammany's aforetime boss. He is now a man of leisure, devoting his remarkable talent to giving such inspiring utterances as we have quoted from. New York suffers because men like Choate and Cochran are excluded from Congress and men like Croker and Platt name their puppets. Perhaps some good Protestant reader may question the sincerity of Mr. Cochran's references to God, because, forsooth, he is a Roman Catholic. Let him recall what Lincoln said to those who described Grant as a whisky-drinker. Moreover, believe us. On New Year's Day morning we saw Mr. Cochran kneeling among the lowly and poor in St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York. If ever we saw humility, adoration, joy, tenderness on the face of a man, we saw it on his face then, and to witness the spectacle as a whole was to gain a new and profounder conception of the beauty and power of prayer as a tie uniting man to man as well as man to God.

How Woman's Suffrage Is to Win.

The campaign to secure woman's suffrage is to be waged on new lines, if we are to accept the statement made last week at the annual meeting of the Massachusetts Association:

> In the past, we have thought that what was needed was to convince people of the justice of woman suffrage. What we need now is not education so much as good political tactics; not agitation, but campaign work. If we are able to find among our workers a few minds of that caliber, the sun of this century, near as it is drawing to its close, may yet set on woman suffrage everywhere. It is like a rock on the edge of a mountain; it takes time and effort to get it over the verge, but once over, it goes fast. Men in Congress, not known as suffragists, say to us privately: "When woman suffrage becomes a practical political question, we will stand with you and fight for you."

This is the new scheme set forth by the head of the National Organization Committee. Our opinion is that this country is already cursed with quite enough "political tactics." As we understood the remarks as they were uttered in Park Street Church, they were nothing more or less than a plea for gaining a real or fancied right by the use of diplomacy, and that not always of the noblest type. Does the official correctly interpret the aims of her society, and if so we venture to ask whether Mrs. Mary Livermore's study of the temperance problem leads her to believe that it is well to enact into constitutional or statutory law that which does not rest upon the deliberate judgment of the electors? Where are the amendments to the Federal Constitution nullified which followed the victories of the Federal troops, which victories Julia Ward Howe did much to inspire, and where are they operative? The true friends of the woman's suffrage movement will insist upon continuing a policy of education, and not seek to enter the troubled, slimy pool of "practical politics."

Plague and Famine Stricken India.

Continental Europe, as well as Great Britain, is at last aroused to the awful character and portent of the horrors caused by the twin daughters of misery as they now go stalking remorselessly over India. France, Germany, Austria, Russia, Italy and Turkey have united in a call for an international conference at Rome to consider ways and means of preventing the bubonic fever from entering Europe. At last the British Indian officials realize their impotence and are clamoring for aid, and London's Lord Mayor's relief fund already is swelled to fair dimensions for ordinary circumstances, but pitifully inadequate in face of such a crisis. Soon we must show our traditional generosity and help in the humane work. All the resources of modern science will stand ready to combat the plague if it attempts to leave the Orient for the Occident, but apprehension of the plague should not swallow up pity for the starving, who as yet greatly outnumber the plague stricken. The Indian treasury is now feeding 3,000,000 natives employed on relief works, but the total population of the famine stricken districts is 81,000,000. Thousands are dying daily, and food for natives and foreigners commands extortionate prices. How little we realize the new and awful problems which our missionaries are facing in India—problems of finance, problems of sanitation, problems of submitting submissively to seeing converts starve, congregations dissolve and the work of years melt away! Yet if they cable or write for extra appropriations to meet the new emergencies, how can their importunate requests be met by officials who in almost every instance face treasuries whose coffers are empty, or likely to be ere the year closes?

NOTES.

Congress will do well to listen to the petition from the Massachusetts Historical Society asking that the old frigate, the Constitution, now lying at Portsmouth, N. H., be saved from decay or destruction.

The United States Supreme Court decides that those provisions of South Carolina's dispensary law, which forbid citizens importing liquor into the State for their own use, contravene the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution, and therefore are invalid.

The total exports of this country during the year 1896 were $1,005,878,417, and our imports were $680,556,233, creating a balance of trade in our favor of $325,322,184. May we venture to suggest to our legislators in Washington that they carefully consider this fact?

Germany is now Russia's ally at Constantinople in insisting that the sultan shall be given ample time to institute reforms, and Great Britain and Italy find it quite useless to insist on immediate armed intervention. There are many who think Russia will act independently in the spring, and an uprising of the Moslem population at any time would not be surprising to those who know how generally and quietly they have been purchasing arms of late.

The death of United States Minister Willis in Hawaii, Jan. 6, removes one, who, as a subordinate, was loyal to his chief in carrying out a policy in Hawaii which, nevertheless, did not meet the approval of the new republic or of the people of this country. But when the Administration ceased attempting to turn back the wheels of destiny and recognized the new republic, Mr. Willis began a career of mediation in which he won considerable popularity and respect for his personal character.

The February Atlantic will be notable for the article A Study of American Liquor Law, made by Presidents Eliot of Harvard and Low of Columbia Universities and James C. Carter, the eminent jurist. They conclude that "almost every sort of liquor legislation creates some specific evil in politics," and give the facts to support this contention. The article will go far toward accelerating the reaction toward more insistence by individuals on temperance for individuals and the use of social agencies other than legal to effect given ends.

Pope Leo is said to have declined to approve the Manitoba school compromise, nor will he order the Quebec hierarchy to cease interfering with Catholic laymen's politics; hence, the war will go on. In Mexico, however, wearied of the contest with the Diaz administration, and convinced that it is policy now to acquiesce in the status quo, Archbishop Averardi, delegated from Rome to investigate, has issued orders that the Roman Catholics must hereafter heartily support Diaz and comply with all reform laws governing ecclesiastical affairs.

The venerable Senator John Sherman of Ohio announces that he has been invited by Mr. McKinley to serve as Secretary of State. If Mr. Sherman had been named for Secretary of the Treasury, his nomination to a place in the new Cabinet would have given greater satisfaction. The problems which we face in our foreign policy demand the careful and prolonged investigation of data which no one as venerable and as feeble as Mr Sherman can give, and they call for a definiteness of purpose and force of character which he lacks. Moreover, in view of his utterances a year ago, denying the right of American missionaries in Turkey to protection, we question very much whether he can be counted upon to do what should be done in Turkey by the next administration.

IN BRIEF.

Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan of New York city has given $1,000,000 to the Lying-In Hospital of the metropolis. A superb gift to a noble cause.

An evangelist has recently been expelled from the Methodist Episcopal Church in Kentucky for persisting in holding revival services in a field occupied by another minister of the same denomination and against his protest. If this action could be imitated in all cases where evangelists attack the piety or capacity of pastors to whose people they preach, there might be fewer evangelists but more godliness.

Dr. George F. Pentecost, in his farewell to Marylebone Presbyterian Church of London, of which he has been pastor for nearly five years, explained that he was going to become pastor of a Presbyterian church in Yonkers, N. Y., "because I feel the hand of God upon me." Since then, however, the London Presbytery has spoken, and a cable dispatch announces that Dr. Pentecost will remain in London.

The Pacific, somewhat more than forty-five years old, follows its contemporaries by reducing the size and increasing the number of its pages. With its new editor, Rev. J. A. Cruzan, it starts out afresh to serve the churches and the cause of Congregationalism on the Pacific coast. It well deserves their support, and if they give it heartily the paper will do more for their prosperity than they can do for it.

The new Government silver two-dollar bill has a picture of a self-binder and the inventor of it, Cyrus H. McCormick. The advantages of paper money as an advertising agent have as yet only begun to be realized. If a new three-dollar bill is to be issued we propose that it be stamped with the heading of the oldest religious newspaper in the world, with the suggestion that it is good for a year's subscription—with a generous discount for clubs. We will furnish the heading.

Dr. Creighton, bishop-elect of London, has informed the officials of the National Council of the Evangelical Free Church, which will soon meet in London for its annual meeting, that he is sure the clergy and laity of the Church of England in the diocese of London will be glad to assist in entertaining some of the delegates to the council; and that he expects to have the pleasure of acting as host to some such in his Fulham Palace home. The partition walls are breaking down.

The reason for substituting at Yale a Sunday in place of the regular Day of Prayer for Colleges, as given in our reports of religious life at the colleges, is one which we should suppose would apply in other similar institutions. At Dartmouth this year, for the first time, a part of the day is given to recitations. At Amherst the main service on the Day of Prayer has always been, and still is, compulsory, and we presume this continues to be the custom at most of our colleges.

Honors for Rev. Dr. Charles Cuthbert Hall of Brooklyn, whom Andover Seminary unsuccessfully tried to win as an instructor of her youth, are accumulating. He is to edit the American edition of the Expositor and he has just been recommended as president of the faculty of Union Seminary, New York city, Rev. Dr. Thomas S. Hastings, the present president, being forced to retire on account of ill health. He will be elected and take the chair of pastoral theology which Rev. Dr. George Lewis Prentiss formerly held.

The death of Dr. Herber Evans, principal of Bangor College, Wales, removes from the ranks of British Congregationalists one of the most original and potent of its forceful men. He was a typical Welsh Nonconformist minister. The son of a miner, he never ceased to be a man of the people. Witty, eloquent, as most Welshmen are, pious and wise, he won the respect of men of all churches and all races. Two years ago he was honored by election to the chairmanship of the Congregational Union of England and Wales.

Christian Scientists claim to have wrought wonderful cures without recourse to medicine. A journal advocating this kind of healing advocates the gaining of an education by similar processes, and gives an account of persons who have become experts in music, art and mathematics without human teachers or books by "going into the silence some two hours each day and learning by inspiration from the Source of all knowledge." That is the first step toward abolishing schools and colleges. But when there is no longer need of teachers or books, what will be the advantage of getting an education?

By way of London we learn that no overtures to Rev. John Watson, D. D. (Ian Maclaren), from Broadway Tabernacle were made until the close of his visit here, and then were respectfully but decidedly declined. Dr. Watson told his congregation, in the first sermon which he preached to them after his return, its theme being The Divine Love, that nothing he saw or heard in this country, not even Niagara nor "the Spirit of God working in a new civilization," had impressed him as much as the story told him in historic Concord of how of late its citizens on April 19 decorate not only the graves of the Americans but the British who fell in the ever memorable conflict. Here, he said, was the testimony of a spirit of love and reconciliation which would make it forever impossible for the two kindred nations to resort to war.

Evidently Mr. Moody is so impressed with the peculiarly favorable conditions in this country for revival work that he is laying hold of the best material possible for deepening and extending it. Rev. F. B. Meyer has always been a favorite at the Northfield summer convocations, and though engrossed in his great work at Christ Church, London, he has been persuaded to drop it for a few weeks and come to this country. He will be here only ten days but will probably speak two or three times a day. He will begin his work in Boston Feb. 4, remaining here until the 7th, when he will go to Carnegie Hall, New York, being there from the 8th to the 12th. Dr. Meyer has been particularly happy in his addresses to ministers, and we doubt not that he will bring not only to them but to the rank and file of church members generally a special and important message.

The Mayflower Descendants who met in Plymouth last week to consolidate their New York, Pennsylvania and New England chapters, and elect officials of a general society or patriotic order, did well to do so, and that too just where they did. But may a criticism be ventured on the titles selected, which to us do not savor of Pilgrim simplicity? Governor general and deputy governor general may pass, but "secretary general," "treasurer general," "historian general," "elder general"—that is, chaplain—they are too general, if a play upon words may be permitted. It is a splendid fact that the descendants of the Mayflower are organizing to cherish and preserve the Pilgrim traditions and ideals, but in doing it they need to be democratic and simple, eschewing regalia, exorbitant initiation fees and dues, and all such barriers to the fullest development of their noble plan. Rev. Dr. Edward L. Clark of the Central Church, Boston, is one of the leading spirits of the new society.

The effort emanating from various denominational boards to secure simultaneous meetings last week in the interests of foreign missions seems to have met with more of a response in New York and Chicago than in this vicinity. Franklin describes in his Interior letter the large gatherings in Chicago. Twenty-two denominations were represented in a largely attended meeting in Carnegie Hall, New York, on Friday evening. Gen. J. A. Beaver, Dr. R. S. Storrs and Bishop Fowler made addresses. Dr. Storrs said that the church fails to grasp spiritual things with the old vividness and vigor. "It walks in embroidered slippers—it is not iron shod." In the multiplicity of claims on its interest and gifts it is in danger of remitting foreign missions to the rear. He urged Christians to wait in prayer, to have confidence in the power of God and not to be discouraged by temporary hindrances. We are glad to learn that the churches are not limiting themselves to the special dates at first selected. The present week is witnessing a number of such interdenominational gatherings.

While Berea College has not yet secured its needed endowment, it is scoring large successes in its educational work. The number of students from the North is steadily increasing, and the breaking down of prejudice and rise of educational ambition is marked by an unprecedented influx of Southern students the present term. A large proportion of these are young people who have been teaching in the public schools, which are in session only five months, from July to November. This is good material from which to form the constituency of a college. Professor Greenough of Westfield, Mass., has kindly consented to do some of the extra teaching required by this increase of students, and a cheap new dormitory for young men, on the English plan, has been erected through the liberality of Mr. Algernon P. Nichols of Haverhill. The movement for endowment is hindered by the necessity of securing money for current expenses month by month. President Frost spoke at Harvard Church, Brookline, Sunday, and will be in this vicinity for a fortnight longer. His appeals should find prompt response.

FROM THE INTERIOR.

The Field Museum.

The curator asserts that this museum will soon be able to display one of the finest collections in the world of African animals whose habitat is between southern Abyssinia and the equator. To this collection additions have recently been made as the result of a dangerous journey taken in the interests of the museum by Professors Elliot and Oakley. If strangers visiting Chicago would arrange for a day in this museum, they would be abundantly rewarded for their trouble.

Deepening Religious Interest.

Of this there are many signs. Not only are reports coming to the city nearly every day of revivals in small country towns, but the city itself seems to be giving more attention to religious subjects than usual. In response to a letter sent out by Rev. R. A. Torrey of the Bible Institute, many pastors were present at the large noon meeting in Association Hall Monday. At the close a committee of fifteen pastors was appointed to make such arrangements for revival services in the churches of the city as seem feasible and wise. Meantime meetings have been held daily at noon in Association Hall and with encouraging success. With two exceptions they have been led by Mr. Torrey, who is extremely fortunate in his methods of conducting them. He is no novice in revival work. As pastor of the Chicago Avenue Church, formerly Mr. Moody's, he has received into its fellowship during the last three years over nine hundred persons, nearly all of them on confession of faith. This year the additions are not less than last year. His preaching is simple and Biblical. After meetings are held and personal conversation secures favorable decisions in many hesitating minds. It would seem as if most pastors might gather more fruit than they do were they to adopt some of Mr. Torrey's methods.

Dr. Withrow and the Third Church.

Dr. Withrow has been pastor in Chicago ten years. He looks upon them as the best ten years of his life. His church has been responsive to his wishes, and earnest in its desire to do the Christian work for which a church exists. Its revenues for home work have been large and its contributions to outside objects generous. Since Dr. Withrow came to Chicago almost $440,000 have passed through the hands of the church treasurer. Meanwhile, Dr. Withrow has made not less than 10,000 pastoral calls. He has been president of the Presbyterian Hospital, one of the most important members of the Presbyterian League, and has written the comments on the Sunday school lesson, first for the Interior, and latterly, as affording a larger audience, for the Record. Chosen moderator of the last General Assembly, it is not strange that his church and his Presbyterian brethren in the city should desire to mark the completion of his ten years' of service as pastor. This was done in a way most pleasing to Dr. and Mrs. Withrow, in the parlors of the church, Tuesday evening, Jan. 12. As expressive in some sense of their regard for Mrs. Withrow, the ladies of the church presented her with an amethyst brooch surrounded with pearls, and fairly overwhelmed her with flowers. The program of the evening furnished addresses from persons representing the session, the trustees and the deacons of the church, and the Presbytery of Chicago. They were hearty, friendly addresses, and coming from such men as Dr. Gray of the Interior, Dr. McPherson of the Second Church, Dr. McClure of Lake Forest, and Dr. Meloy, a United Presbyterian neighbor, must have been peculiarly gratifying to Dr. Withrow, whose response was in complete harmony with the spirit of the evening. Many outside the Third Church trust that the health of the Doctor will permit him to serve the church at least ten years more, and that the second decade may, if possible, be even more fruitful than the first.

Missionary Rallies.

These were held Thursday and Friday evenings, one in the New England Church on the North Side, one in the Forty-first Street Presbyterian Church on the South Side and one in the Third Church on the West Side. Presiding officers in each case were of a different denomination from that of the church where the meetings were held. While the speakers were from the city, care was taken that all signs of a denominational spirit should disappear and that the addresses should be of a purely missionary character. At the rally in the Auditorium there was genuine missionary enthusiasm. The services were introduced by a chorus choir of our hundred voices. Dr. Withrow presided. The speakers were Dr. Willard Scott, representing the Congregationalists, Dr. A. C. Hirst, who spoke for the Methodists and Dr. P. S. Henson, pastor of the First Baptist Church. Each of the speakers was at his best. Such gatherings express the feeling of unity which actually exists among the followers of Christ far better than any formal resolutions and furnish a good ground for hope that the day is not distant when undue denominational zeal and sectarianism will pass away. It is thought that such a testimony as these meetings have presented will convince those who do not believe in missions of their power and usefulness.

Religious Life in Our Seminary.

It might be taken for granted that this would always be at flood tide. Experience proves that it is not. Last year, however, and this year, the spiritual life of our students has seemed to be deeper and more aggressive than in some previous years. A merely intellectual apprehension of the truths taught has not been deemed satisfactory. In the prayer meetings there has been manifest an ardent desire for a genuine spiritual experience and for a willingness to be led by the Holy Spirit, which has been gratifying and encouraging to the professors. Both instructors and students are looking forward with much interest to the Day of Prayer for colleges, which often brings with it an uplift for the Christian life of the seminary as well as for that of many of our colleges.

And at the University.

President Harper of the University of Chicago has expressed more sorrow over the lack of provision for the religious life of his students than over any other lack in the institution. As is well known, there is at present no place on the campus, or near it, where professors and students can all meet at any one time. The president has been anxious that some generous friend or friends should provide a chapel, or a building which should contain a chapel, large enough for the needs of the university, and be devoted wholly to religious uses. It is no secret that voluntary attendance at prayers has not been as satisfactory as was anticipated. Neither professors nor students have manifested the interest in chapel exercises which was desired. Recently there has been something like a return to the compulsory method. At least once a week every member of the university is required to attend prayers. Were Cobb Hall, where the students now meet, larger doubtless attendance would be required more than once a week. At present this is the best that can be done. Considering all things, those best qualified to judge think that the religious life of the university is quite as good as one ought to look for in present conditions. It is not what the president and many of his assistants and friends of the university desire, nor what it is confidently believed it will be in the near future. Still it is by no means at a low ebb. Divinity students and professing Christians in the university proper are making their influence felt more and more every day.

In the Northwestern University, in the Presbyterian Seminary and at Lake Forest Christian life is always kept in the foreground, yet not in such a way as to be repulsive or unnatural, but so as to make it clear to all that a follower of Christ is regarded as the highest type of a man. The same can be said of most of our colleges, not only of those under Congregational control, but of those controlled by any one of our evangelical denominations. In all these institutions the Day of Prayer is observed with sincere faith and hope.

FROM INDIA.

Receiving the Election News.

There are occasions when in the wilds of Africa or in the interior of China one may still long for a nearness to the outer world. It must be, for instance, a great trial to any educated and patriotic American to have to wait for many days or weeks for the result of such an event as the recent presidential election. How near India is to the rest of the world may be illustrated by a recent event. A few of us Americans were exceedingly anxious to get the news of the great election in the States at as early a date as practicable. We clubbed a few annas together, sent them to the manager of a daily in Madras, requesting him to telegraph the first definite news of the election. By this means the thrilling and welcome words, "McKinley is elected President," reached us, three miles from the railway station in this remote part of the world, at 3.30 P. M. on Wednesday, which, be it remembered, was really before 5 A. M. of the same day at your progressive Boston, and before the election day itself had reached its midnight at San Francisco. Thus our hearts were cheered and our nerves set at rest before any but a select few in the States knew the issue of their memorable day's work. Before this same day was closed the money market of India throbbed with excitement over the same result. Our poor, miserable rupee has rejoiced and somewhat rehabilitated itself upon Bryan's fall. That we in India are one with our antipodal neighbors in the States no one can further doubt, and we trust that our mission work may speedily partake of the financial and other blessings which must flow to the States in the wake of this election.

Visitors of Many Kinds.

The "cold season" of India is upon us, and with it comes the increasing annual flood of foreigners who, for a few days or a few weeks, take possession of the land and then carry home their crude and often false impressions to their own countries and friends. We wish that a much larger proportion of these globe-trotters were earnest Christian men and women who, when they pass through places of interest, might have an eye to the study of live mission work as well as of moribund idolatry. Not one out of five of these good people, many of whom are earnest Christian workers at home, think of informing themselves on the spot of the missions which perhaps they help to support, nor of encouraging their missionaries in their labors. And these same persons will speak with oracular wisdom and authority on the subject of missions when they return home, and their words will tally with their conduct and remind one of the lecture on Snakes in Ireland. But not all travelers are such. The few come to learn and bring abundant cheer and inspiration to the missionary. They come, see and are conquered, and return to their homes as warm friends of missions. Would that their tribe increased! Others, in growing numbers, visit this land for a small season of vigorous Christian work.

A Welcome for Dr. Barrows.

The most notable of this class of visitors this season is Dr. Barrows. He will receive a large and cordial welcome and will doubtless wield a wide influence. Three things will conspire to this. In the first place, all Christian workers will give him a cordial salaam because of his well-known eloquence and Christian principles. They will also welcome him as the first representative of a new and excellent form of Christian work in this land—the Haskell Lectureship on Comparative Religion. The possibilities of this lectureship are great, and in the hands of Dr. Barrows will have an auspicious inauguration. He will doubtless find an exceptionally warm reception among educated Hindus. To them he is the founder and head of the Parliament of Religions, which they believe to have been the greatest advertisement and Occidental send off that their religion ever received. The missionaries do not care at present to discuss this question, lest it might seem to reflect upon the cordiality of the reception which they wish to tender him and his work. Certainly India is large enough and its 300,000,000 souls give scope enough for all departments of Christian activity and for the largest and most varied talents. All we ask is a consuming zeal for the salvation of these perishing millions.

Another good Christian worker has just come from Chicago for a more extended work among college youth in Calcutta, where there are scores of colleges and many thousands of bright and promising students. Professor White enters into a large field of work already opened in part by his brother, Mr. Campbell White of Y. M. C. A. fame. When we see these sturdy laborers coming to India from Chicago, and hear at the same time that that great city has thrown overboard the notorious Altgeld, we feel more than ever like accusing Mr. Stead of libeling the great Western metropolis.

The Famine.

The word famine, in connection with this land, brings dread visions of wide-spread calamity, emaciation, disease and death. The foreigner who has passed through a season of famine in any part of India will never forget the ghastly sights and sounds which made his heart sick and his life a burden to him. Hardly a year passes without some part of this wide peninsula suffering from drought and a failure of crops. And to a people who are ever living on the borderland of want and extremity the loss of one crop is enough to create distress, suffering and even a large mortality. Today the old famine cry is taken up and voices the condition of a very extensive territory, from the Himalayas on the north even to the southern presidency. Doubtless there is already much distress felt, and government is initiating plans for relieving the sufferers.

Relieving Features.

This Anglo-Indian government may be thanked for making such a terrible famine as that of twenty years ago a present impossibility. During these years it has spent millions of rupees in building railways by which food may be easily distributed to all parts of the land, and thus the most terrible features and results of famine averted. To add to the present trouble an old enemy in the character of the black plague, or, as it is more correctly called, the bubonic plague, has laid its heavy hands upon the city of Bombay, from which center of commerce it will doubtless be carried to many other places as it has already been carried to Calcutta. With a plague and a famine on its hands the government will find its sympathy, efforts and funds severely taxed during the coming months.

One of the most encouraging facts connected with the present distress is the readiness with which many native princes and gentlemen of means are organizing to assist in relieving the suffering of the poor. It is one of the latest results of Western influence, and encourages one to believe that the supreme selfishness, or at best the very narrow sympathies, of the past will, under the influence of a new faith and of a broader civilization, give way to a public spirit and a philanthropy the lack of which is one of the greatest evils of this land. A large company has been organized in Bombay, and another is being launched in Madras, with the view of importing and selling at cost price grains from other lands, as a measure of famine relief.

A Blundering Policy.

The Salvation Army in India continues to receive more attention of a certain kind and to be subjected to more criticism than it covets. An Irish Presbyterian of the Gujerat District has just published a book rehearsing his bitter experience with the army and revealing a state of things in that organization which will surprise many outsiders, but not missionaries. It shows that however good may be the motives of the Indian leaders of this movement their methods of work have been all along demoralizing and unworthy of any class of men who pretend to represent the faith and life of our Lord to this people. In this book of Mr. Gillespie's are collected the statements of a number of independent and thoroughly reliable witnesses which must carry weight with all intelligent readers, and challenge the investigation and speedy action of the general himself, unless he wills to become partaker of the guilt of his subordinates. The least that a disinterested witness of the performances of the army in India can say is that there has been a shocking amount of blundering in its management. J. P J.

The Literary Approach to the Old Testament.*

III. The Advantage of this Method of Approach.

By Prof. Frank K. Sanders, Yale University.

In the preceding articles the character of the Old Testament as a true literature and the methods of study which are based on its recognition have been given consideration. It remains to enumerate some of the advantages to be gained by the persistent use of such methods. Strictly speaking, the word "habit" would be better than "method," for there are as many good ways of approaching the books of the Old Testament as there are varieties of literary form within it, or differing purposes in the minds of those who wish to study it. There is no method of universal application. But there is such a thing as a right point of view, an established habit of seeking for certain characteristic or at least important features of any portion of the Old Testament that one may take in hand.

One feature of the Old Testament of inestimable value is well expressed by the saying that the Bible is the plain man's book. It came into literary being, little by little, because it expressed and met a real need of a living people; it has maintained its hold upon mankind because it voices the deepest needs of the heart of man today and rouses him to self-reliant, spiritual activity. Along its broad lines it was not the work of scholars, aiming to give expression to scholarly ideals, but of men of spiritual insight and force, with very varying scholarship, who spoke and wrote for the average man of their nation and on the level of his everyday experience.

The Old Testament, therefore, as a whole, is a literature adapted to people as they average. No one is too ignorant to comprehend its fundamental ideas, no one too cultured to appreciate them. No student of the Bible can afford, however, to neglect those rules and accessories of interpretation which we apply to every other world literature. The plain man can find in the Bible truth enough to meet his actual needs as a human being, but he is far from understanding all that is really there. He reads it like a child and with a child's advantages and limitations. The reverent student, who may or may not be scholarly, but is, at least, earnest and persistent, will follow after him and pick up many unnoticed gems which his predecessor took for pebbles. The Bible is a mine of marvelous richness to the systematic explorer. He must, however, do more than aimlessly wander to and fro.

The conception of the Old Testament as a gradually developed literature must govern any sound method of approach. The two ways of grouping its contents may be briefly restated. We may classify the different writings according as they belong to historical, prophetic, wisdom or other literature, and the books or portions of books under each head may be arranged by us, as far as may be, in the order of their appearance. We may also classify the varied contents of the Old Testament chronologically, grouping together and studying as a unit all the literature originating in a certain term of years.

To take a very simple example, the story of the building of the second temple [Ezra 4: 24 to 6: 22] requires the study of the exhortations and predictions of Haggai and of the visions of Zechariah [Zech. 1–8], all uttered in connection with this very event. Moreover, it is at least interesting to note, at the same time, that the Septuagint, or Greek translation of the Old Testament, ascribes Psalms 146–148 to Haggai and Zechariah. The best scholars do not agree in all the details of such classifications as these. None has ever yet been made that commanded universal assent. But the differences are only in matters of detail, not in the point of view. A real student should try to classify the different portions of the Old Testament as he studies or reads them. The habit is of more value than the particular conclusion reached. One who has a proper habit of study will in course of time correct his serious errors; one who has no method at all can never improve. It is, therefore, worth while to consider in greater detail the advantages of working, however imperfectly, along lines of study that recognize the historical and literary character of the Old Testament.

We gain at the outset an impression, which increases with experience, of the reality of the contents of the Old Testament. If it is genuine history, then its characters were living men and women; they struggled with such life problems as we must deal with, their achievements become a part of our available experience. If we can picture to ourselves, aided by researches into geography, archæology and Eastern social life, the scenes, the surroundings, the occasions of Old Testament utterances or writings, we get at once into sympathy with the writers and begin to share in the inspiring thoughts which overmastered them.

To enter thus into the real life of Old Testament times is invaluable for the student. He seems to join the throng at Bethel which stops to listen to the stern Judæan shepherd who left his humble home to utter the burning message he dared not restrain of the certainty of God's judgment, not only upon the foreign nations which set at naught his eternal laws, but upon equally guilty Israel. He glows with pride at the knightly deeds of Jonathan, he reproaches the craftiness of the youthful Jacob, the foolhardiness of King Josiah. He makes the Old Testament a part of the life experience on which his everyday judgments rest and ceases to idealize it away from life.

As a corollary of this the student soon comes to realize that the literature of the Old Testament is to a considerable degree the outgrowth of just such religious impulses and experiences as we of today have. Mankind has not greatly changed in 3,000 years. The personalities through whom the divine will was carried out were human beings whose doubts and fears, aspirations and hindrances were such as we know. Until we come to realize this the larger part of the Old Testament may as well be made up of fairy stories, for all its real influence in shaping our character or giving an impulse to our life.

In proportion as the Old Testament grows real and personal to the student, he is led to ask himself about the point of view from which the writer of a particular book or section put its contents together, and what it meant to its original audience. He begins to distinguish the messages of different prophets, to compare the respective historians of the books of Samuel, of the books of Chronicles or of Judges, to classify the Psalms in accordance with their widely differing contents, to note the various sections of the book of Proverbs by their different style and object. He loses nothing by this added accuracy and deeper insight. It simply leads him on to the appreciative study of many parts of the Old Testament which have been previously without meaning to him. Large portions of the Old Testament are of little use to a superficial student. The results he does get are inferior, and often do violence to the real meaning of the passage or book. But when he is persuaded to treat the Old Testament with as much respect and good sense and effort as he would employ in the interpretation of a passage in a classic of English literature, he will find the whole Old Testament gradually becoming his usable possession.

This constant habit of classification and inspection promotes a habit of intelligent comparison of Scripture with Scripture, which is fatal to the practice of mechanically or carelessly discussing it, and makes it increasingly difficult to misapply it. A mind thus trained eliminates from Scripture a good many of the teachings, types and even prophecies which some are accustomed to find there, but adds an indefinite number which they cannot even comprehend.

One of the valuable features of the historico-literary point of view is that it leads the student to think and read by logical paragraphs or sections and whole books, rather than by verses or by chapters. By some persistence and patience, one can easily fasten in his mind the general, logical outline of many of the Old Testament books, and can fix the leading theme of each one. Around this central theme can be grouped by degrees the related thoughts of subordinate sections in each book, until the general sequence of ideas throughout the Old Testament is fairly clear.

The one who has made some attainment finds it difficult to make use of verses or passages without regard to their primary meaning, but he receives solid compensation in the added significance and wider usefulness of the passages already familiar. One passage clearly understood in relation to its proper context as setting forth a certain thought becomes a center of suggestion and of further acquirement. The lack of opportunity to classify, and hence retain, the spontaneous thoughts which so often spring suddenly to the mind of the Bible student wastes much valuable and earnest effort.

The crowning result to which such a habit of study leads is the gradual appreciation of the most important key to that which is perplexing and that which is valuable in the Old Testament. Not a few of its readers omit large portions, others waste much time in trying to explain away those doings of Abraham, Jacob, Joshua, David or others which do not meet the New Testament standard of morality. There are few Bible teachers who are not importuned to explain these things.

* Concluding article in a series of which the preceding articles appeared, respectively, Jan. 7 and 14.

But as soon as one understands that the Old Testament is the reflex of a nation's life, the record of a long process of divine education, by means of which the Hebrew people were enabled to embody for the world an ideal of God and of things divine, it becomes clear that the men of the Old Testament were fallible human beings. Their good and bad qualities had the same lame excuse of environment that we offer for our own drawbacks. Their enlightenment was very gradual. The study of the Old Testament from a historical standpoint brings out the educational process into bold relief. By emphasizing the wide difference between the religious development of the Hebrews and that of its closely related Semitic nations, it shows that there was a divine factor in this process.

In just what way this factor manifested itself, it does not affirm. The divine and human factors are possibly inseparable. As Wilderböer puts it, "that which from the human side is a progressive development will be from the divine side a progressive revelation." An all-wise Father brings new truth to the minds of men as soon as there arise those who are capable of grasping, assimilating and expressing it. False ethics, half-truths, imperfect ideas of every kind are to be expected, even in the Bible, as steps toward the truer and more perfect conceptions to which it gives expression.

By these various roads we gradually grasp the Old Testament revelation. Every part of it belongs to us, and is useful in some degree. As we become familiar with it, it is increasingly suggestive along the lines of religious thought, practical ethics, history and human life. It becomes a daily friend and companion, a source of never failing stimulus and of growing spirituality. Just because it is the record of a growth from the lowest to the highest stages of religious experience, it fits into the facts of life as a daily struggle toward God and gives us hope.

Since most of us require some aid in determining the historical setting and the significance of the different sections of Old Testament literature, it may be well to add that no commentaries will be found more helpful to the average student than the Bible Commentary [Scribner's. Old Testament in six volumes, $3.00 per volume] or the Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges [Macmillan. Most of Old Testament in seventeen volumes at prices from $1.25 to 40 cents]. These will help to answer all important questions. They occupy a middle ground between the severely critical and the hopelessly practical types of commentary.

But one's own results are better than those we get from a commentary. It is surprising how reliable are the judgments of the average Bible student when made directly upon the facts. One needs only to get the habit of asking himself these and other questions about any portion of the Old Testament which he may be studying: Through what kind of a man—prophet, priest, wise man or layman—did this paragraph or book come? To what class of writings does it belong? What is the general theme of the book in which it is found? How does it contribute to that theme? What did the book as a whole and this portion in particular mean to an Israelite of the time when it was first uttered or written? Does it have any added significance for us? Under what circumstances did this piece of literature take shape? What valuable ideas does it contain? Are they historical, political, sociological, theological or what? How do they bear on human life today? What measure of revealed truth do they convey? What is the logical place of this truth in reference to the whole body of religious truth revealed in the Old Testament?

The Bible thus read, classified and reflected over unquestionably approves itself to the willing student as at once a world literature of surpassing quality and power and a world revelation which can only have come from God.

RECENT WASHINGTON HAPPENINGS.

BY LILLIAN CAMP WHITTLESEY.

The Woman's Sabbath Alliance of the District of Columbia is the full name of an organization which holds but one meeting annually, but whose members are in a quiet and tactful way seeking to hold the Sabbath here as a day of rest and worship. Their declaration of principles deprecates Sunday traffic and entertainments and states that the members intend to have in their households on that day only such literature as will conserve the highest good. They agree also to consider the interest of those in their employ, providing time for rest and worship on the Lord's Day and suitable reading matter. Miss Morton, sister to the Secretary of Agriculture, is the president of the alliance. The wives of Justice Harlan, Justice Shiras, together with the names of Mrs. Frye, Mrs. Cullom, Mrs. Teller and Mrs. John W. Foster are on the list of vice-presidents.

Glancing over the congregation of stylish and prominent ladies gathered the other morning at the Church of the Covenant for the first annual meeting I could but think what a power for good such an audience represented. To some of these ladies giving a morning in the midst of the busy season means more than a gift of money, and to pledge their example and influence on the matter of Sunday dinners, receptions and newspapers is to take a stand which requires some courage to maintain.

It was not a meeting where the ladies occupied the pulpit or did much talking. The timid, dark-eyed president sat on one side of the platform, while Mrs. Hamlin, the wife of the pastor of the church and the first vice-president, presided.

A Methodist bishop, an Episcopal bishop and a Baptist college president were the speakers. Bishop Hurst, the projector of the new Methodist University, is a very plain and a very practical man. He spoke of the presence in the city of the thirty foreign legations. Many of the nations represented here have no Sabbath observance; ambassadors, ministers and attachés are watching us in this matter. Bishop Satterlee, the new bishop of the new diocese of Washington, is tall and heavily built. His speech this morning was labored. His first impression of Washington is that it is a religious city and that the Sabbath is outwardly well kept. He suggested to the ladies the preparation and distribution of a tract on the value of the Sabbath. Then he spoke of the power of prayer in this and all other good causes. Leaning over the pulpit, he talked earnestly, with none of the mannerism that might be expected from the recent rector of a fashionable New York church, just returned from a special mission to the Czar of all the Russias. President Whitman is a giant in physique and mental power. His splendid voice does not roll out platitudes, its trumpet tones are always inspiring and optimistic. Among other things, he said that a law expresses the high watermark of public sentiment. We should live up to what we have, then reach out for something better.

The following Sunday Dr. Hamlin, in the course of his sermon, said to his people: "Visiting, receptions and dinners on the Sabbath are un Christian and un-American. Perhaps we cannot expect our nation's guests from beyond the sea to conform to our time honored customs, though common courtesy would seem to require it of them. But may we not expect our own citizens to stand by our most cherished institutions?" Something of a local disturbance has been caused by an order of the district commissioners forbidding the crying of Sunday papers during the early morning hours. The Secular League has risen to the defense of the poor newsboys and has said some very unpleasant things about the churches, the ministers and Christian people generally.

A few evenings ago Bishop Satterlee gave an informal talk to the Churchman's League of the city. It was an account of his most interesting trip to Russia during the past summer. His object in going was to see the czar in person and present to him a petition asking for the interference of Russia on behalf of the persecuted Christians in Turkey. The mission was purely a religious one and was secret, though the paper had been signed by the representatives of 40,000,000 Christians in England and America, and was accompanied by a letter from the Archbishop of Canterbury. The affair would not be made public now had not a representative of a Chicago journal gotten hold of the facts and, violating the promise of secrecy, published the story full of misstatements.

The bishop said he waited some weeks in St. Petersburg before he accomplished the difficult task of a personal interview with the czar. When the important day came the Bishop said he was received into the summer home of the czar in much the same manner as he might pay a morning call in an American home. The czar and czarina gave him careful attention, both spoke English perfectly and were entirely noncommittal on the subject presented. Two days later he had a long audience with the Empress Dowager, sister to the Princess of Wales. The object of the bishop's visit to their country was, of course, not known to the Russians, but during his stay he was treated with the deference paid to dignitaries of the Greek Church, and when he left a large party attended him to the train, and the great choir of St. Isaac's sang a parting hymn. He was presented with a cross and chain of gold, and was asked to give his blessing to the crowd. Upon his return to England he was asked to Hawarden to spend an afternoon with Mr. Gladstone, who has taken a profound interest in the mission. Great are the triumphs of peace. While Lord Salisbury and Secretary Olney are negotiating the arbitration treaty which will make the closing years of the century famous, an American bishop by the concurrent wish of clergymen in England and America undertakes a mission to Russia on behalf of persecuted Christians in a fourth nation of the world.

The present Chinese minister has been appointed to St. Petersburg. This week he and Mrs. Yang Yu gave a tea that was in the nature of a formal farewell to the many friends they have made here, both in and out of official life. The parlors and the great ballroom of the brown stone house on Columbia Heights, where the yellow flag, with the dragon on it, is generally flying, were crowded with people eager to see the beautiful stuffs and curios, as well as the possessors. The flowers and entertainment were in perfect taste, and the two Chinese tots, who stood by the side of their mother and ducked their heads and held out their hands with "How do" or "Good-by, good-by," had their full share of attention. Tonight's diplomatic reception at the White House follows the first state dinner, two more dinners, two more private and one public reception will end the social functions of the present Administration at the White House. The good times of the little people about their Christmas tree and the New Year's reception at the Executive Mansion were marred by no unhappy incident. Society is in a very agreeable mood. The thought of the incoming Administration makes a pleasant stir, while those passing from the stage leave many graceful memories.

Washington, Jan. 13.

DEACON DUDLEY'S SUNDAYS IN BOSTON.

II.

BY ALDEN ENDECOTT.

"We're going out on a new line altogether today," said the deacon, as he and his wife boarded a Huntington Avenue car.

"Yes," said Mrs. Dudley, plaintively, "and I only hope we shan't need to repent of it."

It was a beautiful morning, the Sunday following Christmas Day, and as the car stopped not far from the "First Church of Christ, Scientist," they descended to the street and joined the crowd moving toward a stately building of white stone, at the corner of Falmouth and Norway Streets.

"Do you think it's a really religious meeting that we're going to?" said Mrs. Dudley, rather anxiously.

"It looks like it," said her husband, sententiously, as they passed through the broad, arched entrance which was filled with a moving throng of well dressed people, many of them with Sunday school quarterlies in their hands. The old couple were courteously welcomed and escorted by an usher to seats in the side gallery. The audience room was cheerful and churchly, with softly tinted walls, light woods and stained glass windows. It was still early, but the building was well filled, and soon after the service began nearly every seat was occupied. There must have been not far from 1,000 persons present. As they had a little time to look about them, Mr. Dudley whispered to his wife that he felt rather shy among so many women. He counted the front row in the gallery. There were fifty-one persons and only ten of them were men. Young people were rare and there were no children. Next, he began to read the texts on the walls. Some were familiar, others strange, though they all had a Biblical sound as he repeated them. He noticed that they all bore the names of their authors, such as David, Paul, Jesus, John, Mary Baker Eddy; and the last named text-maker seemed to have her full share. For example, there were shining, in letters of gold, the words,

> Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall makes you free.—Jesus.

And next to it,

> The best sermon is the practice of truth and its demonstration through the destruction of sin, disease and death.—Mary Baker Eddy.

Mrs. Dudley took a hymn-book from the rack and opened it. Her eyes caught the names dear to her heart from her childhood—Watts, Doddridge, Montgomery and many others. But as she began to read the hymns she grew confused. They were the same, yet not the same. They carried her mind curiously away from the thoughts they had always suggested, though the same thoughts hovered about them. Then she noted that after each author's name were the letters "abr. and alt." She said to herself that if the writers of these hymns could have foreseen how their work was to be tinkered and altered, they would never have written them. She turned to the preface and read the explanation that the "hymns are not strictly scientific, as the committee were obliged to select very largely from hymns composed by those who were unacquainted with the teachings of Christian Science."

Just then the organ began to play softly, and soon the choir, of four male and two female voices, sang an opening piece. Then a hymn was announced, written by Mary Baker Eddy. It was in praise of Christ and ended,

> Thou the Christ and not the creed;
> Thou the truth in thought and deed—
> Thou the water, the bread and the wine.

On the platform were two pulpits, a man behind one and a woman behind the other. The man read for a Scripture lesson Isa. 11, and then the audience bowed in silent prayer. This was followed by the Lord's Prayer, repeated in unison by the audience, a sentence at a time, while after each sentence the woman on the platform read some words intended to be explanatory, from a book by Mary Baker Eddy. At least, they seemed to be read for that purpose, though whether meant to interpret the prayer to God or to the petitioners was not clear to the Dudleys. Another hymn, and the man and woman who led the services came forward and stood side by side in their pulpits. The audience produced their little books, called Christian Science quarterlies. A neighbor offered to share her copy with Mrs. Dudley. She noticed that the selections were those of the International Sunday School Lessons, interspersed with many references to passages in other books of the Bible and especially to a book indicated by S. & H. The man minister read the first verse of the lesson (which was on the birth of Christ, Matt. 2: 1–12) and then a number of parallel passages from the Old and the New Testaments, announcing each one as arranged in the quarterly. Next, the woman minister announced and read passages from Science and Health, a Key to the Scriptures by Mary Baker Eddy. These passages seemed to indicate that sin, disease and death exist only in the imagination and disappear before the truth as revealed by Mary Baker Eddy as darkness disappears before the light. Realities are not material but spiritual, and so the Bible must be interpreted. For example, of the birth of Jesus, the woman minister read, "The virgin mother conceived this idea of God and gave to her idea the name of Jesus." Of the star in the East she read, "The Day-star of divine science is followed by wise men as it shows the way to divine harmony."

The reading continued for about forty minutes and Mrs. Dudley could not understand the reason for having so long introductory services, though a possible explanation occurred to her as her eye fell on a statement in the quarterly—the testimony of a man in Council Bluffs, Io., that he had been cured of kidney disease by reading Mary Baker Eddy's S. & H.

The deacon was getting fidgety and anxious for the sermon to begin. But he sat as still as he could, for he saw that the audience were intent on the reading and seemed not to weary of the long passages from histories, Psalms and prophecies and from Science and Health. But at last the reading closed and the boxes were passed. "Now," thought the deacon, "we shall have a sermon from one of those two ministers or from both, and we shall know something about this religion." But after the collection the choir sang a selection. Next a hymn was announced and sung. Then the minister lifted his hands, the audience rose and he pronounced what he called the scientific statement of being. It was, in substance, an avowal that there is no such thing as matter, and that spiritual entities are the only realities.

As the audience moved out of the church the deacon said to a man near him, "Is this all?"

"All for this time," was the reply, "but at three o'clock this afternoon the same service will be repeated."

"Same hymns and readings?"

"Yes, just the same."

"But isn't there any other service?"

"The Sunday school meets now and the same lesson is gone over with the children. Then there is the Friday evening meeting when those who have been healed give their testimonies."

"Is there nothing else?" said the deacon.

"Not that I know of," said the gentleman.

"Then what's the good of coming?" said Mr. Dudley.

"Why, it takes your mind off of yourself, and if you have any disease you forget it or find you didn't have it. I've only been here a short time. I went to a Christian Science doctor and, after treating me a while, she told me to come here. It is doing me lots of good. I haven't felt so well for a year. I believe most of the people who come here come to get healed. It's really wonderful."

When the deacon and his wife stepped off the car opposite their boarding house his foot slipped and his ankle was badly twisted. His wife saw his face twitch with pain, but he walked up the steps to the door treading as firmly on one foot as the other.

"Jacob," she said, "doesn't your foot hurt you a good deal?"

"No, not really," he replied, with a suppressed groan. "If as nice-looking people as we saw this morning have supposed they are sick and have found out they were mistaken I ain't going to believe any accident has actually happened to me."

"You'd better let me suppose I am rubbing some liniment on your ankle," she said, as she went for the bottle. "It'll do me good to do it, anyway."

JUST FOR A LITTLE WHILE.

BY JULIA H. MAY.

If for the little while
That life has left to me fair fortune's smile
Could rest upon me; if my closing days
Could be like this October, all ablaze
With gold and scarlet; if I only might
Have hands both full of silvery delight,
And all that wealth can buy, or wealth refine,
Could be at my command at wish of mine,
Just for a little while!
My child, take what is given today—
A little money for a little way.

If for the little while
That life has left to me the Muses' smile
Could rest upon me; if my closing days
Could be like this glad morning, all ablaze
With sunlit fields and mountain tops of thought,
My poems be in every language sought;
If all that noblest genius can combine
Could come together at some word of mine,
Just for a little while!
My child, take what is given today—
A little knowledge for a little way.

If for the little while
That life has left to me, full many a mile
On land or sea, to east or west or north,
Across the world, I could at last go forth;
If I might mount the hights of Greece or Rome,
Instead of climbing little hills at home;
If I might all the Alpine mountains view,
Instead of watching shadows on Mt. Blue,
Just for a little while!
My child, take what is given today—
A little climbing for a little way.

If for a little while
I could be very rich; if pile on pile
Of gold or gems could be at last my own,
To take and keep, or to be let alone;
If I could have enough to give away
To every sufferer, bid the wanderer stay
And eat and drink his fill; if every eye
Looked up with gratitude as I passed by,
Just for a little while!
My child, take what is given today—
A little helping for a little way.

If for the little while
That life has left to me affection's smile
Could rest upon me; if my closing days
Could be, like starry evenings, all ablaze
With blessedness; if lips I loved could say,
"It is so good to be with you today";
If all that heart can hold of happiness
Could be my own, unfathomed, measureless,
Just for a little while!
My child, take what is given you today—
A little loving for a little way.

General Porter's Campaigning with Grant in a current magazine has a singular instance of the great commander's imperturbability. It was in the Wilderness on the morning before the first day of battle. He was taking an early breakfast in his tent, almost alone and engaged in the last plans for the day, when a young newspaper reporter entered, uninvited, and seated himself at the table, remarking, "Well, I wouldn't mind taking a cup of something warm myself, if there's no objection," and proceeded to help himself liberally until he was filled. General Grant looked at him, but made no remark and "paid no more attention to the occurrence than he would have paid to the flight of a bird across his path." The incident is something more than a revelation of one of the elements of our great leader's success. It tells us a secret that may help us to succeed. Life is too short and our work in it too important to waste our time or nerves in noticing every little thing which is troublesome or wrong. Let the rude reporter drink his coffee—we must be planning our day's battle and fighting it. There are a hundred things in daily life, in the home and in business, which are not exactly right, and we may be easily tempted to stop and talk them all over and make a fuss about them; but we shall lose our time, perhaps our temper, and after all accomplish nothing—the fellow has got through and gone! Let us not fret ourselves overmuch about little doings or little doers, although they be evil; we are doing a great work, so that we cannot come down to them!

Another incident in the campaign of the Wilderness may yield us a hint, equally useful, although in a different line. A general officer rode up to Grant's tent and urgently expressed his fear that Lee might throw his army between the Rapidan and our forces and cut off their communications. General Grant replied with unusual vigor: "I am heartily tired of hearing what Lee is going to do. Some of you always seem to think he is suddenly going to turn a double somersault, and land in our rear and on both our flanks at the same time. Go back to your command and try to think what we are going to do ourselves instead of what Lee is going to do." The moral is close at hand. A bit of honest reflection may show us that we are making that same mistake in our wilderness warfare. It is easy to spend our time and energy in ascertaining and emphasizing what the enemy may do or is doing. But it is far better to "think what we are going to do ourselves"—and do it. Our present, everyday duty is usually plain enough, although commonplace or hard. Let us fight it out on that line, even if it takes all summer! The autumn will surely come in its own time, and we shall reap—if we faint not.

APPLES OF GOLD.

BY KATE UPSON CLARK.

A young girl was passing her aged great-aunt one day when she suddenly stopped, laid her hand gently on the white head beside her and said, "How pretty and curly your hair is, Aunt Mary! I wish I had such pretty hair!"

The simple words brought a quick flush of pleasure to the wrinkled face, and there was a joyous quaver in the brief acknowledgment of the spontaneous little courtesy.

Few of us realize the dearth of such attentions which the old suffer. Many of them have been persons of consequence in their prime. As illness and sorrow gradually weaken their spirits they retire into the background. They are no longer pursued by the honeyed words which interest or affection once heaped upon them. Too often they linger on in more or less cheerless obscurity until they die. Even if they are surrounded with what are called "the comforts" of life, they lack the sweet stimulus which comes from social appreciation.

"I was astonished to find what an interesting person that old lady is who lives at Mrs. D.'s," remarked one lady to another. "She seems to be an aunt or a great-aunt of Mr. D.'s, but she has always sat back in a corner when I have been there, and I never supposed that she knew anything in particular. Yesterday Mrs. D. appealed to her several times. It seemed to draw her out. She is remarkably intelligent and has had wonderful experiences of life."

"Did you think to tell her how much you had enjoyed talking with her?"

"No, that didn't occur to me."

The knowledge that her words and personality had so favorably impressed her visitor might have given the quiet old lady a pleasure which would lighten many weary hours. "There is no tonic like happiness."

A young man said to his mother: "You ought to have seen Aunt Esther today when I remarked casually, 'What a pretty gown you have on today, and how nice you look in it.' She almost cried she was so pleased. I hadn't thought before that such a little thing as that would be likely to please her."

"I never expect to eat any cookies so good as those you used to make, mother," said a bearded man one day, and he was shocked when he saw her evident delight in his words, for he remembered that he had not thought to speak before for years of any of the thousand comforts and pleasures with which her skill and love had filled his boyhood.

On the other hand, the old people in their turn have a responsibility. This thought was suggested by the remark of a wise old lady, who practices constantly her own theory.

"Few of us aged ones realize," she said, "how much we ought to exert ourselves as we grow older to make ourselves agreeable. We all know that as the years pass on we become more and more burdensome usually, and we would all wish to make as little trouble as possible. Our vivacity is largely spent, our minds often fail to respond to the talk of others and we feel weak and languid. But we can usually, unless really ill, manage to bathe and dress and even decorate ourselves carefully each day. We should feel that it is necessary to be far more particular in such matters than when we were younger. The time is generally ours if we can only muster the courage, and that we must get. We must take an interest in making ourselves presentable and agreeable."

Aged people, especially women, are often keenly sensitive in regard to their personal appearance. When they have taken great pains to look as well as possible, a word showing that their labor is appreciated cheers them sweetly. It is no stiff and perfunctory compliment which they long for, but the kind word which they know in their soul that they have deserved.

GIRL CONSORTS.

BY M. A. FROST AND J. H. CAVERNO.

Bachelor's Hall, what a comical place it is;
Keep me from such all the days of my life!

We are not girl bachelors, we are girl consorts. If we must be imitations why model after so melancholy a failure as the bachelor man? Better the traditional old maid with tea and cats. We are girl consorts, two college women living in a small New England city and earning our daily bread by teaching. Whatever happens to a young man's fancy in the spring, a young woman's turns away from a boarding house. We had left ours for the afternoon; the sun and the bobolinks on the meadows, the river and the mountains beyond did the rest. We sat down on the bank to wait for the slow-moving ferryboat. "The sun shone on our heads and ripened all our unripe thoughts." We decided to go to housekeeping.

One of us knew of a suite of rooms which would be vacant in the fall, and before the lazy current had swung the boat across we were quite settled in our flat and had stored up anticipations enough to tide us over the two months' sentence which we had yet to serve in our "prison cell," "noisome dungeon," "gaol (with a g)." It was a dangerous experiment, and we knew it. We were not intimate friends, but we were graduates of the same college, teaching in the same institution along parallel lines, and we had some tastes in common. We were old enough so that we could say, philosophically, "If we don't like it, it's only for a year," instead of, "If we don't like it it will be a whole year!"

So called co-operative housekeeping was not considered for a moment, for were we not just escaping from a boarding house? We wanted to be an old-fashioned family, not a caravansary, and the joys which we imputed to our little flat were the family joys which were associated with all our memories of home. We had not been brought up in co-operative households.

"The sun set and all the ways grew dark," and we began to discuss finance. Neither of us felt that she could spend more for living expenses than she was already spending, namely, $8.00 a week. We knew that we could get the best table board for $4.25. Could we pay the rent and the other expenses incident to housekeeping with the remaining $3.75? We felt that we could not sleep until it was settled, and hurried back to inspect the flat and interview the landlord. He had not intended to rent the flat furnished, but finally agreed to provide such heavy articles of furniture as we would not care to own, most of them to be taken from his own household stock. With such partial furnishing, heat and light, the rent was to be $300 a year. We were saved.

We came back in the fall laden with such plunder in the line of table and bed linen, dishes and silver as we could collect from our families and friends, and went about our home-making. The flat consisted of five rooms, a hall and a bathroom. The two bedrooms needed only our personal belongings to make them comfortable. The dining-room was rather bare, containing only a dining table and chairs, but with the addition of a tea table, a sideboard, improvised from a bookcase, draperies and pictures, all left over from our boarding house days, it looked quite appetizing. The kitchen was practically complete, and we felt that our landlord had forever removed the stigma from his kind and us from the class of mere chafing-dish housekeepers by furnishing us with:

1 Daisy burner.
1 round gas stove.
1 cast-iron air-tight stove (for the consumption of garbage).
1 four-burner kerosene stove (with oven).
1 three-burner kerosene stove.
1 one-burner kerosene stove, in addition to one portable gas stove (for heating when the steam didn't work).

Our study we furnished entirely. We let our books do most of it and, if the testimony of our friends is to be believed, the result is successful from an æsthetic as well as an economic point of view. Why do co-operative housekeepers and newly married people always conceal their books?

But we have saved the best for the last. Envy us, ye flat-dwellers, who make calico curtains for your trunks and keep your firewood under the bed. We have a light, airy, accessible, big storeroom!

Before we had been in the flat a week the serpent crept into Eden. He lay in the form of rolls of lint behind the doors. We faced the servant problem and engaged a "scrub lady." She was to appear on a certain day to wash the windows. She came, she saw, she conquered. We were afraid of her from the first minute, but we made a bold front and handed her the rag. She looked at the windows and asked with interest how the outsides were to be washed. One of us timidly suggested that she herself usually sat on the window sill. "But I might take cold," she said. We were not impressed. "But who would take care of me if I had pneumonia?" she continued. We did not feel as if we could offer, so we turned on the steam, assigned her to a sheltered spot and handed her a scrubbing-brush. "But how can I go down on the floor with my rheumatics?" We fled down town and bought a long-handled mop. From the first it had been an open question which of us was the head of the house. We saw at once that if we kept that scrub lady neither of us would have the position.

When Israel was in bondage,
The Lord, he sent them Moses.

James came to us.

James was a little Englishman, willing, deft and scrupulously honest. We were always sure of the cheerful, "Yes, miss," whether a floor was to be scrubbed, windows washed, or tins scoured. He died last June, just as we were leaving the flat for the summer, and the day dragged strangely as we listened involuntarily for his quick step and ready, "Yes, miss." He killed himself in a fit of depression brought on by heavy drinking, and men said comfortably that so worthless a life was no loss to the community. We knew better than that. In our household his weak, tempted life had been a realization of the precept of his own church: "To do my duty in that state of life to which it shall please God to call me."

We have an American now, a veteran of the Civil War. From our youth up we have been trained to honor and revere the Grand Army of the Republic, and it does not seem quite right to ask a man, who has fought and bled and lost an eye for his country, to go down on his hands and knees and scrub our kitchen floor.

In the beginning we took all our meals out, but as time went on we mourned over the wasted opportunities of the dining-room, and all those stoves. Even German coffee at four in the afternoon did not satisfy our ideals. The more we thought about it, the surer we were that family life centered about "the family board." So in the late fall we began getting our own breakfasts and suppers, and the æsthetic and social gain has more than compensated for the labor involved.

We wish hereby to record our ineradicable hostility toward all extracts, condensations and capsules. We believe in home-made bread, chops, and thick, juicy beefsteaks. We have known an obstinate fit of the blues dissipated at once and completely by such a repast as Mark Twain describes: "A porterhouse steak an inch and a half thick, hot and sputtering from the griddle, dusted with fragrant pepper, enriched with little melting bits of butter, the precious juices of the meat trickling out and joining the gravy, the long white bone which divides the sirloin from the tenderloin still in its place, and a great cup of American home-made coffee with the cream a-froth on top."

We do not save money by getting our own breakfasts and suppers. What we formerly paid to the mistress of the boarding house for these meals is now put into the housekeeping pocketbook. We do not follow the rules for fifteen-cent-dinners-for-working men, nor make "savory stews." Our time is worth money and such concoctions would cost us more than the finest cuts of steak.

"Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter." We have been consorts for three years. Financially, our experiment has been satisfactory. Socially, our home has been a city of refuge for our friends as well as ourselves. Personally, we have had to bear and forbear, as might have been expected—and as we did expect—in a household made up of two grown women, suddenly brought from a purely conventional into the most intimate relation. Yet the integrity of the family has been maintained, and we pride ourselves, not on our separate independence, but on our mutual dependence. We are not girl bachelors; we are girl consorts. And as the fairy stories say, "If you pass along that road you will still find them living there."

FOLLOWING THE FASHIONS.

BY LILY RICE FOXCROFT.

It is said that after the fire which swept one of our large tenement house districts last winter, those engaged in distributing relief found it almost impossible to give away cloaks and jackets with close sleeves. Miserably clad women would turn from them with contempt and go shivering out into the cold again rather than appear in garments so behind the style. That was certainly an extreme instance of the "tyranny of fashion." And yet, do not many of us recognize in ourselves and in our children tendencies which, but for larger means, might display themselves in as pitiable a form? We struggle against them in ourselves. Do we struggle enough in behalf of our children? Or are we, by our facile yielding where they are concerned, really largely responsible for the perpetuation of the weakness? We know that the early years are the years when habits are formed. Do we use those early years to form for our children habits of independence?

The temptation to follow the fashion is particularly strong when one is planning for children. They are so doll-like, and it is such fun to dress them. Their tiny garments cost so little, compared with ours, that it seems as if they might always be new and pretty. They are so imitative themselves—the dear little midgets—and begin so early to notice what other children have, and it is so hard to deny them.

And yet, again, is it not one of the first principles which we all have to learn for the right conduct of life, that there are differing lots and that each must adjust himself to his own? Sooner or later—if they are to escape the incessant and belittling worry that comes of the effort to live beyond one's means—the children must find out that they cannot have everything they see others have. Is it not better to find it out sooner than later? It is true that we can keep them, for a while, from finding it out. The baby whose mother trundles her carriage through the park may be quite indistinguishable, in all her dainty trappings, from those other babies that are attended by their nursemaids, and her mother, in her plain garb, may be equally indistinguishable from the maids. One little primary school girl may present about as gay an appearance on the last day of school as another, by pains and care on the mother's part. But the time will come when even pains and care and self-sacrifice must give up the struggle. Would it not have been better if it had never been begun, better if the child had been taught, as soon as she began to notice differences in dress and homes and opportunities for pleasure, that such differences are inevitable and that we can be happy in spite of them?

The temptation to strain a point, to spend more for a child than the family means really justify, is often very strong where social opportunities seem to be involved. The party dress, which is really out of all proportion to everything else in the domestic expenditures, looks very tempting to the parent who thinks of it as the "open sesame" to a bewildering succession of social delights. But even here there is another side to be considered. A social position which is reached by unusual expense must be kept by unusual expense. It is not the first step alone which costs, but all the other steps. Then, too, the opportunity which seems so attractive may not really lead to wider friendship, to larger culture, but only to dissatisfaction and discontent. For young people, as for their elders, the most enjoyable social relations must usually be with those of circumstances fairly corresponding to their own. Instead of making the extra exertion which would give the child a doubtful and precarious footing in the new circle of acquaintance, it might be the truest kindness to point out, once for all, that the occasion for exertion proved the undesirability of the acquaintance.

I know that many parents shrink from mention of money matters to children, partly from a desire to keep them care free as long as possible, and partly, perhaps, from a sense that the subject is a sordid one for innocent childhood. I do not think either of these considerations important enough to offset the good which certainly comes from training children early, not only to the right use of money, but to a right understanding of the relation which money bears to the material objects of ambition. By the time the little tot is old enough to express a wish for fur on her coat, she is surely old enough to be told that fur costs a good deal of money and does not last very long. And if she pleads that Marion has fur on her coat, what possible harm is there in telling her that Marion's papa has more money than her papa, and that Marion can have ever so many things that she can't? If Belle comes home from school in tears because she has to wear a colored petticoat, and Gladys says she never in all her life had on anything but a white one—poor Gladys!—she will not be any more unhappy for having it explained to her that Gladys's mamma can afford to hire help about her washing while hers can't.

We want to have the children's days sunny. But childhood's shadows do not always linger so long as we fear. Many of them would pass more quickly than they do but for injudicious sympathy with woes which it would be kinder to treat as slight. The child who sees its mother straining every nerve to keep it on an equal footing with children in obviously easier circumstances is made miserable by trifles that would not trouble one more sensibly trained at all.

Not what we would like to do, not what other people do, but what we can afford to do, is the question that constantly confronts us older people. There are other questions back of that—questions of fitness, of responsibility, of self-denial. But that question must be faced first of all, when a new expenditure is under discussion, if we are to lead honorable or honest lives. It is a question peculiarly vital, perhaps, among the temptations of a social democracy. There is no danger that our children will be too early prepared for it. There is great danger that they may not be prepared early enough.

MOTORS AND BICYCLES FOR SNOW AND ICE.

BY GEORGE ETHELBERT WALSH.

Not satisfied in making bicycles and motors that will travel rapidly and easily over good and bad roads, in the air, on the water and under the water, the modern inventor has now turned his attention to the construction of queer vehicles that will skim the ice and snow at a speed that will rival that of the swiftest ice boat. Models of these snow and ice bicycles and motor sleighs are placed on exhibition now and a few of them have been built for actual trial. If the introduction of the horseless wagon becomes general, the number of horses now in use will be reduced, and the invention of the horseless sleigh must of necessity follow if we are to enjoy this delightful winter sport at a moderate cost.

In anticipation of this state of affairs when it will be difficult to obtain horses to draw the sleighs, one inventor has constructed a model of a sleigh driven by a small motor similar to that in operation on the horseless carriages. The sleigh rests upon runners that glide smoothly over the snow or ice, and two large spurred wheels in the rear propel it forward. These wheels are lowered or raised by means of a lever so that obstructions can be avoided on the road. Where there is a hard sleighing surface, this sort of equipage could make excellent time. It can be driven across the ice just as easily as across the snow fields, for the spurred wheels have sharp prods that catch into the ice and secure a good hold.

In the States where snow covers the ground during the greater part of the winter such a horseless sleigh may prove a valuable acquisition to our present vehicles of travel. Where the snow hardens so on the surface that a sleigh with broad, flat runners can easily be supported on it, but which is not strong enough to support a horse, the motor sleigh may be operated successfully. It is even suggested by the inventor that logging could be conducted on a large scale in winter by employing these motor sleighs to haul the trunks of the trees down the frozen rivers to the mills.

On the same plan another genius has produced a one-man sleigh. The sleigh is nothing more than an ordinary long-runner affair, with a bicycle mounted on the top of it, minus the ordinary rubber-tired wheels. A chain runs from the sprocket to a small wheel under the sleigh which is provided with ratchet teeth. When the wheelman mounts his steed and moves the pedals as in ordinary bicycling, the sharp teeth cut into either snow or ice and propel the sleigh along. The speed to be obtained on smooth ice is something tremendous, and is not to be exceeded by a rider on a good cinder path.

These are the two principal forms of the snow and ice bicycle and motor sleigh, but there are many others that have found birth in the minds of inventors who would make a fortune by seizing time by the forelock. But, dismissing them for the present, the attention should be called to the various attachments that are promised for the ordinary bicycle. These patent arrangements are made for the purpose of converting the ordinary bicycle into a vehicle for winter use on snow and ice. One of the simplest winter attachments is in the form of a steel runner, which is fastened to the front wheel by means of stout brackets. The front wheel is secured in position so that it cannot revolve. The hind wheel is covered with a thick canvas or leather tire, studded with small, sharp brads. This peculiar tire can be put on over the rubber inflated tire, and is warranted not to injure it. When the pedals are pushed around by the rider the sharp brads of the hind wheel bite into the snow or ice, and the rider has the satisfaction of finding himself gliding across sheets of ice and down snow-packed roads at a pace that would make a horse envious. A break in front, which pushes down into the snow or ice, makes the journey less perilous.

A more complete outfit for bicycling on the snow and ice comes from a Western inventor, who probably knows what it is to travel before bracing winter breezes for many miles in a straight line. In addition to the front runner, he has one provided for the back wheel, which can be lowered or raised at will. When lowered, the bicycle stands upon two pairs of runners. Then a small mast and sail are erected in front of the rider, connecting with the handle bar, and the rest of the journey before the wind is made pleasant and agreeable. The wind is considered sufficient motive power to send the bicycle along at a fifty-mile speed.

One little boy reported that at New Haven, where he spent the holidays, each of the children had a Christmas tree, even down to the baby, and "all the trees were so low that they could see the presents and take them off themselves." The child's special gratification at that style of distribution has a sermon for parents and teachers. Why not arrange the children's trees that way, all the year? Cannot we take more pains to bring their duties, their lessons, their pleasures down to their level, so that they can see for themselves and understand what they are, so that they can with their own hands pick the fruit? Children like to be independent—sometimes they inherit that trait. To combine with it a sense of intelligent responsibility may be one effective way of lessening the friction of government and assuring their happy co-operation in our plans. Let us think how we should feel about it ourselves in the same circumstances! The golden rule is always worth trying, even with little children. It is a rule that is sure to work better, on the whole, than one made of oak.

Closet and Altar

No life is complete which does not sometimes sit trustfully waiting to be fed by God.

"Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world," is not an idle, not an unfulfilled promise. He is not with us merely as a thought, but as a life. He gathers us up into his own being. He floods us with it. There is inspiration here, certainly for any duty, for any endurance. The faith, Christ with me, can make the poorest and the hardest life luminous, joyous, glorious. —Wayland Hoyt.

If thou desirest Christ seek him in prayer and thou shalt find him. If in thy pilgrimage through this wilderness world thou art afflicted with spiritual thirst come thou in thy devotions to the spiritual rock, that is, Christ, and strike it with the rod of prayer and streams of divine grace shall flow forth to quench thy thirst and supply thy need. Dost thou wish to offer a pleasing sacrifice to God? Offer prayer. Wouldst thou hold constant intercourse with God? Take delight in prayer, for this is spiritual conversation between God and the devout soul. Wouldst thou taste and see that the Lord is good? Then constrain the Lord by prayer to take up his abode in thy heart.—Gerhard.

If we live in the Spirit we shall be led by him every day and every moment. What if you were to open your heart today to be filled with the Holy Spirit? Would he not be able to keep you every moment in the sweet rest of God? And would not his mighty arm give you a complete victory over sin and temptation of every kind, and make you able to live in perpetual fellowship with the Father and with his Son, Jesus Christ? Most certainly, this is the blessed life God has provided for us.—Andrew Murray.

'Tis what I know of thee, my Lord and God,
That fills my soul with peace, my lips with song;
Thou art my health, my joy, my staff, my rod,
Leaning on thee in weakness I am strong.

. . . .

More of thyself O show me hour by hour,
More of thy glory, O my God and Lord;
More of thyself in all thy grace and power,
More of thy love and truth, Incarnate Word!
—Bonar.

We thank thee, O Christ, that we are accepted in thee, and that there is no barrier to our free access into our Father's presence. We call upon our souls and all that is within us to bless and praise and magnify thee. May our earthly life be inspired with the spirit of heaven. May we go to and fro about our business as those who have seen the face of God, and have come down to earth with the light of the other world upon their faces. Prosper us, O blessed God, in all that we put our hands unto. May our hearts be filled with thy love, our lips with gentle, helpful words and our hands with kind, unselfish deeds. May those who see us take knowledge of us that we have been with Jesus. May the fragrance of his presence be shed abroad in every act. May the Holy Spirit keep us in this frame amid all the changes and chances of this mortal life, and may we come at last into the heavenly home, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Mothers in Council.

We thank thee, our Father in heaven, that mothers are but children in thy sight. We would all come to thee as children, seeking a Father's blessing and guidance. Direct thou our paths, and not our paths alone, but those of the dear children whom we commit to thy holy keeping. They are ours. Thou gavest them to us, but we love to think that they are even more thine own—children of the covenant, for whom we claim covenant blessings. Be graciously near to them, wherever they may be. Thou knowest them all by name. Call them, as thou didst the Hebrew lad of old, until each shall answer, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth." Fit them for service. Make them responsive to all the calls for unselfish living which fill our time. Make us, we beseech thee, more worthy as mothers to direct these unfolding lives as they seek to find their places in the world's work. Forbid it, Lord, that we should live unto ourselves. With all tenderness for those dearest to us in our homes, help us and our children still to live—in our humble way—for the world, this needy world to which thou didst give thine only begotten Son. To it, and so to thee, we give ourselves anew. Take the barley loaves, which in our poverty of heart we offer, and so enrich and multiply them by thine infinite power that many may be blessed through the offering. Hear and accept us, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

HYSTERICS IN INFANTS.

In the article entitled Another View of Self-control that appeared recently in The Congregationalist there were touches of saving grace, yet, on the whole, it was written, as a critic once said of Michelet in another connection, "with the cast-iron pen of the middle ages." Telling of her successful efforts to subdue a two-year-old girl who had been allowed by her parents to contract a wretched habit of screaming, the writer explains that by tying a cloth over her mouth and holding her hands she brought her to the point in fifteen minutes of "sobbing quietly." What a triumph for the science of good government! The "gag" has not lost its efficacy, and the trained muscle of an adult's arms in average good health is still capable of reducing a hysterical infant to a state of helplessness, even in this day and generation of spoiled children.

Now, to meet the probable rejoinder of anxious mothers that children must be made by some means to stop screaming, I answer, certainly they must, if the warfare between parent and child has advanced so far that screaming is his last resort as a means of expostulation. This is the true way of putting the matter. The child, under such circumstances, has been so injudiciously treated that it can conceive of no other way of relieving its feelings and giving vent to its general dissatisfaction than by an outbreak of emotional insanity. It is to be hoped that the time will come when the right relations will prevail between parent and child to such an extent that a screaming two-year-old will be an anomaly. But at present it is a far cry to the placid hills of justice, and we can only expect reason from exceptionally gifted minds.

Medical science, however, which comes to the rescue of nervous mothers, asserts that hysterics is a disease, whether it occur in adults or in children, and the remedies applied should certainly not be harsher in the case of the little child, almost wholly under the sway of emotions, than in the case of a grown woman, supposably educated to the pitch of understanding what is due to others, but who makes life unendurable to her entire family for a fortnight because she cannot have thirteen new hats. In the last instance there is a family council, with the assistance of a medical expert in nervous diseases, and everything that affection and kindness can suggest is offered up at the shrine. No talk of gags or ducking stools here. It is the end of the nineteenth century for women. But it is also the end of the nineteenth century for children, and what do the revised statutes of this period dictate as a remedy for hysterical infants? Soothing, emphatically, soothing, until the fit of insanity is past, and the subject in a condition to see things as they are. To the hysterical mind everything is distorted, friends seem enemies, and the least contradiction is unendurable. But, with judicious treatment, this mood is very transient. Don't let us prolong it by scuffling. The two great points to make in dealing with an angry child are, first, to win its confidence, and second, to establish good-nature. Any system that fails to do this fails utterly. We do not teach a child self-control when we force it to stop screaming; we only teach it self-repression. We do teach it self-control when we get it to look at things from a normal point of view, when we win it to good-nature and imbue it with the desire to do right.

But when an infant is screaming no time is to be lost; every scream it utters is a distinct injury to it, morally and physically. Stop it, then, and by the quickest means. And decidedly the quickest means is kindness, affection, sympathy. Take the little one in your arms and talk to it in tones as winning and gentle as if you were conciliating indignation in your best friend. "A soft answer turneth away wrath" was not meant only for adults, nor does it fail with children, except where they distrust its genuineness. There is a frightful sticking power in the ancient idea that offenders against law must be subjected to torment, and it will be long before some rigidly conscientious minds see that what is most desired in training children is not to make them do this or that thing, or stop this or that thing, but to help them to become rational, well-balanced, kindly-dispositioned men and women. Obedience to parents is not in itself a cardinal virtue. Obedience to right, to truth, to decency, to human affection, is a cardinal virtue, and in so far as parents represent these they may justly claim submission. Not the submission of the slave, yielding to force, but the cheerful yielding of the disciple, the pupil, the affectionate, trustful child, that has never known a break in the confidential relation established in infancy by right means and through the largest interpretation of the doctrine of law.

The Conversation Corner.

I HAVE letters on various subjects from all of the members represented in this family group "hugging the stovepipe," as the little Vermont boy described it. We will give the place of honor, as usual, to the report of our share in the Armenian Orphans' Fund, which has now reached one hundred dollars, and that amount has been paid in. Those of you who are accustomed to the use of the multiplication table may discover that we now have therefore ten children provided with happy, Christian homes in Armenia, even though we do not know their names. One little girl in western Massachusetts sends me an autograph letter, apparently written in ancient Egyptian characters, thus interpreted:

Little Grace M. wishes me to tell you that she has earned ten cents for the little Armenian orphans by keeping her doll corner in order and by getting the bath ready for her baby brother every morning. She wishes she could have all of those six orphan girls right here in this house, but she says, "Don't send for the boys," for we have enough already. (She is the only girl with four brothers.)

GRACE'S MAMMA.

Another letter, just opened, is from that little girl in New York State who, you may remember, wrote us, a few years ago, a letter in that same language, which her mother translated as her desire to have us find "her little heathen girl Florence." You remember we succeeded in finding "Florence" in the Okayama Orphanage in Japan —O Hana San, which, being interpreted freely, means, the Corner Flower Girl. But the present letter is not in Ethiopic or Sanscrit character at all, but in plain English, written in that new and beautiful "vertical hand," which children are learning now—I fervently hope it may yet be adopted by some of my older correspondents!

Dear Mr. Martin: I thank you for the Christmas gift you sent me. [It was nothing but the "Corner Party" souvenir.—MR. M.] I thought you had forgotten me, and I felt sorry. I pray for you every night and for my little heathen girl Florence. Do you know anything more about her? We have never heard from the box we sent her. I have been one term at the school in ——. I hope I can go again in the spring. Do you think you will ever come this way? [How are the roads for bicycling in your region?—MR. M.] Yours with love,

KATHRINA C.

Two or three days ago, when in the printing office, D. F. went to the whistling tube and told me that some one wanted to see me down stairs; I thought it might be his plan to end the call, but I found in the editorial rooms the other O Hana's father, but I forgot to ask him whether he saw our Okayama protégées. Elizabeth P. would better tell us about them some time.

OAK PARK, ILL.

My Dear Mr. Martin: I am going to ask if I may join the Corner. I am ten years old. My mother has been reading me the Corner ever since I was a little boy. Our cellar is flooded up and I have to wade in and put on coal. In our Christmas exercises I was a Quaker boy.

SAMUEL R.

I am going to answer that you may be a Cornerer and that you are one as per certificate mailed to your address. Don't risk yourself in that cellar without a raft and a life preserver!

FITCHBURG, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: . . . [The first part of this letter is taken up with an earnest request that I would "coax" that "Youthful Cornerer" (the tenement house girl) who wrote a Corner piece about a year ago, to write more, say, a description of D. F.'s summer home, or "give up coasting some Saturday afternoon and write a composition on something in Boston she may know about."] One more favor I'd like to ask. Can you tell me where I can find a copy of an old hymn beginning,

Hark! ye neighbours, and hear me tell
One now strikes on the belfry bell?

There are twelve stanzas, each illustrating some Bible fact or doctrine.

MISS H.

Yes, I can tell you about that. I heard it recited in a mission Sunday school in British America, between thirty and forty years ago, and it was contained in a small paper-covered book. Hold on a minute! . . . I have it on one of those "top shelves." It is the "Canadian Sunday School Reciter," published in Toronto, by James Campbell. The title is The Watchman's Song. It is said to be taken from Autumn on the Rhine, and to be a favorite song of German watchmen while on their nightly beats. Every verse ends with the chorus:

Human watch from harm can't ward us—
God will watch and God will guard us;
He through His eternal might Give us all a blessed night.

I will give one stanza as a sample:

Hark! ye neighbours, and hear me tell,
Two resounds on the belfry bell!
Two paths before mankind are free;
Neighbour, choose the best for thee.

This is perhaps the hardest one; I think the children could find out the others—let them try it some Sunday afternoon, not of course supplying all the words, but seeing what Scripture incident or truth would go with each number. If you choose, give us the result. The letters from the gentleman and the aged lady on the right happen, both of them, to concern the Bible too.

NEW HAVEN, CT.

. . . In the Bible of my boyhood were written some lines in pencil and they are nearly obliterated, and I would like to ask if any of your Cornerers can supply the whole. There are six lines in all.

Lo! here a little volume, but great book,
Much larger in itself than in its look;
It is in one rich handful; heaven and all
Heaven's royal host encamped—

REV. ——.

The other writer has passed her ninetieth birthday, but asks any of us to

. . . tell who wrote an old Bible hymn, having this chorus,

That old-fashioned Bible, that dear, blessed Bible,
The family Bible that lay on the stand.

It was sung by Deacon B. in New Hampshire more than fifty years ago, and I heard it sung more than sixty-five years ago when I was visiting in Vermont.

L. M.

I sent the query to a Granite State deacon who, I thought, knew all the religious songs of the century, but he did not know this one. Somebody's memory may have kept both of these pieces.

Several children write about their Christmas presents, but I have only room for one boy, up in the Connecticut Valley:

Dear Mr. Martin: . . . Our school gave each of the old ladies at the old ladies' home a bouquet of flowers. The best present I had was an umbrella and a satchel. Johnnie got two games he is very much delighted with. One is the Messenger Boy. My Sunday school teacher sent each of us scholars a calendar; mine was a lantern calendar, the months being painted on lanterns. I will send you our pictures and a sample copy of the medicine I am selling. It is for colds, grip and other purposes. I wish you would give it a trial.

WILLIE M.

These grip powders arrived just in time; they have been right before me on my table ever since, and Mr. Grip is loosening his hold. (You are at liberty to use this recommendation in any way you think proper.)

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK.

Queen Victoria's Dolls. The Youth's Companion—which is always sure to pick up everything of real interest and value to children, blessings on the dear old paper!—has a remarkable item to the effect that the queen of England and empress of India not long ago ordered that the dolls with which she played when a child should be publicly exhibited and photographed. Some of them are dressed in the costumes of English soldiers and sailors of that time. She probably little thought, when she was dressing those dolls, that, seventy years afterwards, she would be the sovereign of all the British soldiers and sailors in the world! Such acts of kindness as this show true royalty of character and make her endeared to all the children of the realm.

The Queen's Cane. It is said that in later years she has used a staff of British oak, originally made for Charles II. When she began to use the cane it had a plain gold top, but when she needed something affording a firmer grip there was added a queer little Indian idol, which had been captured, with other spoils, at the fall of Seringapatam in 1799. What progress in government, in humanity, in religion, is brought to one's mind by the thought of wicked King Charles's staff and the little god of heathen India, now held in the hand of a powerful Christian queen!

The Queen Is Rich. She has always been considered an excellent financier, has been very economical—that is, has not squandered money —and is said to be worth over a hundred millions of dollars. All the royal family—and it is not a small one—have large annuities from the government, and of course all her traveling expenses, which are immense, are paid from the public funds. It is doubted whether her eldest son, who, should he live a few years, will be King Albert, will keep so carefully or spend so judiciously the enormous fortune which will descend to him.

The Queen Studies. Because she is a queen, Victoria does not spend her time in luxurious ease. She is an indefatigable worker in the great affairs of state which are under her control. She has learned several European languages, including some of the country dialects of Germany, and in recent years has learned the Hindustani, because it is the vernacular of millions of her subjects.

About Writing to the Queen. Should any of our Scrap-bookers have occasion to address Queen Victoria, they must remember not to fold their letters. On no account will any communication which has evidence of having been folded ever reach her Brittanic Majesty's hands. The mistress of the robes, whose duty it is to attend to her correspondence, will return you any such letter, if it is of sufficient importance—as it doubtless will be—with instructions how to forward it. Use thick, glossy white paper, and inclose it in a large envelope without folding. Sign your full name—no anonymous letters received by royalty!

Queens and Queens. The New York papers had considerable to say, a few weeks ago, about the marriage of Ella Collin of that city to Col. John F. Hobbs, a native of South Carolina. But Mr. Hobbs is the king of the cannibal island of Illika, the location of which you will do well to ascertain. After the Lutheran pastor had pronounced them husband and wife, King Hobbs proclaimed his bride queen in the language of his kingdom, the translation being, "I take you, Mealie, to my royal house, and make you queen of my throne of the women." It is the custom in Illika for the wife of the sovereign to rule over the women of the realm—a plan it might be well to introduce into this country.

LESSON FOR JAN. 31. Acts 4: 1-31.

THE BOLDNESS OF PETER AND JOHN.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D. D.

We come now to the first conflict between the new Christian and the Jewish Church. The disciples of Christ belonged to both bodies. The Christian Church was still within the Jewish. But the healing of the lame man showed to the priests and officers of the temple how rapidly the new sect was growing. The followers of him whom the chief priests had put to death had within a few months increased to 5,000 people [v. 4]. What was the first issue of the conflict thus renewed, and how did it develop the courage of the apostles? To answer these questions we consider:

I. The efforts to arrest the growth of the church. The perils from which the priests thought they had delivered themselves by killing Jesus suddenly appeared greater than ever. In their alarm they precipitated the first formal conflict with the new sect and were defeated.

1. The charge against the apostles. The priests put Peter and John into prison over night, and next morning they were brought before the same tribunal which had condemned Jesus to be crucified, and no doubt for the same purpose. It was a kind of family party [v. 6]. There was Annas and with him Caiaphas, his son-in-law, and his kindred. Their ambition was to get and hold public offices. Their enemies were those who stood in the way of their ambition. For this reason they had put Jesus to death, and for the same reason they sought to kill his disciples. The only charge they could bring against these two men was blasphemy. The only basis for that charge was that they had healed a beggar. These men had done a good deed. Their accusers sought to prove that it was prompted by a bad motive. There was an old law [Deut. 13: 1-5] that if a prophet appeared to work a wonder successfully, using it as the ground of an appeal to go after other gods, he should be put to death. Jesus of Nazareth, risen from the dead, was to their minds another object of worship than Jehovah. If they could prove that the lame man had been healed by appealing to the power of Jesus they might convict these men under that law. This, then, was their line of examination. They began by asking, "By what power, or in what name, have you done this?"

2. The defense of the apostles. Peter told them that the thing of which they were accused was not a mere wonder, but a good deed. No one could deny that. Then Peter boldly avowed that the deed had been done in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom they had crucified. The fact that his name invoked could heal the lame man showed that he was still living. But he was not another god whom they were persuading men to worship. He was the Son of God risen from the dead. He had himself claimed to be the fulfillment of one of their own Old Testament prophecies [Comp. v. 11 with Matt. 21: 42] in being the rejected stone which alone could complete the temple of God. He had wrought the works which only God could do, and thus had shown himself to be the Son of God. Through his disciples he was still doing the same works. He thus proved himself the only Saviour of men. Through his name the lame man had been healed. Only through his name could men be saved.

3. The efforts of priests to silence the apostles. The Sanhedrim could not condemn Peter and John in the face of their argument. To do this they would run greater risks than to let them go free. The only thing they could do was solemnly to command them not to speak in the name of Jesus. When the apostles declared that they could not and would not keep silent, the priests could only reiterate the command. They must have realized that they were defeated. It was the old battle of organized authority against the living spirit. The apostles had shown that they had something of great value to give to the people. The priests had nothing to offer to offset it. The people had found what they needed, and they laid hold of it and glorified God. The priests had to let the apostles go [v. 21].

II. What were the grounds of the apostles' confidence? We put these grounds in the order in which they are stated, increasing in importance to the last.

1. The fellowship of believers [v. 23]. They had a company of sympathizers, and as soon as they could they went to their own. So will every one do who really witnesses for Christ among men. One of the first steps of those who believe on him is to enter into the fellowship of his disciples, and the first business of every church is to infuse courage into its members to testify of Christ.

2. The habit of united prayer [v. 24]. First, the apostles told their experiences to their brethren. Then they all turned to God as the source of courage and asked that they might "speak thy word with all boldness." That prayer meeting is wonderfully suggestive. One could hardly go from such a gathering without increased courage to witness for Christ. Why do not our churches more fully realize that their prayer meetings are sources of power whose limits are determined only by the faithfulness of their members?

3. Confidence in the Holy Scriptures. Their prayers centered round the Word of God. Their text was the Second Psalm. God uttered it, they believed, by the Holy Spirit, through the mouth of David. The conspiracy of heathen kings against God's anointed had been again illustrated by the Jewish rulers and would also be in vain. What were traditions and governments and ecclesiastical powers as opposed to the will of God? Christians jealously guard the Scriptures because in these books they find God. The hope of our time is that the study of the Bible may bring men into closer relations with God, so that a generation may rise up with apostolic confidence and boldness, facing with the Word of God the intrenched selfishness and self-confidence which opposes the universal acknowledgment of Jesus Christ as King of kings.

4. Faith in Jesus as the Messiah [vs. 26-30]. To the apostles the purpose of God in history, the promises of the prophets and the hope of Israel were all to be fulfilled in Jesus Christ. Here was the secret of their steadfast courage. Their enemies had taken note from their manner and spirit that they had been with Jesus. But only those can understand their courage who have themselves been with Jesus.

5. The gift of the Holy Ghost. This crowned all their other experiences. They prayed that they might have boldness to speak the Word of God. In answer to their prayer they were filled with the Spirit and spoke with the conviction and emphasis which they desired.

Thus, in this first conflict between the old religion and the new, the old lost much and the new made an immense gain. The old attempted to repeat the tactics by which it had crucified Jesus. The new had gained through the resurrection of Jesus and the descent of the Holy Spirit. It showed against the attacks of the old that from the highest source it received power to satisfy men's needs.

It is along these same lines that Christians must work to display the power of God and conquer the world. Let them study sympathetically what he is doing to heal souls and purify society. Let them, in the confidence of Christian fellowship, talk of their difficulties and triumphs. Let them pour out before the throne of God their faith, their fears and their needs. Let them open their hearts to the incoming Spirit till each life becomes obedient to his impulses and the whole church acts with united energy under his guidance; and the voice of opposition will be changed to praise, and the sunlight of truth and righteousness revealed through Christ will spread through the world.

CHURCH REMODELING.
THOMAS W. SILLOWAY, Church Architect,
10 Park Square, Boston.

Mr. Silloway's long practice in building or remodeling over 400 church edifices enables him to save and utilize all the valuable parts, and for a comparatively small outlay produce a building preferable to a new one of much greater cost. He proposes to continue the work of remodeling as a specialty, and tenders his services to committees who would practice economy, and where the means are limited.

PROGRESS OF THE KINGDOM.

OUR OWN WORK.

Annual Report of the C. C. B. S. The Church Building Society closed its financial year Dec. 31 and held its annual meeting Jan. 14. The receipts during 1896 were $132,967, or $8,600 less than in 1895. Last bills have been paid on 119 church buildings, ten less than in 1895; and on forty-five parsonages, three more than in the previous year. The shrinkage is due in part to the hard times, but may also be attributed to the efforts to raise the debts of some of our other Congregational societies. Churches and individuals say that as the C. C. B. S. never has any debt they must help the organizations which are in arrears, forgetting that though the Building Society has not borrowed money at the banks it is further behind than other departments of missionary work. A meeting house for every church organized is its motto, but 219 churches were organized in 1895 and there were already 773 with no house of worship. From forty to seventy applications are on hand all the time. During the past year twenty-three churches and thirty-six parsonages have refunded the amount loaned them by the society and so placed themselves on the roll of honor.

The A. B. C. F. M. as an Education Society. Dr. A. N. Hitchcock is responsible for the surprising statement in the current Missionary Herald that the combined roll of students in all the Congregational schools, colleges and academies in the United States would not equal the army of youth now gathered in the mission schools of the American Board. The more than 1,000 foreign mission schools and colleges have over 50,000 pupils. Adding to the enrolled students in the thirty-nine American colleges regarded as Congregational all the scholars under the care of the A. M A. and of the C. E. S., as well as the students of the seven Congregational theological seminaries, we have not more than 30,000, possibly only 28 000. The number of pupils in the Congregational academies is not known, but it would require 250 of them with an average of 100 pupils in each to bring the total up to the number of youth now under instruction in the schools of the American Board. Yet this educational work is only one branch of the Board's activities. We recommend Dr. Hitchcock's entire article on Congregationalism in Foreign Missions to every loyal member of the denomination.

A New Ceylon Church. Every advance step in the matter of self-support is to be welcomed, especially in India, where it means a supreme effort on the part of the poor parishioners. A new church of forty-seven members has recently been organized in Nunavil, a few miles from Jaffna. At the same time the new meeting house was dedicated and a pastor ordained and installed. The pupils in masonry of the Industrial School in Tillipathy went to Nunavil during a vacation and spent three weeks in building up the brick walls of the parsonage. The door and window frames of both church and parsonage were also made by pupils in the Industrial School. Mr. Smith of Tillipathy writes that the new pastor and his wife are among his most beloved and valued helpers and friends. The church starts with an unusually large membership and it is already paying all but five rupees of its pastor's salary. This is the second colony sent out within eighteen months from the Chavagacherry church, two miles distant.

A New Gazaland Missionary. A letter dated Mt. Silinda has come from Miss Gilson, who started for this station of our East Central African Mission last March and, after some delays, completed in September the long, wearisome journey. She and Mrs. Bates are the first women who have ever been through the Chimanimani Pass, the most difficult part of the route inland. Of her new home Miss Gilson writes: "I wish you could look in upon my hut. It is about sixteen feet in diameter. The doors and window-shutters are made from packing cases and I am sure of a constant supply of fresh air. I have the great luxury of a fireplace. The walls are eight feet high and it must be twenty feet from the floor to the apex of the roof. Mrs. Wilder will not allow that there is any heroism in living here, but when I look at one of the lion skins on the floor and recall the fact that the owner of the skin was shot at nine o'clock one morning within a stone's throw of my door I do not agree with her."

American Board Treasury. The financial statement of the A. B. C. F. M. for December looks a little more encouraging, but it will be seen that during four months there has been a decrease of $21,155 as compared with the corresponding period last year. But for The Congregationalist's fund for Armenian orphans the December decrease would be larger.

THE WORLD AROUND.

A Wide Survey. Each year we value more and more the accurate, carefully compiled statistics to be found in the American Board Almanac. The fullest and latest summary of Protestant foreign mission work throughout the world is worth noting. An aggregate income of $15,549,243 is reported by the 267 societies having in their employ 12,011 missionaries and 60,164 native laborers. The whole number of communicants is 1,221,175. The totals compared with those of last year show an increase in contributions of about $1,100,000, though in the United States there has been a decrease of about $70,000. The communicants have increased by about 64,000. The British societies record a large falling off in the number of native laborers, largely owing to the fact that the war in Madagascar has so interrupted mission work that no reports are given from that island. The number under instruction is given only by the societies of the United States and Great Britain, which report 695,197 pupils.

A Critical Time in Korea. Mrs. Isabella Bird Bishop is convinced that there is a genuine and earnest movement toward Christianity in Korea. In a recent letter from Seoul to Dr. Ellinwood she urges the need of more workers in the Pyeng Yang district in western Korea, a region which was the center of the brutal persecutions of native Christians as late as 1894 but is now freely open to missionaries. This testimony from such a traveler as Mrs. Bishop means not a little: "The Pyeng Yang work, which I saw last winter and which is still going on in much the same way, is the most impressive mission work I have seen in any part of the world. It shews that the Spirit of God still moves on the earth and that the old truths of sin, of the divine justice and love, of the atonement and of the necessity for holiness have the same power as in the apostolic days to transform the lives of men. What I saw and heard there has greatly strengthened my own faith." But not only in Pyeng Yang but in Seoul and elsewhere there are hopeful signs. Mrs. Bishop declares that only those can know who are on the spot how wide the door is opened in Korea. "Very many are prepared to renounce devil worship and to worship the only true God, if only they are taught how; and large numbers who have heard and received the gospel are earnestly craving to be instructed in its rules of holy living. I dread indescribably that unless many men and women experienced in winning souls are sent speedily that the door which the church declines to enter will close again and that the last state of Korea will be worse than the first."

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN.

Topic, Jan. 31–Feb. 6. Endeavorers Loyal to Christ—What Will They Do? John 13: 31–38; 8: 31.

This subject is happily phrased, because it points Endeavorers to the supreme object of their loyalty. Great as their movement is, it is not the only mighty Christian force at work for humanity. Honored as their leader has been and ought to be, he would be the last man to desire the millions of Endeavorers the world over to put their loyalty to him in the same rank with their loyalty to Christ. The higher allegiance must always encompass and support the lower. Vast conventions, splendid machinery, skillful officers would not save Christian Endeavor from going the way of other institutions that forgot their divine purpose if it should ever live for self and not for its Lord.

Perhaps one reason for the institution of Christian Endeavor Day was that the far-sighted men in charge of the movement wished the rank and file to think occasionally of the leading ideas and commanding ideals which brought the movement into being and which have caused it to prosper thus far. The loyal Endeavorer, therefore, will try to understand and carry out the large yet simple basal plan of the organization. "Is our society keeping to the purpose with which it started? Does it really understand what Christian Endeavor is—what it is meant to do for those within its ranks and for the outside world? Am I, as an individual Endeavorer, fulfilling the covenant which I have taken, serving the society on committees or in an official capacity as I ought to serve it?" Questions like these will test one's loyalty, and Christian Endeavor ought to be judged not alone by the expression of it which the world sees, but by the noblest thought of it which was ever in any one's mind.

But something more is needed than to grasp the original idea. Loyal Endeavorers will seek to adjust the idea to the circumstances surrounding them. New fields of service have already been entered, which perhaps did not occur to any of that group that met in the Portland parlor sixteen years ago to form the first Endeavor Society. Better politics, world-wide missions, the overthrow of the liquor traffic—these are some of the desirable things which one by one have come to appeal to Christian Endeavorers. Other applications of the one central idea will surely be found. Certain changes and adjustments may profitably be made in many local societies. Loyalty means both holding fast to that which is good and sloughing off that which is outworn.

THE CHURCH PRAYER MEETING.

Topic, Jan. 24–30. Our Own Church Covenant. 1 Cor. 12: 12–31; Ps. 61; Heb. 10: 19–25.

What is its purpose? To what does it pledge us? How can we make it attractive by obedience?

(See prayer meeting editorial.)

The work and importance of the Tuskegee Negro Conferences have now become so widely known and recognized throughout the country as a means of showing the colored people how to get upon their feet that the friends of the Negro will be glad to know that the next session of the Negro Conference convenes at Tuskegee, Ala., under the auspices of the institute, Feb. 24. On Feb. 25 the Workers' Conference of representatives from leading Negro schools will be held. These Negro Conferences, composed of seven or eight hundred of the farmers and mechanics of the colored race, furnish a rare opportunity to study at first hand the Negro's condition and progress from year to year.

Literature

BOOK REVIEWS.

GOVERNMENTS AND PARTIES IN CONTINENTAL EUROPE.

A student of political science and history finds the study of political parties of the first importance, and the varieties of governments and their different influences upon parties and upon political thought and effort in general are themes no less engrossing and significant. The present work, by Mr. A. Lawrence Lowell, is an important contribution to the literature of this subject because of its great ability and also because the literature of the sort is comparatively limited. The work is simple in outline but profound in research and reasoning. Some of the leading continental countries are taken up one by one—France, Italy, Germany, Austria-Hungary and Switzerland—and the political institutions and parties of each are described in their origins, their history and their workings. Thus the opportunity of comparison between democracies like France and Switzerland and monarchies like Italy, Germany and Austria are furnished.

No reader, unless previously informed, can fail to be surprised by the intricate, complicated mutual relations of political parties within the same nation, and it is a signal proof of Mr. Lowell's eminent ability that he has managed to render his pages so lucid. He has mastered his theme, and has enabled his readers to comprehend it in even its most perplexing features. To the American reader the differences between our own republican institutions and those of the French and the Swiss, respectively, are of intense interest, and we have risen from the perusal of the book with the feeling that, grave although the problems are which American statesmen still have to solve, they can be no graver than those which exist in countries often asserted to possess a civilization more stable than ours. Indeed, if the condition of things which exists in France politically existed here, we are confident that the charge of crudeness, superficiality and insecurity in our political institutions and methods would be made against us far more generally and earnestly than at present. As for the so-called strong nations, they, Germany especially, in many respects are in a worse plight than the republics, and what the outcome can be no one may venture to prophesy.

Mr. Lowell confines himself properly to the rôle of the narrator. He has given the clearest possible account of the political institutions of the countries considered—how they came to be what they are, their excellences and their defects, and of the actual manner in which they operate—and to some extent he has allowed himself, although with the utmost discretion, to suggest what the future seems likely to bring forth. Such a work, of course, appeals to a limited circle of readers—those who are distinctively students of political affairs. They will appreciate its thoroughness, its clearness, its perfect candor and its practical suggestiveness, but many portions of the book appeal strongly, not only to this comparatively limited body but to one much larger.

For example, the story of Prince Bismarck's leadership in German politics is the most distinct and satisfactory which we ever have seen, and it is contained in a few pages. The relations of Austria and Hungary, which the general public does not know much about, and which are not only important but possess positive picturesqueness, are here revealed in an intelligible and delightful series of chapters. The story of Crispi, the famous Italian prime minister, now fallen, is another example of effective and enlightening work. And in a different way the explanations of the frequent interpellations in the French Chamber of Deputies and the use of the initiative and the referendum in Switzerland illustrate the wider, but equally practical, interest of the treatise.

We do not see much difference between the different nations described in respect to the advantages of either democracy or sovereignty. Undoubtedly, the republican system, as illustrated in Switzerland, comes nearest to the ideal of what a government ought to be, but, as Mr. Lowell points out, the conditions in Switzerland afford a superior opportunity for the attainment of success, and do not exist in France or even in the United States—countries so much larger, and in our own case so much more heterogeneous than even Switzerland, that comparisons hardly can be made with fairness.

One thing is obvious, the growing tendency in all the countries considered towards the extension of popular influence upon, and participation in, the government. Although this is not evident everywhere, nor to the same degree where it is apparent, the tendency towards the increase of popular control seems undeniable, and nowhere is this more plain at present than in Germany itself. He would be foolish indeed who should anticipate the speedy or complete transformation of imperial or monarchical institutions into democracies throughout Europe, nevertheless, further vital changes are likely to come in time, and when they begin in one country there is no knowing how rapidly they will appear elsewhere. England, not being a continental nation, is not included in the scope of this study, but frequent and useful comparisons with English institutions are made, and the work is one of the most able, trustworthy and in every way rewarding to the reader which exists upon its subject. [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $5.00.]

RELIGIOUS.

The Gospel of the Divine Sacrifice [Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.25], by Rev. Dr. C. C. Hall, is termed by him a study of evangelical belief with some conclusions touching life. It is a reverent, thoughtful, helpful study of the atonement, its cause, its extent, its characteristics and its relation to the divine sovereignty. It is carefully conservative theologically without being fettered by the past, but, although most evangelical Christian people will agree with it in the main, some of its positions may be regarded as unsatisfactory. For example, we do not feel so sure as the author seems that his effort to show that the atonement is universal is a success. The book is one which no Christian can read without experiencing a spiritual uplift and impulse and of course it is intended primarily for Christian readers. It is not so well adapted to aid the unconverted who are thoughtfully inquiring into the subject of the book.

A Boy and the Christ [Eaton & Mains. 60 cents] is by Rev. F. C. Haddock. In the form of a biographical sketch, gracefully written, it contains some touching features and sets forth the spiritual struggles of a soul searching for peace and ultimately finding it. It has some tasteful illustrations.——Rev. H. D. Kimball, D. D., is the author of Beyond the Horizon [Eaton & Mains. $1.00], in which the subjects of existence after death, the intermediate state, the resurrection, the judgment, heaven, etc., are discussed. The author takes cheerful and inspiring views and writes with caution and discrimination. We do not feel that he has added much to popular knowledge of the subject, but his theme is one on which the human mind dwells often, and such a study of it in such a spirit promotes discreet and inspiring convictions in regard to it.——Bible Study by Books [F. H. Revell Co. 60 cents] is another volume by Rev. H. T. Sell, which is admirably adapted to help Biblical students, since it sets forth the facts about the dates, authorship, authenticity and contents of the successive books of the Bible. It is an excellent handbook for ministers and for the laity as well.

STORIES.

In a Triumph of Destiny [J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.25] Julia H. Twells, Jr., has written a vigorous but recklessly improbable novel. Up to the latter part of the book it is a fine piece of work, not only in conception, but in execution. In the portrayal of character, of scenery and all the essentials of an artistic piece of work it excels, but it is too much to ask the reader to suppose that the heroine ever fell in love with Jim. This climax is as unnatural as it is disappointing. The reunion of husband and wife either should not have been consummated or it should have been accomplished less grudgingly on the author's part, but, in any case, although the devotion of Jim to Helen is not unnatural in itself and is finely portrayed, the sympathy and regard of the heroine for him should not have been allowed to develop into love. For such a woman might pity, respect and even admire such a man as Jim, but hardly could love him.

White Sand [Merriam Co. $1.25], by M. C. Balfour, is a story of low moral tone but fairly well written. Indeed, as a piece of work it is somewhat striking here and there, but we cannot commend it otherwise. The blunders of an absent-minded, but also a noble-minded, man and the reckless and sinful selfishness and treachery of a frivolous society doll hardly are worth the attention here paid to them. It is hardly possible to believe that such a man as the hero could make such a fool of himself over such a creature as the principal heroine, and, although it may not be impossible, to describe the process was hardly worth while.

It is a comical vein which Mr. C. E. Raimond has worked in The Fatal Gift of Beauty, and Other Stories [H. S. Stone & Co. $1.25]. His heroines are beings in low life in London and he has given the reader the benefit of his rare skill in minute and interesting studies of boarding house keepers, servant girls, etc. There is a good deal of human nature in his pages.——We might use almost the same language of Meg McIntyre's Raffle, and Other Stories [Copeland & Day. $1.25], by A. F. Sanborn. A little lower grade of life is described, the tramp and street rough elements receiving considerable attention. But one sketch, Baucis and Philemon, deals with the bright and pathetic side of humble life most touchingly. The author possesses genuine ability both as a student and a painter of his fellowmen.——A graceful and tender little sketch, entitled Sir Knight of the Golden Pathway [$1.25], by Anna S. P. Duryea, is issued by Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons. It deals with a beautiful boyhood and the reader finds himself inspired to simple and sincere Christian service. The book is prettily gotten up.

If we are right in interpreting the motive of Mr. E. I. Stevenson, author of A Matter of Temperament [American Publishers' Corporation. $1.00], to be the inculcation of the theory that the artistic temperament is in some sense unmoral and therefore not to be governed by ordinary rules of conduct, we take exceptions. It is a popular theory in some quarters, but utterly mistaken and most mischievous. The story is one of unrighteous love and disloyalty to one's friends and is not even interesting in any notable degree. We do not commend it. ——Equally must be condemned A Game of Consequences [Merriam Co. 75 cents], by Albert Kinross. Its literary brightness and ability must be conceded, but it is morally low-toned and thoroughly objectionable. ——The Tiger Lily [Cassell Co. 50 cents], by G. M. Fenn, is equally open to criticism and is a morbid and unwholesome book, although a dramatic and exciting story.

The Crime of a Century [G. P. Putnam's Sons. 50 cents], by Rodrigues Ottolengui, also deals with crime and tragedy, but in a more useful fashion. It has two aims: one, to show that it is better to solve the problems of crime by studying facts, to whatever conclusion they may lead, than to adopt a theory and endeavor to make facts prove it; the other, to illustrate the influence of heredity upon the criminal class and to correct in some respects the attitude of society toward wrongdoers. The story is one of the best accounts of detective work which we have read, and abounds in surprises.——With Fortune Made [D. Appleton & Co. 50 cents] is by Victor Cherbuliez and describes the tantalizing manner in which a French millionaire deals with his heirs and, without being especially engrossing, is amusing and makes some useful suggestions.

Karine [A. C. McClurg & Co. $1.00], translated by Emma A. Endlich from the German of Wilhelm Gensen, is a historical novel describing the expulsion of the Danes from Sweden by Gustavus Vasa and his assumption of the Swedish crown. His love story also is interwoven. It is a vigorous and likewise a graceful tale, instinct with patriotism and picturesque in manner. ——In Daybreak [G. H. Richmond & Co. $1.50], by James Cowan, the familiar artifice of a dream is employed again to describe life in Mars, and also to express the author's notions of the condition of things in the moon. The pleasant narrative also is an essay and discourses on social problems. It depicts an ideal civilization, which is not beyond the bounds of possibility in most respects, but which it will take generations, to say the least, to attain upon this planet. The tone of the book is high in all respects, and the author has handled his material skillfully.

Amy E. Blanchard is the author of Taking a Stand [G. W. Jacobs & Co. $1.25], and her story deals with the brave efforts of a family suddenly reduced to poverty, and especially with the adventures of the son in his successful effort to secure possession of remote property which had almost been lost. Without obtruding its moral it cannot fail to have a good influence.——Appointed Paths [James H. Earle. $1 25] is by Mrs. Annie S. Perkins. It describes some bright young people and their experiences and adventures, and is readable and entertaining. It exerts a distinct Christian influence, and was evidently intended for the Sunday school library.——An addition to the growing list of Scotch books is The Land o' the Leal [Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.00], by David Lyall. A Scottish village and its inhabitants are described, and the author exhibits genuine power and delicacy. The book is different from Dr. Watson's stories in some respects, especially in the less general use of the Scottish dialect, but the same shrewd, sensible and pathetic human nature is evident throughout. It is a choice book and will be popular.

Another volume in the Witch Winnie series, by Mrs. Elizabeth W. Champney, is Witch Winnie in Holland [Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.00]. The heroine visits that interesting country and pursues the study of art, and some of her former companions reappear. The always noteworthy features of Dutch life are brought well to the front and from every point of view the book is full of interest, especially for the young. The humorous element is not wanting and is a pleasant feature.——That First Affair and Other Sketches [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25] is the work of Mr. J. A. Mitchell, editor of Life, and contains five short stories somewhat original in conception and more than ordinarily pleasing in form. It is light literature pre eminently, but it is good work in that line, although we should prefer some other subject for the first sketch than a matter so momentous to the human race as the fall of our first parents. There are a number of illustrations.——Messrs. S. R. Crockett, Gilbert Parker, Harold Frederic, W. Clark Russell and Q. have contributed an essay apiece to make up the volume, Tales of Our Coast [Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.25], which is a striking book. Its contents appeared first in The Idler and their vitality, faithful local color and literary picturesqueness will win them many readers.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A new volume in the Story of the West series is the Story of the Mine [D. Appleton & Co. $1.50], by C. H. Shinn. The great Comstock lode in Nevada is his subject, and he discusses mining in general by describing this particular mine. History and poetry alike are illustrated in the story of the early miners and their life. The discovery of mines, and this mine in particular, the fluctuations of fortune, the perils of mining, the mechanical and scientific development of the business, the days of its great prosperity and of the enormous fortunes made by some, the character of mining communities, and all sorts of kindred themes, are treated in an orderly narrative from the point of view of a practical expert who is also a lucid and discriminating writer. The book does not stimulate the reader to go West and embark his fortune in mining as quickly as possible, although it reveals the possibilities which exist for those who know how to take advantage of them. Illustrations make clear what is set forth and the book will be regarded as authoritative.——The Adams Cable Codex contains a list of cipher words used in cable dispatches and their meanings. It is very valuable for travelers abroad who may need to send messages across the ocean. In a single message it may save many times its cost, which is only twenty-five cents. A new edition has been issued by F. O. Houghton & Co., steamship agents, Boston.

Plants and Their Children [American Book Co. 65 cents], by Mrs. W. S. Dana, is intended and well fitted to interest the younger children in botany. It may be used either as a text-book or as a reading-book, and in simple language and short chapters it describes a large number of plants, flowers and fruit. It will develop the habit of observation and promote an intelligent comprehension of plants even in the very young. Miss Alice J. Smith has illustrated it freely and very well.——Allen & Greenough's Shorter Latin Grammar [Ginn & Co. $1.05] is an abbreviation of their well-known complete grammar. It condenses the substance of the larger volume and follows the same general lines. It is an example of superior scholarship, and its practical serviceableness hardly needs to be asserted.

Plane Geometry [Silver, Burdett & Co. 75 cents] is from the pen of Mr. G. D. Pettee of Phillips Academy, Andover. Whether or not the work succeeds in taking a step in advance in rendering the study of its subject more intelligible, it certainly is a textbook abundantly deserving of hearty approval. The author is a successful instructor and his method has been justified by its fruits. The book is equipped with all the usual collateral helps and is handsomely printed.——The New Arithmetic, Part I. [Ginn & Co. 40 cents], by W. W. Speer, is for teachers rather than for pupils. It strikes us as leaving too little at some points to the teachers. A teacher who needs to be definitely taught to devise and propound the question, "At one cent each, how many postal cards can be bought for three cents?" hardly is prepared to teach. Yet the book contains much which is suggestive, and there may be many who will find most of it valuable.

MORE JANUARY MAGAZINES.

Two or three of the leading reviews are unusually tardy in reaching us. One is The Review of Reviews [$2.50]. In The Progress of the World it offers a summary of the leading events of 1896, one of the best which has been published. A strong paper is How Not to Better Social Conditions, by Hon. Theodore Roosevelt, called out by a letter from Hon. Thomas Watson of Georgia. Another is a symposium of Practical Suggestions from Students of Finance, by Professors A. T. Hadley, J. L. Laughlin, F. W. Taussig, Presidents W. F. Slocum, C. K. Andrews and others. The miscellaneous material in the number is timely, and a large number of portraits of persons just now specially prominent are supplied, such as Dr. Storrs, Hon. Joseph H. Choate, the late William Steinway, the European Ambassadors at Constantinople, the new Bishop of Peterborough and Messrs. Roosevelt and Watson.

The Vicomte E. M. de Vogüé leads off in The Forum with a very eulogistic and instructive sketch of Pope Leo XIII., which appears to overrate the pope's sagacity in some respects but which gives a fairly good idea of his character and work, and points out clearly the deadly mutual rivalry of the two great parties within the papacy. Mr. O. D. Ashley's article, Middle Ground on the Tariff, is as timely as it is sensible. We wish every member of each house of Congress could be induced to read it attentively. Ex-Governor Cornell of New York proposes, as a remedy for the paralysis to business caused by our presidential elections, the lengthening of the president's term of office to six years. This hardly seems adequate to the cure sought. The other contributions are quite diversified in topics—e. g., Modern Composers in the Light of Contemporary Criticism, by Alexander Moszkowski; American Archæological Work in Greece, by J. Gennadius; and Intercollegiate Debating, by Prof. R. C. Ringwalt.

In the North American Hon. H. C. Lodge's analysis of the votes cast in the last national election, Hon. T. W. Russell, M. P.'s, account of Root Difficulties of Irish Government, and Mr. Andrew Carnegie's study of Mr. Bryan as a Conjurer are prominent. But equally significant are Mr. E. J. Kelley's Strikes as a Factor in Progress, which claims that all strikes, whether they succeed or fail, benefit working people in the long run; and J. E. Milholland's The Danger Point in American Politics, which he declares to be the caucus. It is high time that this fact were appreciated as it ought to be. Mr. John Codman argues The Folly of Differential Duties, and Mr. Poultney Bigelow discusses The German Press and the United States.

In the January Atlantic [$4 00] there are several striking contributions, e. g., A Century of Social Betterment, by J. B. McMaster, most encouraging in its delineation of both material and moral progress; Dominant Forces in Southern Life, by W. P. Trent, a penetrating examination of present conditions prophesying the splitting up of the "solid South" along economic lines of cleavage; Park Making as a National Art, by Mary Caroline Robbins, an interesting study and summary; and The Poetry of Rudyard Kipling, by Prof. C. L. Norton, recognizing him, some will think too readily, as continuing the great succession of royal English poets. Paul Leicester Ford's serial, The Story of an Untold Love, and Charles Egbert Craddock's, The Juggler, go on enjoyably. J. J. Chapman offers a first paper on Emerson, Sixty Years After, and the other contents also are valuable in one or another way.

Several of the religious magazines also have come somewhat late to hand. The Presbyterian and Reformed Review [$3.00] has a sketch of Melancthon, of whose birth the 400th anniversary falls on Feb. 16, by Dr. E. D. Warfield. Rev. L. H. Cobb discusses The Fellowship of Goods in the Apostolic Church convincingly, showing the absurdity of the frequent claim of the communists. Prof. William Alexander treats of Dogmatic Theology and Civilization and the value of the former to the latter, and Prof. B. B. Warfield of Christian Supernaturalism. A lighter but very good article is Dr. H. D. Jenkins's on The American Lyceum. The book notices, as always, are able and constitute one of the best features of this publication.

Biblia [$1.00] contains the latest news about Egyptian exploration. Some space is filled by a communication from Rev. Dr. W. C. Winslow, pointing out that radical changes in the make-up of the American management have been made without properly consulting the American subscribers. ——The Sunday Magazine has papers by Dean Farrar, entitled God's Autograph of Blessing; by M. B. Phillips, delightful Personal Reminiscences of Archbishop Benson; by F. J. Crowest, on Chorister Boys and Their Lives, etc. It is as readable and attractive as ever.——Edna Lyall's new story, Wayfaring Men, begins in this issue of Good Words, and William Black furnishes Some Recollections of Carlyle's Talk, T. H. Allbutt writes of Chess and Chess Clubs, M. G. Mulhall describes Progress in Locomotion during the Victorian Era, and the high standard of the magazine is well maintained. It is less distinctly religious than the Sunday Magazine, but has a religious department.——The Open Church [50 cents] has an elaborate account of The New Era of Church Work in New York City, by Dr. F. M. North. The Judson Memorial and St. George's Churches, the Broome Street Tabernacle, with their manifold appliances and agencies for good, are described and illustrated. A fine bird's eye view of this sort of work in New York is afforded. This is the principal feature of the month.

The New England Historical and Genealogical Register [$3.00] presents a portrait and sketch of Daniel D. Slade. Another leading contribution is by the late Hon. M. A. Richardson, LL D., on The Government of Harvard College, Past and Present. The specific historical and antiquarian material is excellent and varied. Such a magazine does a solid work.——The Philosophical Review [$3 00] is published for a distinct class of readers. The Psychology of Effort, by Prof. John Dewey, and Prof. D. G. Ritchie's second paper on The Relation of Logic to Psychology are good examples of the material for vigorous thought which it offers.——Education [$3.00] has articles on Manual Training in England and America, The Teaching of Sanitary Science in Schools, A Distinctive American Education, Aims in the Study of Literature, etc. Dr. Mayo's study of the New American Academy is one of the more striking contributions. ——The Kindergarten News gives graphic sketches of Mrs. Mary S. Gregory—with a portrait—and of the late Mrs. Sarah B. Cooper of San Francisco. There also is much distinctively kindergarten material and some more general. Mothers and teachers will value it.

The Book Buyer [$1.00] seems to increase in value and interest with every issue. Its news, criticisms, portraits of authors, etc., are delightful to every one who has literary tastes. William Morris is the principal star this month.——Littell's Living Age [$6.00] recently has reduced its price from $8 00, has introduced several new and tempting features, and evidently is starting upon a new era of popularity.——Donahoe's Magazine [$2.00] contains considerable general and some distinctively Roman Catholic material and is edited with enterprise. It is well illustrated.——The Chap Book [$2 00] maintains well its distinct individuality, aiming to be entertaining and striking without becoming sensational. If it has crossed the boundary at times, it has returned, and its unique quality, if somewhat perilous, also is its special attraction. ——The American Kitchen Magazine [$1.00] has a somewhat broader range than the title indicates, and deals with many other features of household life as well as cooking. It is well adapted to its purpose.——The Musical Record [$1.00] fills an equally wide field, dealing with musical matters of both great and minor significance, and with intelligence and success.

NOTES.

—— Here is Robert Louis Stevenson's direction to Dr. A. Conan Doyle, accompanying an invitation to Samoa: "You go to America, cross the continent to San Francisco, and then it is the second turning to the left."

—— Mr. Horace E. Scudder is writing a life of the late H. O. Houghton, the eminent Boston publisher, of which a private limited edition will be printed.

—— The Chap-Book is to alter its form and to assume one much like that of The Saturday Review, also becoming "a magazine of critical review in literary affairs."

—— The entire Halliwell-Phillips collection of Shakespeariana has been secured by Mr. Marsden J. Perry of Providence, R. I. Its estimated value is $100,000.

—— Mr. T. B. Aldrich's many readers will be pleased to learn that the late Hon. Henry L. Pierce left to him or members of his family about half a million dollars.

—— A bronze bust of Oliver Wendell Holmes, by Richard E. Brooks, and a colossal bust in marble of Whittier, by William O. Partridge, have been placed in Bates Hall of the Boston Public Library.

—— Miss Victorine T. Artz of Chicago has given $10,000 to the Boston Public Library for the establishment and support of a Longfellow Memorial Collection. This, however, is not to consist of Longfellow's own works, but merely is named in his honor. Its contents are to be valuable rare editions of books and original manuscripts.

—— The late Dr. John Ellis of New York left $20,000 to the American Swedenborg Society for printing and binding Swedenborg's Arcana Celestia, which is to be given away free to all clergymen and students who ask for it. He also left $10,000 for the translation of Swedenborg's writings and their distribution among Swedes in this country, Italy and Sweden.

Religious Life in the Colleges.

Encouraging Reports from Various Institutions.

SMITH.

It has always been the rule at Smith to leave each student free to attend on Sunday the church to which she has been accustomed, in preference to requiring attendance at a service in the college. For the last eight years or more a vesper service has been held at five o'clock Sunday afternoons in Assembly Hall. Started at first as an experiment, it has always been largely attended, and now the hall is often crowded. The service is simple and varied from week to week. Praise always forms a large part thereof. Sometimes President Seelye speaks, whom the students always hear gladly; again one of the professors, or a visitor from out of town, or the music of the organ as interpreted by Dr. Blodgett may bring the gospel message without word of mouth.

Various societies connected with religious work in the college from the first years were amalgamated by the Class of '93 into the Smith College Association for Christian Work. This has as its object "to promote spiritual life among the students and an active interest in benevolent work." It includes the Missionary Society, College Settlement Association, Needlework Guild and the workers in the Home Culture Clubs. Each society has its own officers and conducts its separate line of work, reporting to the association at certain intervals. Class prayer meetings are held every Sunday night in the parlors of the houses.

The chief work of the S. C. A. C. W., aside from these branches, is done in its weekly prayer meetings and the committees connected therewith. These meetings are held in Music Hall and are well sustained. Members of the various classes, members of the faculty or pastors of the city churches act as leaders. Any member of the college is welcomed, and faculty as well as students take an active part in this service, which has become to many a source of much spiritual help. Though well sustained last year the meeting has been still more so this year, through the renewed interest engendered among a number of its members who were delegates to the conference at Northfield the past summer.

Classes for the study of missions meet two evenings in the week, and on Sunday a number of classes meet for special Bible study. When these facts are considered it must be borne in mind that all the societies are purely voluntary, and are formed to meet the needs of the students as they themselves formulate them. It will thus be seen that they indicate a healthy Christian feeling, and a desire to have growth in spiritual life keep pace with intellectual development.

X.

WILLIAMS.

Religious work at Williams is being carried on along much the same lines as in previous years. There are some encouraging signs of a deepening of the general religious life. Bible classes conducted systematically by the four classes among themselves have been unusually successful, and there seems to be a growing interest in the study of the Bible. The lives of Christ and Paul are being studied, and there is a good average of attendance and, in some cases, what amounts to enthusiasm.

The Y. M. C. A. is in good condition, numbering in membership not far from one-half of the student body, and finds very little friction from the non-religious men. Faithful work is being done by a few men in the outlying districts as in past years. A large proportion of the students are church members.

While there is no marked evidence of anything very unusual in religious work or results, it can be safely said that the moral tone of the college is sound. Immorality is not popular. That the religious atmosphere is healthful on the whole is shown by the unusual degree of freedom among the students in the manly discussion of religious questions. The college has raised in the neighborhood of $900 the past year for the missionary work of two of its graduates, Dr. Washburn at Pasumalai, South India, and Dr. Tracy at Marsovan.

WELLESLEY.

The religious foundation of Wellesley College is well known. It is believed that changes which have been made in social and religious organization relate to form rather than to spirit. The college preachers still represent various denominations and still call together attentive and responsive audiences. Students are expected to attend this Sunday morning service in the chapel, or some other public religious service. Attendance upon morning prayers is still required. The Sunday vesper service attracts large numbers.

About seven-tenths of the students of the college are church members. Before Wellesley had passed her first decade a Christian Association was formed for the purpose of strengthening Christian fellowship and effort. The hold that this organization has today upon students may be inferred from the fact that for several years in succession a student has been elected to the presidency. Through its devotional committee the association provides for a midweek meeting or address, through its missionary committee for an address on Sunday evening. By means of these Thursday and Sunday evening meetings a wide range of missionary and benevolent work is represented. A member of the faculty is chairman of each of the two above named committees.

Following the demand for specialized instruction daily Bible classes long ago gave place to regularly trained instruction in Biblical history, literature and interpretation, with appointments once or twice a week. Yet the Bible is still the wonted guide and inspiration. There are at present in the college, organized and maintained by students, twenty-two classes for the devotional study of the Scriptures. In like manner some of the appointments for prayer and private devotion yielded to the exigencies of development. But the spirit which animated the founders and their devoted associates proved to be still potent, and year after year groups of more than two or three have gathered for prayer at times and places of their own.

The Christian Association is expecting to send this year an especially strong delegation to the meeting of the International Young Women's Christian Association at Northfield. Through the association and other organizations which work side by side with it various benevolent and missionary enterprises gain eager and intelligent recruits. Evidence is not wanting at Wellesley that philanthropy is earnestly putting herself to school. The idea is gaining ground that the benevolent impulse finds its mark not less surely when it has been controlled by thought and squared with experience.

C.

MT. HOLYOKE.

Within the last two years there has been a fresh awakening in religious interest at Mt. Holyoke, and perhaps at no time in its history has there been more of vital life or of effective Christian work. The Young Woman's Christian Association, with a membership of about three-fourths of the students, is thoroughly and systematically organized, the work being so distributed among the various committees that a large number are brought into active service, and their best energies are called forth.

Most worthy of note are the earnestness and large attendance which mark the devotional meetings, both general and class, and the enthusiasm in the Bible and mission study classes. These weekly classes are conducted wholly by the students, under the leadership of certain of their number. There are three mission classes and five Bible classes, with an entire enrollment of eighty-seven members.

The Mt. Holyoke Missionary Association, founded sixteen years ago and now connected with the Hampshire County Branch' maintains its interest in practical work, while the Volunteer Band meets weekly for prayer and conference. The missionary interest is strong. Within a few months three recent graduates have gone to fill posts in Chile, Japan and China.

Distinct from this voluntary work is the required Bible study of the regular curriculum, which is planned with the purpose of forming an intellectual basis for the more thorough devotional use of the Bible. For several years Biblical literature has been an established chair of instruction. It is of interest that four Mt. Holyoke graduates have completed the theological course at Hartford Seminary, and are engaged in Christian teaching or missionary work, while four others are now taking a similar course with like purposes.

R. C.

YALE.

During the past year perhaps the most marked deepening of interest lies in the increase of attention to Bible study. An address at the opening of the fall term by Professor Purves of Princeton was largely responsible for this. This was supplemented by an earnest address by Professor Jacobus of Hartford at the opening of the present term. An especially strong committee, under the direction of the general secretary of the university Y. M. C. A., has had this in charge. There is a present average attendance of about 225 of the undergraduate students at the regular Bible classes. Owing partly to the opening of a special department of the Y. M. C. A. in the Sheffield Scientific School, the Bible classes in that undergraduate department have doubled this year. Its need is new quarters, with the same facilities which Dwight Hall offers to the academic students.

Yale has a system of her own for Bible study, arranged five years ago by the present general secretary of the Y. M. C. A., Mr. William H. Sallmon. It is issued in book form and is being adopted by many of the larger colleges. The system is permanent and progressive. During the Freshman year the life of Christ is studied. This is followed in the Sophomore year by a study of the parables and miracles. The apostle Paul is the subject for the Juniors and the Seniors take up character studies in the Old Testament.

The meeting in Dwight Hall every Sunday evening is the popular religious gathering of the university. The attendance this year has been unusually large. At the opening of the term Dean Wright of the college spoke for the first time in public on a religious subject. He has a strong influence on the men, and his words had the weight that always attaches to the utterances of a "silent" man. These meetings are addressed by such men as Drs. Teunis Hamlin, Henry Van Dyke and Alexander McKenzie. Regarding the preaching in the college chapel those in authority are consulting more with the students than formerly in the choice of preachers. The mission work of the Y. M. C. A., its Boys' Club, the Yale Mission, the Bethany

Sunday School and other departments are in good condition.

A fact of especial encouragement is that the present Freshman Class has taken hold of the religious work of the university with unusual interest. Its prayer meetings are largely attended. Indeed, it is the testimony of Seniors, who have had four years in which to make comparisons, that there is a better moral influence and spirit than they have ever seen. Immorality as a concomitant of "college life" is decreasing. To be sure there is a class of men who still make this a factor, but they are given their true status more and more.

Probably at least two-thirds of the undergraduates are either active participants or are in real sympathy with the Dwight Hall work. The religious life in the theological and other graduate departments adds to the general tone of the university. The graduate Bible class, composed of graduate law and medical students and taught by Professor Duncan, has been full of interest. The presence of Ian Maclaren for two weeks at the opening of the fall term did much to brighten the religious life of the university.

Regarding the Day of Prayer for Colleges, the announcement may seem strange that Yale does not observe it this year, but substitutes for it the Sunday of the regular Week of Prayer for Young Men. The day had come to be more a holiday than a holy day. The students, if they had cuts enough to spare, went away to spend the day at home or with friends. It thus lost its significance and it was deemed better, for this and other reasons, to substitute another day. C. S. M.

AMHERST.

"The Church of Christ in Amherst College" held its annual meeting Jan. 14, and as it completed a few months ago its seventieth year of existence the occasion was of more than usual interest. Dr. W. S. Tyler, the loved and honored veteran, was not present to respond to his name in the roll-call, as he no longer goes out in the evening, but the fact was recalled that he has been a member of this church almost sixty-nine years. Even this record is surpassed by that of Dr. Elias Riggs of the Bible House in Constantinople, whose membership is still with the Amherst Church, his name being last on the list of "charter members" of the church in 1826, headed by the name of President Humphrey.

The reports of the various church officers and committees for 1896 show that in quiet ways much is being done for the cause of Christ in the college and its neighborhood. The work of Zion Chapel, our colored mission, and of the other outlying stations is prosperous and encouraging. The religious work of the students now centers largely in the Y. M. C. A., which has lately found pleasant quarters in the large room in Williston Hall, formerly occupied as the chemistry lecture-room, and which is actively conducting Bible study for all the classes and a missionary study class meeting weekly.

Since the late pastor, Dr. J. E. Tuttle, left for his new and inspiring field of labor in Worcester there has been manifest an encouraging disposition to close up the ranks and to make the most of the agencies for religious work left to us while waiting for his successor. The pulpit has been filled very acceptably several Sundays by Professor Genung, and Dr. McKenzie, whose presence always brings a blessing, was here once last term and is to preach on the Day of Prayer for Colleges. The vesper service at five o'clock Sunday is, hereafter, to include a ten-minute address, which will give the service more character and attractiveness.

It is long since the college has received so severe a blow as came to it last week in the death of the honored alumnus and former trustee, Gen. Francis A. Walker. His record as a student here was one of uncommon brilliancy, and now for a quarter of a century he has continually conferred new honors on his alma mater by his distinguished public services in many fields. His fine personal qualities were such that they who knew him perhaps forget his high honors in their sorrow for the man as their friend. F.

DARTMOUTH.

No single circumstance has contributed more to the development of a wholesome religious spirit at Dartmouth in recent months than the personal labors of one of the younger graduates, who has been on the ground since the opening of the autumn term. Mr. H. O. Aiken was taken from the staff of instructors at the Hill School in Pottstown, Pa., to perform practically the work of a college Y. M. C. A. secretary, like that which has been a feature of religious life at Yale ever since Dwight Hall was established. Mr. Aiken teaches several hours a week in the local high school, but that function is subordinate to his work with the college men. This consists in aiding them in organizing and carrying on their religious work, and in helping them, so far as he is able, in the problems of their personal religious lives. He has proved to be exceptionally well adapted to these difficult and delicate tasks, and has quickened the religious life of the college in many ways.

This year the observance of the Week of Prayer took on a novel character. For several years past Holy Week has been observed instead of the first week in January, but owing chiefly to Prof. C. D. Adams a new way of marking the week was found, and the outcome abundantly justifies the change. Whereas the ordinary topics might have brought together only a few, the special program, in which both members of the faculty and citizens of the town participated, caused the assembling of large and extremely interested audiences. President Tucker spoke one evening on The Growing Capacity of Village Life, ex-President Bartlett surveyed the World Wide Work of Christianity on another evening, and on still other occasions the relation of business men to the religious forces of the town and of the young people were considered. Most of the collegians were absent on their vacations at that time, but the college, as well as the community, are yet feeling the beneficial effects of this series of meetings.

The system of preachers from abroad has prevailed at Dartmouth for several years, and is considered altogether the best and most fruitful plan. President Tucker selects the occupants of the pulpit with a view to secure a strong and varied series of discourses.

BOWDOIN.

The strong factor in Bowdoin's religious life is its Y. M. C. A., founded in 1883. Since then it has been a source of much spiritual power within the student body, and is today an inspiration to many. Its weekly prayer meetings of forty-five minutes' duration are well attended. Ample time is given for testimony and exchange of ideas on the subject, and the meetings are a blessing to all who go.

The association's Sunday afternoon meetings are well attended also, and are especially helpful to many non-Christian students. The churches of Brunswick are doing a good work among the students, particularly through their Sunday evening meetings. The Christian men in college are highly respected and are wielding a strong influence.

Some Presbyterian pastors, remembering the deliverances of their General Assembly on the subject of temperance, propose to protest in a vigorous way against the disregard of temperance which characterized the recent Princeton sesqui-centennial banquet. Dr. T. L. Cuyler says of it: "Princeton trustees ought to know better. If McCosh had been alive he would have vetoed such an astonishing blunder. It was a foolish deference to the fashions and customs of distinguished foreign guests."

Rev. Alexander McKenzie, D. D., President; George Gould, Treasurer.

PASSING COMMENT ON THIS WEEK'S NEWS.

To churches and ministers who become restless after a few months together, we commend the following utterance of a Nebraska pastor at his recent anniversary celebration: "I have come into contact with three generations—those who in trial and struggle laid the foundations; their children, who have shared with me the joys and sorrows of a lifetime; and their grandchildren, now approaching manhood and womanhood." Thrice happy church and pastor! Who would not covet such an experience as this?

It is a pleasant thing for members of the church to take part in inducting its pastor into office. We hope, however, that in the instance mentioned this week the fellowship of the churches is assured, though they do not appear to have been invited. The expression of such fellowship is always to be desired on such occasions.

Among the brightest monuments to the memory of President Magoun of Iowa College is the little church which he founded, now just dedicating a new edifice. Success to all colleges and presidents whose influence is so beneficent and far-reaching.

A fact brought out in the historical review of the New Hampshire centenary merits special note: One in fourteen of the church edifices of the State are 100 years old or more—a larger proportion than in any other State.

All honor to the churches which attain self-support or close the year without debt, in this trying time of financial stringency. Such an achievement means far more now than it would in an era of prosperity.

A North Dakota church marked its tenth anniversary in a way which effectively extends its influence throughout the community.

Clean rolls of members may well be considered an important element at the beginning of the new year.

The spirit of Congregational extension has now touched Worcester, Mass., favorably.

Whitman College has reason for gratitude to an Ohio church.

A HILL TOWN CENTENNIAL.

In the town of Rindge, N. H., which borders on the Massachusetts line, is a meeting house whose steeple and belfry can be seen from every point of the compass for miles away. It stands among clustering hills as it has stood for 100 years and seems to have their strength. Noble men and women,

> Whose faith and hope and mighty deeds
> Still fresh instruction give, have made this meeting house illustrious. It was dedicated Jan. 11, 1797. On Jan. 11, 1897, the church appropriately observed its centennial anniversary. The large audience-room was well filled for the opening exercises at 2 P. M. Beautiful decorations caught the eye at once, "Welcome" in large evergreen letters across the front of the organ being most conspicuous. The pastor, Rev. J. P. Richardson, presided. The musical part of the program was specially pleasing, Mrs. R. E. Holgate of Dr. Foster's church, Winchendon, being the organist. The opening hymn was supposed to have been written by Mrs. Seth Payson, wife of the second pastor of the church and mother of Dr. Edward Payson. Dr. Foster read the Scriptures and offered prayer. The welcoming address was by Deacon H. E. Wetherbee.

An historical address by the pastor recounted the growth and progress of a hundred years of church life. It will doubtless be preserved, as it should be, in pamphlet form. These few sentences will indicate something of its scope: "New Hampshire is the banner State for unabandoned Congregational meeting houses 100 years old." "A new distinction is to be accorded the Rindge sanctuary as she crosses the 100 year line. Hitherto, she has been one of New Hampshire's 180 Congregational churches. Now she is one of her fourteen centennial churches."

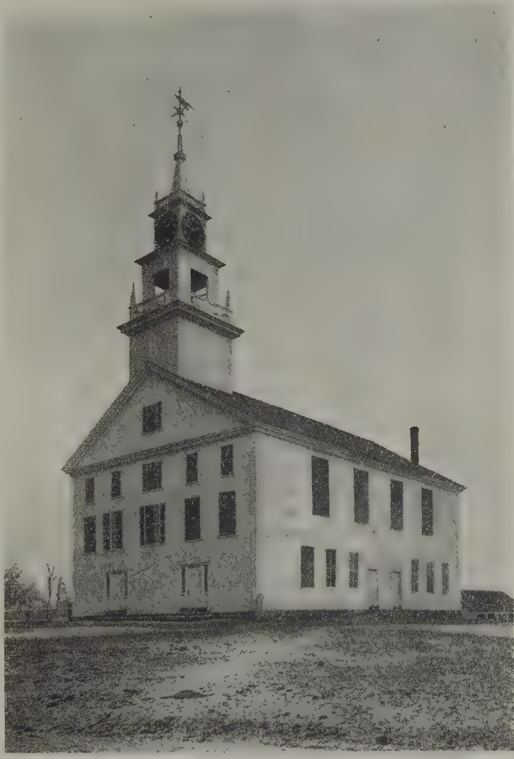
The list of those raised up in Rindge for the service of the church includes Edward and Phillip Payson, sons of the second pastor of the church. Two others became ministers' wives, one of them being known to the world as Elizabeth Prentiss. Three of Phillip Payson's sons became ministers, two of whom are now living. Asa Rand, brother-in-law of the Paysons, was of this flock. His son, Rev. Dr. W. W. Rand, is secretary of the American Tract Society.

Following Mr. Richardson's address Rev. F. G. Clark of Plymouth, N. H., a former pastor, spoke tenderly of his time, recalling incidents both amusing and pathetic. Letters were read from Governor Ramsdell, Rev. Dr. H. A. Hazen, Dr. C. F. P. Bancroft, the venerable Dr. G. L. Prentiss and many more. At the conclusion of the afternoon exercises Mr. Richardson invited the guests to look over the historic parsonage. A bountiful supper was then served in the large vestry.

At the evening service the sermon was preached by Rev. R. A. Beard, D. D. Broad in its intellectual grasp, strong in uplifting power, evangelistic in spirit, it was worthy of the occasion. The text was in 2 Sam. 22: 31, and "The perfect way of God" was the theme. He said that there is probably no other spot in New Hampshire from which so many illustrious men and women have gone. What made these men and women, the long roll of which has been read today, so illustrious? It was the faithful preaching of the everlasting gospel.

Following the sermon reminiscences and remarks were in order. H. Porter Smith of Cambridge spoke from the standpoint of a summer boarder and of a New Hampshire minister's son. He related the impressions of his boyhood and told many anecdotes of the ministers in this section of the State whom he remembered at his father's home when they came on "an exchange." Rev. Dr. Burnham, pastor of this church for forty-six years, was called to mind as a small man physically, but one who could appropriately respond, as did Dr. Watts when his small stature was alluded to,

> Were I so tall to reach the pole
> And grasp the ocean in my span,
> I must be measured by my soul,
> The mind's the standard of the man.



CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, RINDGE, N. H.

Measured by this standard, Dr. Burnham was a man of grand proportions. Anecdotes and quaint sayings were related of such men as Humphry Moore of Milford, "Father Savage" of Bedford, William Clark of Amherst and others. Rev. Mr. Burroughs, editor of the New Hampshire Record, spoke of the inspiration of this occasion. Several laymen followed him, and this memorable anniversary closed with singing a hymn written for the occasion by Mrs. Martha J. Heywood, daughter of Dr. Burnham. VISITOR.

A MOTHER CHURCH HONORED.

Probably no religious anniversary has occurred west of the Missouri River combining so many elements of interest as that observed, Jan. 10, 11, at First Church, Lincoln, Neb., celebrating the thirtieth anniversary year of the existence of the church, the twenty-first of the settlement of the pastor, Rev. Lewis Gregory, and the tenth of the occupancy of their present beautiful house of worship. The exercises commemorated not only the life and work of First Church as connected with the other local Congregational churches, and the relation of the pastor to the various interests of the city, but to some extent the denominational work in the State.

At the morning service the first day the three other English speaking churches of the city—Plymouth, Vine Street and Butler Avenue—united with the First, the mother of all. Rev. John Doane of Plymouth, Rev. A. F. Newell of Vine Street and Supt. Harmon Bross assisted in the service. The pastor preached a historical sermon. Strong and sympathetic in its delineations of early life in a new State, paying glowing tribute to the memory of early workers, tracing briefly the growth from decade to decade, it bore upon its full tide the deep and hearty love of the pastor for his flock.

The church was formed Aug. 19, 1866, antedating the organization of the city and the admission of the State into the union. Pastorates were brief in the early history of the work. With the location of the State capital churches multiplied, and when Mr. Gregory took charge in November, 1875, there were only fifty-four members and a small building mortgaged for $2,000. His business ability was soon manifest in extinguishing the debt and in rapidly improving conditions. In 1883, the membership having reached 225, the project of a new building was agitated, and in the autumn of 1886 the edifice stood complete, costing, with a beautiful pipe organ, $24,685. Of this all but $3,000 had been paid at the time of dedication.

In 1887 several members were spared to help organize Plymouth Church, and the mother contributed generously toward the purchase of lots and the erection of the house of worship. In 1890 other members were sent with the Godspeed of the mother church to form the Vine Street branch, and help was given in the purchase of land and in paying for the edifice. The same story was repeated in 1895 in the beginning of Butler Avenue Church. First has also aided largely the German Church, organized in 1889, and the Swedish, organized in 1896. The latter still worships in the basement of the First edifice.

The early records do not show fully the story of the work, but in the twenty-one years of Mr. Gregory's pastorate the contributions for home expenses have been $110,656 and for benevolence $32,828. The number received to membership has been 1,054, of which 941 have been welcomed by the present pastor. Of these 332 came on confession. Of the total accessions 496 have been dismissed and 86 have died. The present membership is 472; at one time it reached 500.

In the evening Rev. A. F. Sherrill, D. D., of Galesburg, for seventeen years pastor of First Church, Omaha, and familiar with all the history of early Congregationalism in Nebraska, made a felicitous address. Monday afternoon a rally of Congregational forces of the region was held, when representatives of State organizations, the press, the daughter churches, of educational, missionary and other interests testified to the valuable work of the church. In the evening all the resident members of the church and congregation, numbering nearly 600, were invited to sit at the banquet board. Seldom has there been a more delightful occasion. Members of the church who had cast in their lot with the new Congregational churches came back for a day of delight, and two hours of wit and wisdom followed the feast of good things. A silver plate with an etching of the church was presented to Mr. Gregory, the tribute of a grateful people to a beloved pastor. B.

TWO FORTHCOMING ANNIVERSARIES.

The exact date of the completion by Rev. B. F. Hamilton of a quarter of a century in the Eliot Church pulpit was Nov. 9. Plans for a celebration were then well under way, but the sudden death of Mr. C. W. Hill, the chairman of the committee of arrangements, caused a postponement of festivities until now. Next Sunday Dr. Hamilton will preach a historical sermon reviewing his twenty-five years' pastorate. On the following Wednesday a reception will be tendered him. This is the only co-pastorate covering as long a period as twenty-five years ever known in the denomination. Despite the severe depletions due to colonization and to natural causes, the membership of the church today—496—is as large as when Dr. Hamilton began his work.

Dr. McKenzie's anniversary sermon will be preached next Sunday morning and the exercises in the Sunday school will have a bearing on the occasion. On the Monday evening following a general parish reception will be held in the chapel.

DR. PLUMB'S PRESENTATION.

Owing to the comparatively recent celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the organization of the Walnut Avenue Church, whose life exceeds by only a few months Dr. Plumb's present pastorate, he intended to take little notice of his own personal anniversary, but his people were not disposed to let the month of January pass without commemorating the event. Quietly and vigorously they planned and carried out a presentation which took Dr. Plumb entirely by surprise. The annual meeting last Thursday night, which was unusually well attended, proceeded with the regular reports and routine business, after which Charles E. Aldrich took the floor and introduced a feature not on the program. Representing himself as commissioned to make specific charges against the pastor, whose face now began to assume a puzzled expression, he went on to accuse him of being faithful, sympathetic, devoted, and, in fact, of exhibiting all those traits which endear a pastor to his people and make him a power in the community.

Mr. Aldrich then brought forward a beautiful plush case, which when opened disclosed twenty-five twenty dollar gold pieces. These were arranged on a velvet background in such a way as to form the initials A. H. P. They had come fresh from the mint at Philadelphia. In addition a purse of $125 was presented, making the total gift $625 or twenty-five dollars for every year of service. Dr. Plumb responded in his own tender and felicitous way. Appropriate letters, recognizing Dr. Plumb's usefulness in every direction, were read from Dr. Arthur Little and Dr. Judson Smith, the latter one of Dr. Plumb's own parishioners.

The church this week is holding extra services, which Rev. C. I. Scofield of Northfield, formerly of Texas and a favorite co-laborer of Mr. Moody's, is conducting. The successful observance of this delightful anniversary and the prevalence in the church of a revival spirit are the best guarantees that the relations of pastor and people will continue to be as harmonious as in the past.

FORGERY AND LYING.

In 1890 a man who represented himself as a minister, David Martin by name, became pastor of the Congregational church at Cornish, Me. It seems probable that he came from a Baptist church in Michigan, where he bore the name of McGowan. In 1893 he was called to Cumberland Mills and was settled with that church by council. In March, 1895, the Cumberland Association of ministers, on investigation, found that he had never been ordained, that he had presented forged papers and had persistently lied about them. He claimed to have come from Scotland, where his credentials were dated. But the paper on which they were written had the mark of a manufacturer in Westbrook, of which town Cumberland Mills is a part. The handwriting was David Martin's, and one of the envelopes containing them bore this note from the postmaster: "This letter came under cover from Peak's Island, U. S., and is remailed by request." The association voted to expel him from membership because he had obtained standing in it and in the churches "by continuous misrepresentation and confessed falsehood." The resolutions of the association referring to the case were printed in The Congregationalist of March 21, 1895, and in several other papers.

David Martin shortly disappeared from Maine. Not long after Alexander S. McGowan presented himself before the Congregational church at McIndoes Falls, Vt., and, after preaching two Sundays, was engaged as permanent supply. It was only recently discovered that Alexander S. McGowan and David Martin are one and the same person. On New Year's Day the church voted to dismiss him, refusing to hear him again. At the demand of the officers, he offered his resignation, to take effect at once, stating that he did this to accept a larger field of labor. Strange as it may seem, it is said that after the exposure several of his admirers united in a flattering testimonial, which he took with him, and he has a scrap-book full of complimentary notices and letters from churches where he has preached. The Caledonian Association, at its regular session in St. Johnsbury, Jan. 12, passed the following resolution:

> Caledonia Association puts on record the fact that Alexander S. McGowan, known also as David Martin, did not at the time of his engagement by the church at McIndoes present his credentials to the conference committee nor to this association; and that neither body is responsible for his ministerial standing.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.

Yale.

The Senior address last week was by Mr. S. Knapp, Jr., on The Portrayal of Religion in Current Fiction. Mr. Knapp has been elected president of his class.——The third lecture of the Leonard Bacon Club was by Dr. W. S. Rainsford on Some of the Opportunities and Difficulties of a Clergyman's Life Today. The next will be given Feb. 11, by Dr. G. A. Gordon, on Phillips Brooks.——The Senior Class in sociology will accompany Professor Blackman to New York early next month to study methods and work.

Bangor.

Pres. W. D. Hyde of Bowdoin will give the annual address before the Rhetorical Society in May ——E. S. Rivard, '97, recently gave an interesting illustrated lecture on Venice, under the auspices of the committee on literary culture.——Jan. 13 the Senior Class had its final examination in the course of Old Testament Theology.——The Middle Class has begun elementary work in homiletics with Professor Sewall.——The Juniors have begun a course of 17 hours in Greek philosophy under Professor Paine. ——The members of the Senior Class have been assigned subjects for essays on important historical subjects connected with their regular work in church history.

Oberlin.

The anticipated lectures upon Japan by Rev. C. A. Clark, for several years Oberlin's missionary, were given last week.——The observance of the Week of Prayer is deferred a fortnight to avoid the confusion of the opening of the term. Many of the students join the churches and work earnestly at this season.

CONFERENCES AND ASSOCIATIONS.

MICH.—Grand Rapids Association decided at the fall session to hold four gatherings during the year. The first winter gathering took place at Hudsonville, Jan. 11, 12. The topics were: Three Essentials of a Good Christian Worker: (a) Truth, (b) Tenderness, (c) Tact; The Prayer Meeting—How Can We Make Better Use of It? Rev. Harry Appleton preached the sermon.

CLUBS.

MASS.—The Berkshire Club had as speakers at its meeting in Pittsfield Mrs. Booth-Tucker of the Salvation Army, and Rev. H. S. Johnson, a Baptist, and Rev. W. L. Tenney. E. S. Rogers, Esq., was elected president and A. R. Smith, Esq., secretary. The attendance at the banquet was large and many friends beside enjoyed the exercises later. The club is well sustained in its regular meetings and is unusually prosperous financially.

The Old Boston Club held its annual meeting at Hotel Vendome last Monday following the precedent of preceding years in having for guests the city pastors. They spoke with great freedom of the difficulties and problems of their work, and their addresses were of great interest.

NEW ENGLAND.

Boston.

The Ministers' Meeting will be omitted for the present, the resumption of the regular sessions being left with the committee of arrangements. Owing to the numerous special meetings of interest to ministers in the vicinity, the Monday gathering has not been largely attended of late.

Immanuel held its 47th annual meeting last week, 450 members being present. A pleasant reception preceded the roll call, and the business session concluded the meeting.

CHARLESTOWN.—First is held in fond remembrance by a large constituency, as shown by the recent roll-call. A good number who for various reasons had absented themselves manifested vigorous interest. A new manual and membership list shows well for the opening of the 265th year of the history of the church. By special vote at the recent annual meeting the A. B. C F. M. and C. H. M. S. will receive aid the present year. The devotional meetings are earnest and spiritual. The new pastor, Rev. C. H. Pope, is proving attractive to a growing congregation.

ALLSTON.—Last year was prosperous, and the new year begins hopefully, 21 new members being received Jan. 3, 14 on confession. Rev. J. O. Haarvig is pastor.

DORCHESTER.—Pilgrim held its annual meeting Jan. 12, with 275 present. Its growth has been remarkable in recent years. Its membership is nearly 450, with a Sunday school of about 400 and a branch with 80. It raised for all purposes last year nearly $15,000, of which about $2,000 were for benevolences and $4,500 for a new organ. The pastor, Rev. W. H. Allbright, D D, has been with this people for seven years and they have made a noble record.

Massachusetts.

REVERE.—First, at its annual meeting, had written reports from representatives of the different departments, showing the church in a flourishing condition. The meetings during the Week of Prayer were more largely atttended than for years. A deep spirit pervades the church. Revival meetings are conducted by the pastor, Rev. W. S. Eaton, every Sunday night. A large chorus leads the singing. Never have the Sunday evening audiences been so large as at present. The Pastor's Helper, a monthly publication, is a welcome visitor in many hundreds of homes in the parish.

MALDEN.—Maplewood. Rev. and Mrs. W. A. Evans have sustained a great loss in the recent death of their little son, Walter Harvey, a rarely attractive child, six and a half years of age. Their other child has also been seriously ill, but is now convalescent. Many losses by death have befallen this church the last year, but sorrow and sympathy have intensified Christian fellowship. The church has just been incorporated, the spiritual condition was never better, and all look forward to an earnest and successful period of aggressive work.

NEWTON.—Auburndale. A normal course of five talks has been arranged chiefly for the benefit of teachers in the Sunday school, although the invitation to attend is made general. Each talk is to deal with some principle of teaching and will be given by an expert. The speakers include Mr. J. W. McDonald of the State Board of Education, Mr. R. G. Huling, head master of the Cambridge English High School, and Prof. W. C. Boyden of the Boston Normal School.

GEORGETOWN.—Memorial has a balance in the treasury and no unpaid bills. The benevolences were $424 last year, an increase of $61. It was unanimously voted to extend indefinitely the period for which the present pastor, Rev. C. J. Tuthill, is engaged.

ARLINGTON asked for $2,000 the last Sunday of the year for recent repairs on the house of worship, which added 60 sittings to the audience-room besides providing for other improvements. The response was hearty and generous and freed the society from all indebtedness. Six recent additions, five by letter, are reported. Rev. S. C. Bushnell is pastor.

WORCESTER.—Piedmont reports 25 additions the past year. The annual church reception was held Jan. 15, with an attendance that filled the rooms. ——Pilgrim leads the city in the number of additions the past year, 78. On the debt $1,900 have been paid, and the year closed with a balance. The Sunday school is organized into six departments and has an average attendance of 483. The first year of Dr. Alexander Lewis's pastorate has just closed. ——A largely attended meeting at Adams Square, Jan. 15, appointed a committee on ways and means, with a view to organizing a new Congregational church in that locality. The project has the hearty indorsement of the Baptists, who have the only church there now.——The Reform Club celebrated its 21st anniversary Jan. 15. Over 1,500 persons have signed the pledge through its influence.

Brookfield at its annual roll-call had a large response. Eleven new members were added last year. A new piano has been purchased for the chapel. Rev. E. B. Blanchard is pastor.

Fairhaven.—At the annual meeting the church adopted resolutions appreciative of the earnest service of the pastor, Rev. Dorrall Lee, who is about to close his work, and extending to him kind wishes and sympathy.

Northampton.—Edwards. Great rejoicing followed the announcement last Sunday that Edward C. Bodman of New York has given $5,000 for a new organ. His father was a prominent member of the church and the son has always maintained a deep interest in its welfare.

Lenox.—Since May last Rev. A. Bouteiller of Pittsfield has held services every two weeks with French Protestants and has gathered an interesting audience. He is working under the auspices of the Massachusetts H. M. S. Several of his congregation are descendants of the Huguenots. A pleasant entertainment was given at the close of the work of the year.

The North Reading church receives $2,000 from the late Harriet Flint of Wakefield.——Pittsfield. Lenox and Great Barrington have joined the roll of churches which hold an annual meeting, with reports interspersed with social, musical and prandial exercises. They report good times at these annual gatherings, which, according to votes passed at all the meetings, appear now to have come to stay.

Maine.

Portland.—State Street. President Gates of Amherst made an admirable presentation of the Indian question, Jan. 13, under the auspices of the Woman's Maine Indian Association. That society supports a missionary for one of the tribes.——St. Lawrence Street. Mr. A. L. Blake has presented the church with a thousand dollar chime of bells for the new edifice rapidly nearing completion. The set consists of 10 bells and will be the only set in the city. Several beautiful memorial windows are also to be donated, one of them by the Y. P. S. C. E. and one by the Sunday school.

Bath.—Central. The pastor, Rev. A. Frederic Dunnels, teaches a large, newly-organized manual training class among the boys of his congregation for the moral value of such work and as a means of deepening interest in the church. He hopes that by thus bringing the work before the public it may ultimately be introduced into the public school system of the city.

New Hampshire.

Keene.—First. The annual reunion had an attendance of 306, while 40 absent ones sent messages. The new monthly, Congregational Work, enters 252 homes of this congregation. The Week of Prayer was marked by an unusual spirituality. The meetings continued every evening last week, the pastor, Rev. W. G. Poor, receiving ready assistance from his helpers. The ladies are filling a second barrel for a home missionary family at the front. The Sunday school begins the new year with a quiet enthusiasm and increased numbers and interest.

Marlboro.—Union meetings for two weeks with the Methodist church have been spiritually profitable. The Endeavor Society and Epworth League took a prominent part in the services As a result of this quickening, the churches have voted to engage the services of Rev. Ralph Gillam for an evangelistic campaign the first two weeks in March. Meanwhile the Congregational pastor, Rev. J. S. Colby, will preach specially to the young on every Sunday evening till the evangelist arrives.

Henniker.—Deacon Horace Childs, for many years an ardent supporter of the church, has given to the society the dwelling long rented for a parsonage. Though nearly 90 years old, and unable to hear a word of the public service, he is one of the most regular attendants on Sunday and at the midweek meeting.

Francestown has been sorely bereaved in the death of William R. Sawyer at the advanced age of 90. He was a man of great energy and a strong supporter of the church. Last June he and his wife celebrated the 61st anniversary of their marriage. She survives him, but now lies critically ill.

Center Harbor has received from the late T. C. Gordon a legacy of $400. At any time that the church ceases to exist it reverts to the N. H. Missionary Society.

Dunbarton.—The church held this year its first annual roll-call, about two-thirds of the membership of 100 responding. The reports were encouraging.

The benevolences of Lyme showed an increase last year, and those of Meriden amounted to $225. ——Special services in Rye, Atkinson, Barnstead and South Seabrook have resulted favorably, especially during the Week of Prayer.

Rhode Island.

Providence.—Plymouth holds special evangelistic meetings, following the Week of Prayer, during four evenings of each week.——Pilgrim had a profitable supper and roll-call. Responses were heard or read from a good proportion of the membership. Morning meetings during the Week of Prayer were conducted by the pastor, who used Dr. Gordon's Ministry of the Spirit as a text-book for devotional readings. At the evening services Bible readings were helpful.——Free Evangelical. Rev. J. H. Larry is preaching on The Saloon, Its Friends and Its Foes. A question box is used at each discourse. The down-town location of the church makes its work specially valuable.——Highland. The necessary legal steps for incorporation have been completed, and voluntary offerings with no rented seats support the work. The S. S. attendance last year averaged 114

Barrington.—The first roll-call and banquet was a great success, the majority of members responding. The church building has new electric lights and the parsonage a new furnace. The pastor, Rev. Norman Plass, gave an illustrated rendering of Ben Hur in the town hall last month, the proceeds of which were devoted to Christmas gifts for Western missionaries.

Cranston.—Edgewood is much encouraged by the general interest among all churches of the State in aiding its project of a new building. Rev. D. T. Torrey is pastor.

Pawtucket held two union meetings with the Free Baptist Church in the Week of Prayer. At the Christmas festival $35 were given to the Armenian Orphans' Fund.

Connecticut.

New Britain.—First. The receipts from Sunday collections last year were $2,005. The S. S. roll numbers 382.——South. A deficit of $1,500 was reported at the close of the year, and $1,200 of it were raised at the annual meeting, and the remainder is being subscribed by members of the church and parish.——Bethany (Swedish). Fifty persons have been added to membership during 1896, leaving the present membership 252. The late H. P. Strong was for 32 years a deacon of the church and one of its foremost supporters.

Meriden.—First. Forty-three have united with the church the past year, and the yearly reports give evidence of a flourishing condition, spiritually and financially. Rev. Asher Anderson is pastor.——Center. By the recent raising of $10,000 the church begins the new year free from debt. The Sunday evening service has been modified by adding more music, and abbreviating the sermon to an address conforming with the music in theme and treatment.

East Hartford.—First. The largest annual meeting since the organization of the church was held this year. It was voted that, as the first records of the church were in 1699, although it is probable that the church was organized in 1664, the 200th anniversary should be celebrated in 1899. The trustees were instructed to make an effort to clear the church of debt and make necessary repairs on the house and surroundings. The oldest living member joined in 1827.

Glastonbury.—The past year has been prosperous. More than enough pledges were received to pay the running expenses. The benevolences amounted to $2,025. Of the $2,229 pledged to raise the debt and make necessary repairs, $1,493 have been received. The new steam-heating plant cost about $800, and repairs and painting to the amount of $250 were done besides. It was decided to enlarge the choir gallery and redecorate the walls of the chapel.

Waterbury.—Second has had a year of great prosperity. The membership has increased nearly to the thousand mark, being 991. The various benevolent offerings were over $6,000, an increase of almost $1,000 in spite of hard times. Rev. Dr J. G. Davenport is pastor —— Third, although only five years old, is strong along all lines and has a present membership of 100, being a net gain for the year of 11. Rev. F. P. Waters is pastor.

Bethel held its usual reunion at the beginning of the year. Over 300 members took lunch together. Addresses were made by the pastor, Rev. H. L. Slack, and others upon the encouraging work of the year. Twenty eight members, all but two on confession, have been added during the year, and 255 during the present pastorate. The S. S. room has been enlarged and a kitchen added to the lecture rooms of the church during the autumn.

New Haven.—The branch of the Woman's Board of Missions met in Center Church, Jan. 12, and was addressed by Mrs. Nikambe of Bombay.——United. The Men's Club service was addressed last Sunday evening by Pres. W. J. Tucker of Dartmouth on Who Is Your Great Man?

Talcottville.—At the annual meeting the 30th anniversary was observed. The church has spent during its existence over $50,000, and its benevolences to date amount to $31,531, the largest sum expended in this way by any Congregational church in the county.

East Haddam.—Hadlyme. In the annual reports the totals are small, but the percentage of increase is large. The benevolences, $92, show an increase over last year of 25 per cent., and home expenses, $628, denote a reduction. Rev. F. C. H. Wendel is pastor.

Norwich.—Second. The reports presented at the annual meeting of the Ecclesiastical Society showed it to be in a prosperous condition. Seven gentlemen were admitted to membership, making the present number 75.

New London.—First has a S. S. membership of 425 and a C. E. roll of 113. During the 10 years of Dr. S. L. Blake's pastorate the net gain in membership has been 212.

Whitneyville added 13 on confession and four by letter last year. The Sunday school rejoices in possessing a new square piano.

A Men's Club was organized and maintained with interest last year in First Church, East Windsor. The benevolences were above the average.——A new parish house is in prospect in Third Church, Torrington.——Winchester spent $900 for repairs last year.——The Congregational, Methodist, Baptist and Advent pastors at Bristol are exchanging pulpits for a month.——Kent is practically quarantined on account of scarlet fever.——The Litchfield Sunday school has contributed $25 each to the Armenian cause and home missions.——Winsted is considering the starting of a new building fund.——By the acceptance of the call to West Woodstock by Rev. Frank Rand, Willington is once more left without a pastor.——Plainville has voted almost unanimously to return to the old system of selling the seats in preference to the free pew system.——West Torrington has voted to increase the salary of the pastor $100.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

Brooklyn.—Lewis Avenue reports steady growth. Losses have been more than counteracted by larger gains. The pastor is Dr. R. J. Kent.——Lee Avenue. Rev. J. B. Clark, the pastor, has been granted a three months' leave of absence, and is now traveling in southern California. He will visit various resorts of the Pacific coast, finally arriving at San Francisco, where he will remain for some time. Mr. Clark last June fell from his bicycle and sustained a compound fracture of the skull. He recovered sufficiently to resume his pulpit work, but his physicians advised a longer period of rest. He will doubtless return in full vigor to enter his seventh year of service here.

West Groton.—Rev. John Cunningham, the pastor, has just passed the 77th milestone of his life and is a remarkable example of a youthful man. He is greatly beloved by his people and respected by his brethren. He has been 30 years in his present pastorate.

Syracuse.—Danforth. This part of the city is being much moved by the revival conducted by Mr. and Mrs. Rees.——Geddes. The Men's Society has arranged a lecture course in which Dr. Edward Taylor was the opening speaker.

Binghamton.—Plymouth, pastorless for nearly four months, has extended a hearty call to Rev. Thomas Clayton, formerly of New Berlin, Ct. The church has been carefully kept together and shepherded by Dr. Edward Taylor.

Jamestown.—First is prospering under the pastoral care of Dr. A. L. Smalley, who entered upon his second year Jan. 1. The congregations are steadily growing and the church is well organized for aggressive work.

Lisle has completed the 100th year of its existence and is preparing to celebrate.——The work at People's Church, Buffalo, is so encouraging as to continue the special work of Rev. H. E. Gurney another week.——Cambria is holding special services for two weeks.

THE SOUTH.

District of Columbia.

Washington.—First held its adjourned annual meeting Jan. 14. The 16 societies reported the work as thoroughly organized and showing a gratifying growth. A committee was appointed to consider the expediency of introducing individual communion cups.

THE INTERIOR.

Ohio.

Cleveland.—Mt. Zion, under the efficient leadership of its new pastor, Rev. J. H. Moorland, finds its congregations largely increased and its S. S. rooms uncomfortably crowded.——The work of the Ohio and national H. M. Societies among Bohemians, Poles and Magyars is full of promise, and it is with great regret that the societies have been obliged to reduce the appropriation for the coming year 10 per cent., when every interest of this important work demands enlargement.——Archwood Avenue reopened its enlarged building with a week of special services, culminating Jan. 17. This is the oldest Congregational church in the city, having been organized in 1819. The new addition is 56 x 54 feet and includes a main S. S. room with nine classrooms and a pastor's study. The entire main floor can be opened together and gives a seating capacity of nearly 600. The space was fully occupied several times during the reopening week. The lower floor has large parlors, cloakrooms, a kindergarten-room, dining-room and kitchen. The building is heated throughout by steam. The entire cost of the improvements is $7,000. A balance of $1,200 remaining unpledged was promptly met with more than $100 additional, Jan. 10, after a sermon by Pres. C. F. Thwing and an address by Sec. J. G. Fraser. The present pastor is Rev. J. W. Hargrave, to whose courage and leadership this new building is largely due. The original building was erected when Mr. Hargrave was pastor of the church before, in 1879. ——Plymouth. Rev. L. L. Taylor has been confined to his home for several weeks by illness, and the pulpit has been supplied by Professors H. C. King and E. I. Bosworth of Oberlin.——Trinity held its January communion the Sunday following the Week of Prayer and received 18 new members on confession, a total of 35, nearly all heads of families.

Mansfield.—First devoted the day to the needs of Whitman College last week Sunday. Miss Virginia Dox presented the subject to large congregations, and though no collections were taken the immediate result was a contribution of over $300. The ladies pledged $100 and the C. E. Society the same amount in memory of the late pastor, Dr. Hubbell. Various members of the congregation gave the rest. Rev. E. B. Fairfield, the pastor, gives 100 volumes from his valuable library to Whitman, also defraying the expense of transportation to Walla Walla.

Steubenville.—The annual reports show the financial year to have been the best in the 21 years of the church. A steadily increasing spiritual growth is believed to account for it. An unusual proportion of men at the prayer meetings is encouraging. During this pastorate the church has been relieved of a long standing debt. The pastor is Dr. Joel Swartz

Rootstown had a good attendance at the annual roll-call and dinner. Fourteen persons were admitted to the church Jan. 13, seven on confession. The next week a collection was taken sufficient to pay the debt of the church and leave a balance. The Week of Prayer meetings were to be continued a second week. Rev. C. N. Queen is acting pastor.

Sandusky.—The past year has been the most hopeful in the history of the church. The S. S. gain is 109 and that of the C. E. Society 40. In spite of the hard times a large sum has been raised and all the national societies were remembered. The congregations continue large. Rev. C. A. Vincent is pastor.

North Bloomfield labors under the depressions usual in declining rural communities. The church held, Jan. 9, 10, a Bible Business Institute of four sessions, with helpful themes. The parts were taken mostly by laymen of different denominations. The attendance was large. Rev. C. N. Pond is pastor.

Toledo.—First. The departure of Rev. D. M. Fisk to St. Louis is a great loss to the city. He has had wide influence during his pastorate.——Central. By the resignation of Rev. Charles Hyde two important positions in the city are left vacant.

Lakeville.—Fifty-two persons joined the church recently, nearly all on confession. Old and young are responding and this whole farming community is being moved. No special meetings have been held.

Illinois.

Fall Creek.—German, Rev. G. L. Brakemeyer, pastor, reports gratifying progress, 126 members being received during 1896, all but five on confession. The congregations continue to increase. On improvements $300 were spent and $800 to diminish indebtedness. Lots have been purchased for a parsonage.

Indiana.

Glezen.—Hosmer. Rev. Thomas Smith has had a useful pastorate of six years in a needy home missionary field. The membership has increased from seven to 90, and the Sunday school taxes the capacity of the house. A parsonage has been erected. The spiritual influence of the church has effected a great reformation in a hitherto neglected community. Mr. Smith is the recipient of many gifts from the friends of home missions. He removes to Washington to secure advanced school privileges for his children.

Indianapolis.—Plymouth. The institute work for the winter is under headway. Prof. Frederick B. Starr of Chicago University is delivering a series of six lectures. Pres. B. T. Washington lectured recently for the church.——People's. Neighboring pastors are assisting Rev. O. D. Fisher in protracted meetings.

Terre Haute.—First. Rev. C. H. Percival, the new pastor, has begun work with good congregations. The friends of this historic church rejoice that the vacancy caused by Dr. J. H. Crum's resignation has been filled so soon. In benevolences and influence the church stands in the front rank.

Macksville.—Rev. John Harden enters upon his fourth year under encouraging conditions. He also supplies a Presbyterian out-station, and thus makes a field naturally weak self-supporting. Mrs. Harden is a valuable help among the young people and in the Sunday school.

Alexandria.—Prof. J. C. Smith is lecturing among neighboring churches on Jamaica, where he and his wife were formerly missionaries. His purpose is to increase the building fund.

Bremen has been pastorless for some time, and has borne a discouraging financial strain. Services are again resumed. Rev. H. D. Leland, a Presbyterian, is the supply.

Michigan.

Grand Rapids.—South changed pastors during the year, but has maintained its membership, increased its Sunday school, and looks forward with new hope, under the leadership of Rev. F. E. York. ——Smith Memorial enjoys the ministrations of Rev. F. G. Blanchard of the class of '96, Oberlin Seminary. He uses his own printing press with good results. A gain of 20 in membership is noted and the church presses toward self-support.——Plymouth, whose pastor, Rev. R. M. Higgins, has gathered and organized a church at Conklin, has held its ground in membership, paid off part of its debt and met its obligations. Its share in the benevolences is $116 to home and foreign missions. ——East has moved its site a mile west and erected a neat house recently dedicated, in the building of which its pastor, Rev. W. H. Underhill, labored for three months with his own hands. Its membership has increased to 50 and its outlook was never so good. It starts the new year with large accessions.

Port Huron.—First closes the year with large accessions, and has dismissed 25 to form the new Ross Memorial Church. The church has raised and expended a large amount and closes the year with a balance. Rev. H. R. Williams has been called as an associate pastor. Rev. Thomas Chalmers is pastor. ——Three new mission schools have been added to the Congregational forces here, one provided with a building. There are in the city three organized churches with pastors, two parsonages, one church house, two other mission chapels and seven Sunday schools.

Bay City.—The Week of Prayer was observed with much interest. About 30 of the members met with the Essexville church in a communion service recently, and are holding meetings occasionally to revive this struggling work so long without a leader. Rev. C. T. Patchell is pastor.

Hart shows good progress during the year, 20 members having been added. The Ladies' Auxiliary contributed $275.

Conklin, organized nine months ago, has much more than doubled its 14 original members.——Special efforts in Addison and Stanton are effecting good results.——Romeo and Grass Lake find all bills paid for last year and a balance left.——St. Clair received 39 accessions, all but two on confession, at the last communion.

Wisconsin.

Clinton reports a year of progress in every department, especially in the midweek prayer meeting and Sunday school. The net increase in members was 21. This church sustains two extra neighborhood prayer meetings. The spiritual condition was never better.

ST. LOUIS.—Hope. The services begun during the Week of Prayer have been continued for a second week under the leadership of Dr. W. M. Jones, pastor of Hyde Park Church. The presence of the Holy Spirit has been manifest.

Iowa.

GRINNELL.—At Newbury, a little village a few miles to the north, the people are rejoicing in the completion of an attractive and convenient house of worship. For 16 years or more they have met in a schoolhouse. The church owes its existence to the labors of the late President Magoun, who often preached for it and used his influence in its behalf. From a series of special meetings now in progress much is hoped. Beginning the last of January, the Grinnell church will hold special meetings for which preparations have been made with great care. A series of college prayer meetings is also planned.

NASHUA.—This church is united under the energetic ministry of Rev. H. C. Scotford, who began his second year as pastor Dec. 20. The congregations have filled the house of worship, and the advisabilty of enlarging or of building a new one is suggested. Forty-seven members were added in 1896, many of them heads of families. The roll now numbers about 247. The annual meeting was held Jan. 7, and reports revealed progress in spiritual, financial and social lines.

MONTICELLO.—Four churches are reaping the fruits of union revival services by Evangelists Hartsough and Haudenschield. The recent additions to membership aggregate 150, of whom the Congregational church has received 46. Many heads of families are included. The aid of the young people's societies has been a marked feature.

IOWA CITY.—The pastor, Dr. M. A. Bullock, has been quarantined for three weeks on account of his child's illness with scarlet fever. Meanwhile the pulpit was supplied by members, and the Week of Prayer was observed as usual. For nine years Dr. Bullock has served this church, an important one because located in a university town.

MASON CITY.—During the three years' pastorate of Rev. F. G. Wilcox 175 members were added to the church, the net gain being 115. Rev. C. H. Rogers of Kenosha, Wis., began pastoral work here Jan. 3, Mr. Wilcox having accepted a call to Monson.

EXIRA.—Rev. H. L. Wissler, the pastor, has developed a country preaching station into a church of 32 members, six others standing pledged to unite. It has not yet been recognized by council.

KINGSLEY.—An ingathering of 19 members came at the close of a series of meetings, in which the pastor, Rev. G. A. Conrad, was assisted by Rev. R. W. Jamison of Sioux City.

AURELIA raised in 1896 for all purposes, including repairs, improvements and payments on parsonage, $1,100. Rev. B. L. Webber has two out-stations in the country.

Second Church, Ottumwa, Rev. J. R. Beard, pastor, in 1896 received 65 new members.——The family of Rev. A. G. Washington, pastor at Blencoe, now occupies the parsonage, just completed.——Bethlehem Church, Davenport, has purchased a pipe organ.——Since the revival meetings at Newell, conducted by Evangelist F. B. Smith, 48 members have united. Rev. W. G. Johnston is pastor.——Special meetings are in progress at Chester Center, Rev. C. W. Stark of Genoa Bluffs assisting the pastor, Rev. J. K. Shultz.

Minnesota.

ALEXANDRIA.—The Week of Prayer was observed with the week following in special meetings. Much interest developed. The work on the circuit, under the pastoral care of Rev. G. F. Morton and supported in part by individuals of the Alexandria Church, is prosperous. Mr. Morton preaches in six localities. In one an organization will be effected at once.

PRINCETON observed with much profit the Week of Prayer. It gave $150 last year to missions, and has just purchased a new piano for the Sunday school. On a recent Sunday one of the leading merchants took a stand as a Christian.

Kansas.

ARKANSAS CITY.—Pilgrim. At the annual business meeting reports from all departments were gratifying. Each has met its obligations and closed the year with a balance. The church year began with a new pastor and a new congregation. The acquaintance has ripened into a friendship mutually beneficial, and a year of prosperity has bound pastor and people closely to each other. A unanimous call was extended to Mr. Shaw to become permanent pastor, which he accepted, and the church installed him Jan. 6. After prayer by the moderator, a number of short addresses were made, all by members of the church family, and for that reason the service was peculiarly tender and impressive.

KANSAS CITY.—Pilgrim is enjoying a weekly Bible study, conducted by the pastor, and is enlarging its influence in the community by opening a reading-room in its building.——Chelsea Place pledged $100 Dec. 20, to pay all deficits to its former pastor, Rev. W. B. Fisher, whose health has obliged him, since last summer, to take secular work. Mr. Fisher still preaches for the church on alternate Sunday evenings.——Bethel is vigorous in its spiritual work among the unchristianized masses living on the bottom lands between the two Kansas Cities.

AXTELL has become so weakened by removals that the few remaining members have decided to disband, and have given a deed of the property to the C. C. B. S. During the entire 15 years of its often pastorless existence a Sunday school has been maintained. The spiritual work has been excellent at all times.

WHITE CLOUD, Rev. P. B. Lee, pastor, is self-supporting, and is constantly gaining in strength and influence for good. The field is a difficult one on account of the long absence, till recent years, of vigorous Christian effort. A new sentiment is awakening in the community in favor of Sabbath keeping.

ALTON, which has had no pastor since September, vigorously maintains its work by lay effort. It has a Sunday school and C. E. meeting and a live mid-week prayer meeting. The Ladies' Society is taking this time of comparative freedom from expense to put the building in excellent repair.

SYCAMORE.—State Evangelist Veazie began revival services Dec. 31. A large and interested congregation greeted him. This church is mainly supported by gifts from ladies connected with Plymouth Church, Brooklyn.

JUNCTION CITY.—A Y. P. S. C. E. of 18 members has been organized, and the spiritual interest continues. The church has provided systematically for all expenses and is giving gratifying evidence of renewed life.

Salina is enjoying a quiet revival, resulting in conversions.——Haven has recently painted its building. Systematic effort has nearly extinguished a debt, and the church is progressing spiritually.——The pastor at Valencia preaches also at Willard, where no other religious services are held, and much interest is manifested.——By recent arrangement, Rev. H. L. Marsh of Oneida will also supply at Capioma.

Nebraska.

WAVERLY, which has been supplied for three or four years by Professor Lowe of the Wesleyan University, has united with the local M. E. church for a season of special meetings, under the lead of Rev. G. J. Buck.

North Dakota.

OBERON.—The church enters upon the new year in a prosperous condition. The membership has been increased. The benevolences, amounting to over $114, are far ahead of any previous year and cover the objects represented by our six societies. The "parish library," started in September to mark the 10th anniversary of the organization of the church, has over 100 bound books and is now open to the public. Books and magazines for this library are solicited and may be sent to Rev. O. P. Champlin, pastor.

GARDNER.—Rev. N. P. McQuarrie is holding a series of evangelistic meetings which are accomplishing much good, though the work has been retarded by deep snow and severe cold. Rev. E. H. Stickney has assisted.

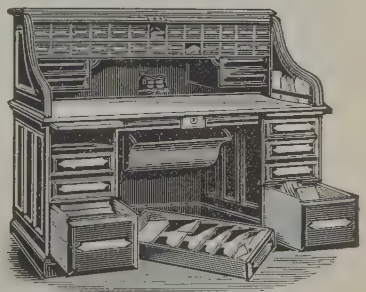
DON'T WORRY!



Do you remember the noisy rooster that disturbed the slumber of Carlyle? "It isn't the noise of his crowing that disturbs me," said Carlyle; "it is lying awake expecting him to crow."

Any day now you are liable (in the present crowded condition of your desk) to overlook some important note or mislay some needed paper, or forget some vital matter. Is the anxiety and worry and risk worth while, when you can escape it all by owning one of these Cutler desks?

See the combinations in this ingenious arrangement: 26 pigeonholes with patent sliding box fronts, combination stenographic filing drawer, combination letter index filing drawer, patent duplicate inkstand, flying blotter, tilting waste receptacle (dispensing with basket), pen racks on drawer fronts, stamp drawers, adjustable compartment partitions, etc.

The writing surface is laid in solid white maple with a parquetry border of cherry. It is a very effective combination. The desk itself is a marvel of convenience, and will be worth five times its cost to the average business man.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

Reports fail to indicate any marked improvement in the movement of merchandise, but men who are in a position to note the first throbs of returning animation are very pronounced in their opinions that the country is at the threshhold of a great and enduring period of prosperity. The stock market, which always discounts coming events, has ruled exceedingly strong, and Wall Street men as a class are bullish and very hopeful of the future.

Hence, while trade has not yet started up to any extent, it will probably be but a few weeks before the demand will assume very satisfactory proportions. Collections continue somewhat slow, and this fact is apt to bias the judgment of many business men as to the situation. Already jobbers in the large cities report an increased demand for dry-goods, boots, shoes, hats and hardware for spring delivery. Some salesmen on the road are also sending in very fair orders.

Another favorable factor is the larger purchases of wool by Eastern manufacturers. Cotton goods, however, continue unsatisfactory in price and movement. The cure of the cotton goods situation appears to be a period of vigorous curtailment of production, steps towards which are now being taken. In iron and steel a better feeling is reported. While there have been few actual changes, there is not the apathy on the part of consumers which was so noticeable during December, and there seems to be more of a disposition to consider purchases. The production of pig iron continues to increase from month to month.

The increase in the Treasury's stock of gold, at a time when it usually falls off because of gold exports, is a factor of great significance and importance at the present time, so also is the large international balance of trade in our favor. The latter is in the vicinity of $140,000,000, and constitutes a broad basis for national prosperity. In conclusion, it can be stated that there is every indication of a rising market for security values and a very strong feeling with regard to the copper stocks on the Boston Stock Exchange.

the New Year's prayer meeting as many different persons took part as there were minutes in the hour.——Plymouth. At the annual meeting of the society the receipts of 1896 were reported as exceeding the expenses, for the first time in several years.

OAKLAND.—The annual gathering of pastors and their families in the suburbs on the east side of the bay was held at the seminary New Year's Day with large attendance and hearty enjoyment.——First held a prayer meeting on New Year's morning, 400 being present.

During the recent vacation of Rev. E. W. Stoddard, the women of the Martinez church repaired the parsonage.——North Church, Berkeley, paid $200 on its debt last year.——Rev. J. R. Knodell, recently of San Bernardino, helped Rev. William W. Scudder at Alameda during the Week of Prayer.——Twenty-six persons have joined the church at Tulare during the last year.

Washington.

SPRINGDALE dedicated a meeting house, Jan. 10, free of debt, Rev. E. J. Singer preaching the sermon. This church is within seven miles of the early foreign mission station of Rev. Messrs. Cushing Eells and E. Walker—Tshimakain, now known as Walker's Prairie.

SPOKANE.—Second added 49 members last year, 38 on confession, bringing the membership to 167. The church debt has been reduced $500. The Congregational church membership of the city increased 40 per cent. during 1896.

The annual reports of the Medical Lake church, Rev. J. D. Jones, pastor, show a net gain of nine members. The Ladies' Aid raised $199.

MR. MOODY'S PITHY SAYINGS.

ON THE TREMONT TEMPLE PLATFORM.

I pity the minister who has to go outside the Bible to get subjects to draw a crowd.

If God doesn't use me here in Boston to help the churches my mission will be a failure.

There never was a time in my life when I believed so strongly in the necessity of regeneration in man—being born in the Spirit.

Don't be cast down. If you know any hopeful thing go and tell it to everybody you know. If you know anything discouraging go and tell it to the Lord.

I say to you here, and I say it in love, that nine-tenths of the church members are without power. I don't say they are not Christians, but I do say they have no power.

There are Bostonians who have not yet learned that Jesus is risen. They do not understand that he has come out of the grave to draw all men unto him.

A COUGH should not be neglected. "Brown's Bronchial Troches" are a simple remedy and give immediate relief. Avoid imitations.

AS A MATTER OF PRECAUTION.—A prudent man will, simply as a matter of precaution, keep a bottle of Adamson's Botanic Cough Balsam in his house. For coughs and all throat and lung troubles it is both a preventive and a cure. Sold by all druggists.

But the Wonderful Dr. Greene's Nervura Made Him Well.

Charles H. Stevens, South Effingham, N. H., says:—"I was about prostrated in health, extremely nervous, limbs stiff in the joints, my bowels were bloated badly, and my breathing was terrible. I could not stoop without losing my breath. In fact I was almost a complete wreck, and could do but little work of any kind.

CHARLES H. STEVENS, ESQ.

"I commenced to take Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy, and at the end of one week I had lessened in girth about my bowels two inches and now my girth is five inches less, and I am able to do a full day's labor. I tell you, if it had not been for Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy I should have been dead before this time, and I can therefore give this wonderful remedy the highest praise"

If constipated, use Dr. Greene's Cathartic Pills with the Nervura. Dr. Greene, 34 Temple Place, Boston, Mass., the most successful physician in curing nervous and chronic diseases, can be consulted free, personally or by letter.

WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING.

CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, JAN. 15.

Miss Kyle, field secretary of the board, presided, and read 2 Cor. 4. An echo from the meeting of the previous Friday had rung in her ears, "In order to win others to Jesus we must first win them to ourselves," leading her to speak of the winning power of the Christian life, as manifested in the Christian's daily life, in the part of missionary service which is performed here at home and in the lives and work of missionaries in the foreign field. The personal power of the missionary was illustrated by the case of one in Japan who bore the discomforts of a disagreeable journey with so much patience and serenity that a non-Christian looker-on came the next morning to purchase a copy of the Bible, the book whose teachings had made this woman what she was; also by Miss Morrill's early experience in China when she said, "I cannot talk to the women, but they smile at me and I smile back."

The calendar topic for the day was Prayer for Missions in Turkey, and reports were given from different stations. Mrs. J. K. Browne read a letter from Mrs. Barnum of Harpoot, in which she spoke of the orphans, from 15,000 to 20,000, in their field and of the two houses which have been hired for their use, one for the boys, the other for the girls, in that city. Mrs. Barnum and Mr. Ellis are a special committee to look after these children. Miss Bush has found great occasion for anxiety concerning such children in her visits to Egin and other places. Dr. and Mrs. Thom and Mr. and Mrs. Larkin had arrived at Mardin, during the latter part of the journey Dr. Thom traveling by a different route from the others, because the shorter route threatened so much danger to him. Mrs. Thom had courageously volunteered to make this part of the journey alone, when upon the eve of her setting out Mr. and Mrs. Larkin unexpectedly joined her.

Miss Lamson spoke of the school work as going on regularly in the midst of so many unusual demands, and read a letter from Miss Daniels of Harpoot, written with a "heart full of joy at the way in which the Lord has cared for our school." They were first trying the experiment of self-government in the college, and so far it had worked well. New members join the Christian Endeavor Societies almost every week. Miss Daniels spoke of Miss Emma Barnum's efficient help and of Miss Seymour as having "the very hardest work, because all the women go to her with every need." Miss Lamson also read a letter from Mrs. Raynolds of Van, who is now in Ooroomiah and doing what she can for Armenians who have taken refuge there.

Mrs. Fairchild read a letter from Miss Gleason at Hasskeuy, who "would not change her place and work with any one." In the house which was looted by a cruel mob she and Miss Cull have re-established housekeeping as well as they could, and are dispensing comfort as they may to the depressed, stricken people about them. She says, "If we can only help them spiritually, how happy we shall be! Do pray earnestly for this."

BIOGRAPHICAL.

REV. JOHN H. WORCESTER, D. D.

Dr. Worcester died at Burlington, Vt., Jan. 15, in the eighty-fifth year of his age. He was the son of Rev. Leonard Worcester, and was born at Peacham, Vt., May 28, 1812. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1833, was a tutor at Dartmouth from 1835 to 1836, and after studying divinity was ordained as pastor of the Second Congregational Church at St. Johnsbury, Vt., in 1839. In 1847 he became pastor of the First Church at Burlington, Vt., which he served for seven years. After leaving the active ministry he conducted for several years a select boarding school for young ladies. He received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from the University of Vermont in 1866. Dr. Worcester had, in a marked degree, many of the traits of the family to which he belonged. Of strong intellectual powers, his preaching was characterized by great vigor and grasp of truth. A strict logician, his sermons were most convincing and were yet marked by deep tenderness of feeling. He was greatly beloved and honored both as pastor and as citizen by the people among whom he had dwelt for a full half-century. Dr. Worcester was father of the late Prof. John H. Worcester of Union Theological Seminary, whose death in the prime of life deprived the church of one who gave promise of great eminence as a theo logian.

CHARLES H. FORD.

Mr. Ford, who died Jan. 8, was born of missionary parents in Syria in 1856. He was principal for thirteen years of the Calhoun School, Chicago, and as a teacher was held in high honor. He was a member of Union Park Church and interested in reforms of every kind. He was an ardent student of science. His highest ambition was to be useful and his daily life was an exhibition of the spirit of the kingdom of God.

Deaths.

The charge for notices of deaths is twenty-five cents. Each additional line ten cents, counting eight words to a line. The money should be sent with the notice.

BARROWS—In New Bedford, Jan. 10, Deacon Isaac N. Barrows, in his 82d year. For sixty-three years he had been an active and efficient Christian worker, and for more than twenty-five years he was deacon of the Trinitarian Church. He was of a sunny temperament and endeared himself to all who came in contact with him.

DICKERMAN—In Newton, Jan. 10, at the home of her niece, Mrs. D. B. O. Bourdon, after a brief illness, Mary Ives Tuttle, widow of Henry G. Dickerman of Mount Carmel, Ct., aged 76 yrs.

LEAROYD—In Danvers, Jan. 15, John S. Learoyd, for thirty years superintendent of the Maple Street Sunday school and prominent for many years in the Boston Superintendents' Union, aged 64 yrs.

WAITE—In Brattleboro, Vt., Jan. 17, Lucretia E. Waite, aged 73 yrs. She was one of the oldest members of the Third Church and a woman of strong character.

WILDER—In Wellesley Hills, Jan. 13, Mary E., wife of Charles T. Wilder.

LAST SUNDAY IN BOSTON PULPITS.

The International Arbitration Treaty furnished the theme for a number of preachers, and their utterances concerning it were uniformly emphatic in its praise and favorable to speedy action by the Senate. Dr. Reuen Thomas of Brookline felt that the two governments should act in the matter as two individuals of intelligence and not as pugilists or bullies. Rev. A. A. Berle, D. D., of Brighton, considered it a particularly bright omen in contrast to the present condition of war-burdened Europe.

Naturally the evangelistic labors of Messrs. Moody, Jones and Murphy occasioned pulpit comment. Dr. Lorimer at Tremont Temple, Rev. I. J. Lansing at Park Street and Rev. Peter MacQueen of Somerville spoke hearty words of praise, though Dr. Lorimer justly condemned wholesale charges of crime against church officers and members unsupported by facts. On the other hand, at least two Unitarian clergymen, Rev. L. W. Sprague and Rev. E. E. Hale, D. D., deprecated the probable effects of such abnormal religious movements, while another Unitarian, Rev. John Cuckson, admitted that certain persons were thereby reached and blessed. An Episcopalian rector in Winchester, Rev. J. W. Souter, said that the rescue idea which these evangelists make prominent is quite the opposite of the Episcopal idea of the religious life as a growth, and that even if many desirable results follow the campaign there should be no abatement of the normal work of the church.

Rev. A. S. Gumbart, D. D., a prominent Roxbury Baptist, criticised Ian Maclaren's creed now being circulated by the Brotherhood of Christian Unity, and said that the implied teachings of many of Maclaren's stories are anti-Scriptural. A new congregation, mainly of Back Bay people, is being gathered at Steinert Hall on Boylston Street by Rev. S. R. Fuller, who was recently deposed, at his own request, from the Episcopal Church, by Bishop Lawrence. Dr. Fleischer, the liberal Jewish rabbi, invited to his pulpit a Unitarian clergyman, Rev. S. M. Crothers—a somewhat exceptional action on the part of a Jewish rabbi. Rev. E. A. Horton, D. D., spoke to the audience of young men that gathers every week at the Y. M. C. Union concerning Benjamin Franklin. At the Lincoln House, one of the South End college settlements, Hon. T. J. Gargan, prominent in Boston politics, inaugurated a series of proposed Sunday afternoon talks to the working classes by an address on Good Citizenship.

TIDINGS FROM OUR ARMENIAN ORPHANS' FUND.

Amount received during the week ending Tuesday noon, and acknowledged in detail by individual receipts	$582.96
Previously acknowledged	21,401.87
Total	$21,984.83

The following letter, dated at the Bible House, Constantinople, Dec. 28, 1896, and written by Rev. George F. Herrick, D. D., is the first full report we have received of the disposition and reception of our Orphans' Fund. It will be eagerly read by the hundreds of persons in this country, who contributed to the fund:

> We have watched with deep interest the rapid growth of The Congregationalist's fund for Armenian orphans. The appeal these poor children have made has found a response which means something in the line of applied Christianity from England, Germany, Switzerland and France, as well as from those in our own land who have so generously and so promptly responded to your appeal.
> The first $500 you sent went to Harpoot, and the next $1,000 went in answer to a pathetic appeal from Bitlis. Since then Harpoot and Sivas have been taken up by German and Swiss friends; Cæsarea and Oorfa had already been largely aided from Germany; Brousa is, we expect, to be taken up in the spring by the Swiss. The sum in our hands this morning was something over 3,000 Turkish liras [a lira is $4.40], besides the $550 designated to Oorfa. The balance, over 3,000 liras, will be used here. I trust that through you the generous givers, who have made their own Christmas happy in thus remembering the Lord's poor children, will receive the thanks of all the missionaries and of thousands of children and of their widowed mothers, whose New Year will be made happy by these gifts. The large sum has been divided as follows, and I have had the great pleasure of sending an unusual Christmas and New Year's greeting to nine of our interior stations. I have put the missionaries to whom the money has been sent in direct communication with you, and in due time you will hear from them:
> Van, 600 liras.
> Marash, 400 liras.
> Mardin, 300 liras.
> Aintab, 300 liras.
> Hadjin, 100 liras.
> Bitlis, 400 liras.
> Marsovan, 400 liras.
> Erzroom, 300 liras.
> Brousa, 200 liras.

EVANGELISTS IN BOSTON.

The impressions made by newspaper reports of the addresses of some who are now conducting evangelistic meetings in Boston are a grief to not a few earnest Christians, as a number of letters we are receiving give evidence. One of these, a young pastor in a New England city, says:

> Really I am convinced that they are doing a work greatly to be deplored, and putting upon the churches a burden of discouragement and abuse which they can ill afford to carry. The denunciation of the churches, the vulgarity of thought and expression, all reach to the uttermost parts of New England. As yet it is to be doubted whether their gospel message, much less any strong spiritual influences, have forced their way across the Charles River. Certainly these are the last things one hears discussed in our city as men speak together about the workers in Boston.

An Argument for Business Men.—The average business man does not hesitate a moment on the question whether it is wise to have a telephone, an office boy, printed stationery, etc., for the better conduct of his business, and yet he is satisfied to do his business at a poor, inconvenient desk, where the chances of error in the confusion of papers is very great. There is not a business man in this city who will not be interested in the latest desk offered by the Paine Furniture Co. in another column.

WHAT MR. MOODY SAYS

ON THE TREMONT TEMPLE PLATFORM.

I'd rather have a drop of God's power than all the intellect in Boston.

Don't say you're too weak. Say you're too lazy. That's what's the trouble.

If you will tell us how to be more useful you are just the men to go in on that line.

I have little sympathy with the idea that God gives us eternal life and then starves it out of us.

The world is looking out for the best things, and what we want is to show them that the religion of Christ is the best in the world.

Work without love is like a clock without hands. You may put it in a golden case and set it in diamonds. It will not be worth anything.

A Scotchman said it took two to convert him. He explained that the two were the Almighty and himself. "Well, what did you do?" "Well, I did all I could against it and the Lord did the rest."

Men are trying to save themselves by the law. They say that if they do the best they can it will come out all right. That is true in one sense, because if you do the best you can you lay hold on eternal life.

I hope every man who is living a double life in Boston will either be converted or get out of the church. . . . If there is one man in the church tearing down as much as others are building up what are you gaining?

If no one were to be saved except on his faith that he was worthy there would never be another soul saved in this world. Christ has not promised to deal with those that are worthy, but with those that are unworthy.

Some people seem to think that drunkenness and licentiousness are the crowning sin. The crowning sin is unbelief. All the wretchedness, misery and woe of the world has come through the door of unbelief. May God sweep it out!

Sometimes I've been asked to go into some dark room to get messages from the dead. I say no, thank you. I'm not going to dishonor the Holy Ghost by sneaking into some room and turning down the gas. I've got the Holy Ghost and the Book.

A man said they had had a great revival in his church.

"Have you?" I asked. "And how many have been taken in?"

"O," was the reply, "we have not taken any in; we have put out a lot."

There are Christians who have to do a lot of climbing. They go on the low level all their life and in the evening of it they have a lot of climbing to do. That is what grace is given for—to lift us to the high level where the air is clear and where you get better views.

I have just received a letter asking when I'm going to pitch into the Catholics. Well, I'll tell you; just as soon as all the Protestants are converted, but I'm afraid it won't be this week, and at present we've got enough to do to attend to our own business.

Some people think they are to get grace enough at one meeting to last a lifetime. I heard a man say that he hoped to get enough out of that series of meetings to last him a lifetime. I told him he might as well expect to get enough at breakfast to last him a lifetime.

When Tired Out
Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

Dr. M. H. HENRY, New York, says: "When completely tired out by prolonged wakefulness and overwork it is of the greatest value to me. As a beverage it possesses charms beyond anything I know of in the form of medicine."

The Standard of Excellence

The average woman cannot discriminate justly between machines, so far as their mechanical construction is concerned, but she can always wisely judge their work.

ALL THE ESSENTIAL QUALITIES OF A FAMILY SEWING-MACHINE ARE MOST PERFECTLY COMBINED IN . . .

SIMPLICITY—so it can be easily adjusted, and won't get out of order.

SPEED—so that it will do the most work with the least effort.

STABILITY—so that it will wear the longest with the least repairs.

STYLE—so that it will be an ornament to the home.

SINGER WORK IS ALWAYS GOOD WORK.

This is why Singer Machines maintain their supremacy all over the world, making the Singer trade-mark a reliable guarantee of perfection. . . . .

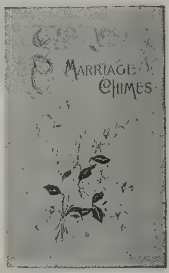
Marriage Chimes

For True Lovers.

Compiled by M. C. Hazard, Ph. D. Pp. 98. 75c.

This dainty little book contains some of the choicest poems in the language on Love, Marriage and Home.



It also has six full-page emblematic drawings with corresponding tail-pieces by Ipsen. A handsome steel engraved wedding certificate on parchment paper is bound into the book if desired, though it is also furnished without it. Bound in white and gold, gilt edges, with cover design of orange blossoms and marriage bells.

It is equally appropriate for a wedding souvenir or a wedding anniversary gift. Pastors will find it the most acceptable souvenir and certificate combined that has ever been issued at a moderate price.

The Book of The Pilgrimage

An Appreciation from

The Literary World.

"Our next-door neighbor, if we ought not to say our associate, The Congregationalist, with whom the LITERARY WORLD has lived in the relation of a happy family through parts of at least two generations, made a pilgrimage to England and Holland last summer in search of the historical and picturesque, and found both, as many well-filled columns of its spacious issues testified at the time, and as an elegantly made quarto book of about a hundred and fifty pages and many half-tone illustrations, just published, complete by itself, abundantly bears witness. Here is the story of it all, as told by the editors, and some others, with portraits and autographs in facsimile, and view after view of towns, cathedrals, chapels, rectories, deaneries, colleges, manor-houses, and other spots dear to the New Englander in Old England, and especially to the descendants of those who 'came out' of the old Mother Church of England two hundred and fifty years ago or more, and some of whom now seem to be looking back wistfully as if they felt like returning. Certainly they found it pleasant enough, judging by these pages, to turn back the page of history, and, so far as possible, that of experience, and refresh imagination with observation, by seeing with their own eyes the scenes made forever memorable by the words and deeds of their forefathers and their associates in the times gone by. It is not every weekly journal that can organize and carry out so successfully such a jaunt as this, and few that have tried the jaunt have enshrined it in anything like so handsome a form as this souvenir."

DURING the next week in hundreds of churches appropriate notice will be taken of Christian Endeavor Day, which falls on Feb. 2 and marks the completion of sixteen years since the first society was founded in Portland. We have only to quote the most recent figures to show what a tremendous development this vine of the Lord's planting has had. The official enrollment of the societies in December showed the number of members to be 2,836,740. There were then 47,279 societies. During the last year for which figures are obtainable 231,900 young people joined the evangelical churches of the United States from the Y. P. S. C. E. Since 1889 the churches have received a grand total of 1,048,235 members from this source. Though having wheels of energy and enthusiasm, and driven by the zeal of youth, the Christian Endeavor car has not moved forward apart from the agency of the Holy Spirit. Those who know most concerning its growth are convinced not only of its divine origin, but also of divine guidance since its formation. The illustration is found—aside from the immense amount of good directly accomplished in individuals and in churches—in the rise and development of various lines of effort now carried forward in the name of Christian Endeavor, such as the missionary and good citizenship movements. These did not originate in any central office, but by the suggestion of the Spirit in the hearts of young people loyal to Christ their leader.

There seems to have been a significant contrast between the interdenominational missionary rallies held Jan. 15 in Chicago and New York. The Auditorium in the former city was crowded in every part with an enthusiastic throng. Carnegie Hall in New York presented a discouraging array of empty seats. In both meetings the character and talent of the speakers were calculated to draw great audiences. The addresses in New York were not less impressive than those in Chicago, and certainly as a whole were more pertinent to the occasion. We notice that Chicago papers point to the meeting in that city as evidence that interest in missions is increasing. Some New York papers argue from the Carnegie Hall meeting that the cause of missions is losing its hold on the people. In all probability New York Christians are as interested in missions as those in Chicago. The true inference, which churches, not less than business and benevolent enterprises, need to reflect on, is that the best cause and the best men united will not succeed without judicious advertising. With it weak causes and bad men often command public attention and control public action. The churches still underestimate the value of the newspapers and of men who know how to put the work of the churches before the people.

The letter from Dr. Bradley on another page expresses a conviction shared by many, as shown in recent letters received by us, that the expenses of the Congregational Home Missionary Society ought to be substantially reduced, and can be without impairing the efficiency of its administration. It ought not, in these times, to require from $80,000 to $90,000, in addition to amounts expended by auxiliaries, to gather and distribute the annual receipts of the society. Only urgent necessity could justify a steady annual increase of expenses in the face of an accumulating debt and heavy reduction in appropriations for the field. We understand that the directors now realize this condition, and have decided to reduce the expenses of administration for the coming year, beginning April 1, by about $20,000, or twenty two and one-half per cent. They also feel compelled to reduce the appropriations for the field about seventeen per cent. It is better to make these reductions in advance than to go on accumulating a debt, and the example now set by the H. M. S. will, we trust, be carefully considered by other societies. The churches will heartily approve the most earnest efforts for economy and will respond more liberally as they see that their gifts are used with greatest care.

Negotiations have been for some time in progress looking to closer union between Congregationalists and the churches who have taken the name "Christian." During the present month a resolution was offered in the Christian Church at Marion, Ind., to secure a Congregationalist pastor as a step toward union with our denomination. The resolution was not passed. But, according to the Herald of Gospel Liberty, which reports this case, some churches of that body seem to be contemplating similar action, which is earnestly opposed by others on account of their attachment to the name "Christian," to the exclusion of every other name. Our brethren in that body of churches hold that their use of the name Christian to distinguish them from other denominations is standing for a principle. Why should they not keep the name, while Christians and Congregationalists act together in localities where it will be for the general advantage of the kingdom of Christ? We see no insuperable difficulties in the way of churches of both names uniting in local associations and conferences. Both denominations are Christians by profession and Congregationalists in polity. Where two churches bearing the two names can with advantage unite as one, why should not the new church take the name most acceptable to the majority? If that name should be Christian, we think Congregational churches would be glad to unite in fellowship with that church. But any attempt to force union only results in greater division. The guiding principle must be, "Love doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not its own."

Nothing that we said in a recent In Brief can be construed as a condemnation of charity organization work, nor as an unqualified plea for a return to the old methods of impulsive, unintelligent giving, for we believe that on the whole the newer and more rational methods prevent much waste and avoid fostering mendicancy and pauperism. But there is ever the danger that those who operate the charity organization machine will become enamored of the machine and forget the end for which it is created, and there is ever the danger that those who supply the machine with its fuel and water may come to feel that in so doing their duty is done. There will always be those who can only be truly helped by the touch of a personality not machine-labeled, and there will always be those also who can only give feelingly, not rationally. And as with these the impulse is born of sympathy and love, the responsibility must rest very heavy upon him who dares to say that such impulses should invariably be strangled by reasonings as to the probable effect of the gift upon its recipient.

About this time the New Englander is dreaming of the delights of a tropical climate and planning, or wishing he could plan, a visit to a summer clime. If he cannot get away, let him reflect on the fact that for all the year round, the climate of New England furnishes a variety, an exhilaration and a stimulus to physical and mental vigor which for a healthy life is to be chosen as far and away beyond the monotony of unending summer. Let him contrast these brilliant January days, with glassy lakes over which the skaters glide, or white roads along which sleigh bells sound their merry chimes, with this picture of Cuba, drawn by an American consul:

Noon lies panting in shadowless heat. Night falls as suddenly as the curtain when the play is done. Morning flashes in a moment upon a world that is bathed in a chill and clammy dew. As you sit fanning yourself in a windless time, you wonder if it has always been so, and life and its functions still gone on. There is a knowledge, but not a realization, that these airy habitations will never be closed for stress of weather, that the gathering of a household in the firelight will never be seen, that summer means only the monotonous splash of endless rain, seas of mud and limitless mustiness and green mold, and that winter is only a little more wind, boundless dust and the ripening of the orange.

The Church of England Missionary Society is using, with great success, a method of educating the public which could be adapted by our missionary societies just as well as not. In fact, in a tentative way, it already has been tested in this country by the A. M. A. and such institutions as Hampton Institute and Tuskegee. The theory is simply this. Gather together in a popular place of assembly, in cities like Birmingham, Bristol and Manchester, a collection of costumes, implements and models, illustrating the daily life of the foreign missionaries and the people among which they labor. In short, set up a missionary museum and put in charge of it retired or relieved missionaries, men and women entirely competent to instruct and inspire those who attend. Admit teachers and pupils in public and church schools at a nominal charge. So much for the theory. What has been its practical outcome in Great Britain? In Birmingham 100,000 persons paid an admission fee. In Bristol Nonconformists vied with Anglicans in their desire to see and profit by the exhibition, and already Wesleyan clergymen are calling on their missionary society to adopt the idea and use it in increasing intelligent interest among the Wesleyans.

The world confronts men with seeming impossibilities that they may vanish at the approach of faith. Such an impossibility escape from the Egyptians seemed to the people who were hemmed in by the mountains and the sea. So the conquest of the cities of the promised land looked to the spies. So the army of the Midianites appeared at first to Gideon. So, no doubt, the work which our Lord had undertaken appeared to Judas when he had once assured himself that there were to be no miracles for private gain or political effect. In these instances we have both faith and unbelief confronted with seeming impossibilities, which to the one became opportunities of glorious victory and to the other means of humiliating defeat. Our tasks, indeed, are different, but the principle remains the same. If the first question with us be of possibility and only then the question of God's will occurs, we shall inevitably sustain the overthrow of those who did not dare to venture. If we begin by making sure that it is God's will, the question of possibility becomes one for him and not for us to answer. His wisdom sets no wanton tasks—the very economy with which our Lord administered his miraculous tasks assures us of that—and if it be his will that we should perish in obedience—or even be made fun of, which with many is the more dreadful alternative—we may be sure that there is some good reason for our perishing. Seeming impossibilities in God's service are but a challenge to our faith. If the Red Sea hems us in our duty is to go forward without question at his word, assured that he will find or make a way.

CHURCH UNION IN BOSTON.

The union we have to speak of is of Congregational churches. It is one of the two outgrowths of the Pilgrim Association, organized about four years ago. The other is the Municipal League of Boston, which has already accomplished much good. The Congregational Church Union, which held its first anniversary at the Old South Church last Thursday evening, was composed of delegates representing a large number of churches. The occasion may, and we trust it will, prove to be an event of great importance in Congregational history.

The problem of Greater Boston is as much an ecclesiastical as a civic problem. The population of the cities included in the Metropolitan Water District has increased during the last twenty-five years from about half a million to nearly a million. By means of rapid transit the people who used to live in Old Boston have scattered widely through the suburbs. Their residences have been taken for business uses or for tenements for the poorer classes. The problem how to maintain the old churches, which are suffering depletion, and how wisely to plant new ones in the sections to which Congregational families are moving cannot be left to each church to work out for itself. The necessity of united action is evident.

The generous aid of the Old South Church and the wise use by the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society of the Swett bequest, now nearly exhausted, have brought forth results which are seen in the fact that the growth of Congregational churches in this district has been greater during the last ten years than in the preceding fifteen years. Yet in the quarter of a century the percentage of gain in membership in these churches is smaller than that of any of the other Protestant denominations except the Unitarian. To maintain our prestige and take advantage of the rare opportunity offered by the rapid expansion of the city, all the churches must act in harmony and under the guidance of their ablest men.

The work before the Church Union is a difficult and delicate one. It must not undertake too much. Some of the churches at the South End might, perhaps, wisely be consolidated, but that can take place, if at all, only through the free action of the churches themselves and in their own way. They may take counsel of the union when such a step is seriously contemplated, and we hope they will find it to the advantage of all interested to do so. There are new fields which invite immediate occupancy in several of the suburban sections. But the hearty co-operation of the neighboring churches will always be necessary to successful movement, and the union must choose wisely the opportune time to offer its aid, and to interest the churches in the effort. It can act only so far as it has the hearty approval and support of all the churches represented in it. Indeed, its work must often be discussed in all their meetings.

The union has been formed and has begun its work under very favorable auspices. It sprang up because of a general conviction that its work was needed. From the first, the Boston Congregational Club has been interested in it and has heartily approved of it. It has followed thus far the example of organizations for similar purposes in Chicago, St. Louis and other cities. It has left to our honored City Missionary Society all the work in the way of visiting and relieving the poor hitherto carried on so successfully by that organization. The officers of the union are men of experience, are widely representative of our churches and have their hearty confidence. They have already done a service of great value in placing before the churches more extended and accurate statistics of the district in which work is to be done than have ever before been gathered. To keep the churches informed of what is needed, to follow their judgment and at the same time stimulate their zeal and guide their action, is to insure success.

The first and most imperative duty of the churches in this region to the kingdom of God is to make Congregationalism strong in this greater Boston. It is and must continue to be the greatest source of supply from which our work in our land and in the world draws its funds. It must be the spiritual center from which courage and sympathy go out to willing workers everywhere. The truest revival is that which brings these churches to a high sense of their responsibility for giving the gospel to the world and helps them to the greatest efficiency for doing it. For this purpose this union has come into being. May it win and keep the fullest confidence of the churches, and lead them to large growth in the new and greater city which is already becoming a reality.

TRIAL BY JURY.

An important criminal trial in this city recently has called forth considerable adverse criticism, not only of the verdict in that case, but also of the jury system. Some of this criticism has been hasty, if not also ignorant. But some of it has come from intelligent, law-abiding, public-spirited citizens, who believe it their right to comment in a proper spirit upon public matters, and who, without the least desire to weaken the authority of law, regard it as entirely proper to inquire whether the practical application of law may not be improved.

We offer no opinion as to the justice or injustice of the verdict in the case of Mr. Bram. But we take frank objection to the claims made by some that the public has no right to utter itself about such a matter, and that by such utterances the majesty of law is lessened. The assumption, which has become too common, that the law and its official administrators are above criticism is fast bringing it and them into a mischievous relation towards the public. It is an evil quite as dangerous as any popular criticism upon them is likely to become. The disposition to browbeat witnesses, as if they were only less guilty than criminals, and to treat juries as though they were children needing to be ruled with a strong hand in order to compel a verdict, although perhaps less conspicuous than it used to be, still exists, and very naturally and properly provokes public indignation and needs to be sternly repressed.

That the jury system is by no means the ideal method of securing justice is plain. Yet, as has been said, it seems to be "the best system ever devised on the whole." But the question whether its operation may not be improved is fair and pertinent. If it be true, as is declared, that men of the best education and largest intelligence are not desired as jurymen by lawyers, that is an evil which may be, and should be, remedied. The best men obtainable are not too good to render justice, especially when life is at stake. Nevertheless, we believe that—so-called professional jurymen apart—our American juries average well in ability, good sense and fairness.

But, with all due deference to legal authority, we take exception to a suggestion made in a quotation by the court in the recent trial, not in so many words, indeed, but by almost necessary implication, if the text of the official language were reported correctly. It was that the minority of a jury sometimes, if not usually, ought to acquiesce in the judgment of the majority, even if not thoroughly convinced, rather than compel a final disagreement. Probably no such impression was intended to be conveyed by the court. That, nevertheless, seems to many a fair inference from its language as reported.

Such a suggestion seems to set at naught the real object of trial by jury. This is not to obtain a unanimous verdict of some sort, desirable though that may be, but to ascertain and declare the truth. If the truth be that six, or three, or even one, of the jury have failed to be convinced as the others are, that is the fact, to make which known was the object of the trial. Court, prisoner and public have the right to know that the evidence did not convince the whole jury, and was not strong enough, under our present system, to convict. The accused especially has the right to whatever advantage the jury's failure to agree may secure him. It is as truly a juryman's duty to refuse to agree to the conclusions reached by his fellow-jurors until he too has been honestly convinced of their soundness as it is to do his very best to weigh the evidence fully and impartially in order to reach the right conclusion.

But this view, if accepted, it may be urged, would greatly add to the number of the disagreements of juries, and thus would render many new trials necessary at heavy cost. That, however, is of comparatively small importance. But there is a remedy which has been suggested more than once and which deserves more heed than it has received. Matters relating to the welfare, and even the safety of the State are determined under our political system by a majority vote. Are the individual or corporate affairs with which our courts deal, even when human life is involved, so much more important than those of the whole commonwealth or nation that they cannot be settled safely in the same way? If our jury were composed of eleven men and if a majority, or perhaps a two-thirds, vote were to determine the verdict, it is more than possible that many of the absurdities and graver evils of the present system would disappear and without any essential sacrifice of justice. The expedient of substituting the frankly avowed rule of such a majority of a jury for that semblance of unanimity which often appears to be only an unconfessed illustration of majority rule certainly is worth a trial.

Furthermore, the practice of compelling a jury to depend wholly upon memory of the evidence in making up their verdict might be modified wisely. When a trial has lasted from several days to two or three weeks, as some continue—and those, ordinarily, the most important—it is practically impossible for jurymen to remember all of even the most vital testimony distinctly. As it is one main object of a trial to put the evidence fully and clearly before them, it is manifestly inconsistent, not to say absurd, not to give them the benefit of so much of the stenographic report, which court and counsel are permitted to use, as contains what was said in their presence. In most instances, the power of consulting it would enable them to frame their verdict much more quickly, intelligently and fairly than they can at present, and this surely is very much to be desired.

THE NEED OF THE HOUR.

In nearly all churches there are problems of skepticism, weak faith, indifference and inactivity in Christian service clamoring for solution. In most congregations there are persons who dislike a positive gospel. They do not quite believe in man's lost estate, in the necessity of forgiveness through a crucified Saviour, of regeneration through the agency of the Holy Spirit. With many the form of so called sound words has lost its effectiveness. With most men mere assertion or dogmatism is offensive. The chief need of today is that this condition of things should be removed, for, while certain changes in expression may be necessary, truth has not changed. Man is still a sinner. He cannot gain eternal life apart from the aid of the Holy Spirit. Apprehensions of truth, and even of the nature of the work of the Saviour, may not always remain the same, but Jesus Christ himself is the same, yesterday, today and forever. Believers today ought to be better able to present him to their fellowmen than those who lived in the sixteenth, or in the eighteenth, century. Every year brings new witness to his power and grace. His promises to give the Spirit to those who ask for him are verified before our eyes. We can no more deny this than we can deny the ordinary experiences of daily life. This gift of the Spirit can bring new life to the churches, and it is needed today as no other. Skepticism cannot be met by argument or counter assertion. Spiritual power alone can overthrow it. It cannot survive in a spiritual atmosphere. Neither can indifference, nor so-called Christian inactivity.

Spirituality is more easily felt than described. Indications of the presence of the Spirit are seen in a clearer discernment of the truth, in what is really an intellectual illumination, not only as to the nature of truth, but as to its applications to individual needs, and its power to change favorably, when accepted, communities, and even states and nations. A holy emotion often accompanies this perception of the truth, a more fervent love for him who is its representative and its revealer, a greater delight in devoting one's self to his service. There is also an almost irresistible impulse to engage in Christian service. Let this spirituality in thought and feeling, which in general is confined to a few persons in the local church, become the possession of the entire church, how soon financial difficulties are removed, social estrangements healed, the miasmatic fogs of unbelief dissipated, and the church made, what it professes to be, not only the conscience of the community, but the source and impulse and standard of its best life. With a spiritually-minded minister, a spiritually-minded church has little difficulty in maintaining itself whatever be its location. It can even endure the severe strain to which many city churches are subjected through the removal of so many of their members to newer and more fashionable districts. Ability is acquired to win the vast working population which crowds into the places left vacant. The old church, with its open doors, its warm Christian atmosphere, its words of welcome, its earnest sermons, its friendly meetings of conference and prayer, its opportunities for consultation on any matters of practical interest at almost any time, becomes a center of moral power to which the weak and tempted gravitate in ever increasing numbers. But this is only when the ministry of the church, its official boards, in fact its whole membership, are of one mind as to the value of the gifts they are commissioned to impart, when they act upon the conviction that the church exists solely to save men and fit them for life here and hereafter. Such a church does not ask its minister to preach sensational sermons, to strive to catch the crowd, but to preach sermons which will be of service to those who hear them. Here little is heard of unbelief, for there is constant evidence in the lives of those present that God answers prayer, nor are there complaints of the exclusiveness of certain circles, or of the unwillingness of so many to take part in Christian work. In response to the petitions which are offered in every gathering for prayer, the Spirit has come and seems to be directing those who are bearing testimony for Christ. This spiritual life, with its power, is not something reserved for the few. It is offered to all who desire it, and are willing to comply with the plain Scripture conditions upon which it is bestowed.

GROWTH BY CONSECRATION.

This is the sort of growth which an individual Christian or a church should rank most highly. Growth in external prosperity and apparent influence is desirable, but of minor importance. Growth in the membership of a church also is desirable but may be a cause of weakness rather than strength. Even in respect to methods of Christian service, those applications of the gospel to life which specially characterize the institutional church, it is equally true that, unless their multiplication and prosecution be accompanied by a steady growth of the spirit of personal consecration, they are almost sure to fail of their intended result.

True consecration promotes concentration of spiritual purpose. It increases definiteness of aim. It enlightens the judgment. It develops skill in interpreting the divine will. It brings one into closer, sweeter sympathy with Jesus Christ and quenches selfishness and unholy ambition. It teaches intelligent, hearty dependence upon the Holy Spirit for both individual progress and for that of the church. Without such concentration, enlightenment, wisdom, sympathy and childlike trust there can be no real, reliable, spiritual growth. With them there cannot fail to be.

The wise, efficient grasp and use of spiritual opportunities follow naturally. Such opportunities present themselves constantly. God opens doors and suggests pathways of usefulness in his name as fast as we are prepared to enter them. And each in some manner proves stimulating and developing by the new experiences to which it leads. In spiritual things pre-eminently growth depends upon activity and advance. Not to go forward never means to stand still. It always means to recede. We need the enlargement of ability, the increase in fertility of resource, the special encouragement due to the consciousness of noble endeavor made, if not of actual success attained, if we are to grow solidly in grace and service.

This enrichment of spirit is the best consequence of growth through consecration. How conspicuous it was in Jesus himself! How evident it becomes in the disciples and the other early believers as we study their histories! As we learn to know the Almighty better, by giving ourselves more unreservedly to his service, we inevitably absorb and reflect more of his Spirit. We learn to look at all things more from his point of view. We become possessed by the same aims which he cherishes, and the pertinence and beauty seem increasingly evident of that figure of speech which Jesus used when he said, "I am the vine. Ye are the branches" Our very being and nature become one with his, and his spiritual lifeblood flows in our veins.

CURRENT HISTORY.

The Arbitration Treaty.

Resolutions in favor of ratification of the treaty, passed by representative merchantile and ecclesiastical organizations, together with letters and telegrams from individuals, have rained in on the senators since it became apparent that base motives might influence certain of them to defeat the treaty. Senators capable of such action naturally protest against the right of petition and chafe under public criticism. Senators incapable of such action and forced to suffer for their colleagues' sins just as naturally protest against what seems to be distrust of them cherished by their constituents. Senator Hoar belongs to the latter class, and his speech in the Senate last week deserves attention. If he means to deny the right of the people to express their opinion and their right to petition for prompt attention to and as speedy ratification of the treaty as is consistent with dignity and safety, then he is not fitly representing Massachusetts in the Senate. But if he is intent on asserting the constitutional right and duty of the Senate to carefully examine the treaty, amend it if necessary, and so act as will conserve the best interests of the greatest number, then he is to be commended, for it is the Senate's duty to examine and confirm treaties, and even though we are at a time in our national history when the Executive overshadows the Senate in force and character, the people of this country have not decided to put it in the power of any one man to shape irrevocably our future destiny.

The latest reports from Washington do not indicate that the treaty will pass at this session, but its final ratification is assured if amended. Secretary of State Olney appeared before the Foreign Relations Committee last week and stated his reasons for believing that the treaty does not and should not commit us to arbitrate any questions without the realm of international law, such as the Monroe Doctrine. He pointed out, what has been overlooked by many critics of the treaty, that questions of territoriality are to be determined by a tribunal whose decision, to be decisive, must have at least two of the three American members in its favor. The unqualified commendation of the treaty as it now stands by jurists like James Bryce, George F. Edmunds, F. R. Coudert, Charles P. Daly counts for much with the plain people, who feel it to be imperative that the treaty in substantially its present form should be ratified. They will see to it that any omissions or clauses prejudicial to our highest interests are rectified five or six years hence. The thing to do now is to ratify, realizing the spirit back of the treaty which decrees that mother and daughter no longer shall scandalize the family of nations by displays of anger or threats of violence. The English-speaking family has too much work to do in the future to waste energy or temper in internecine warfare. Moreover, 1900 years after Christ's advent peace should reign somewhere on earth.

Destitution and Luxury.

Discounting as much as may be necessary the reports of destitution that come from Chicago, it still remains true that there as everywhere this winter is peculiarly severe in its test of the rich, the formerly well-to-do and the poor. For many it marks the culmination of the strain that has been endured for years and now has come the breakdown. For others it marks the era when instead of giving to help others they, too, must ask for aid. For others it means another season of penury, idleness and despair. And yet withal our legislators go on nonchalantly introducing bills calling for new appropriations and additional constant drafts on the public's purse. Many of our multi millionaires flaunt their possessions, give little or no attention to their fellowmen's needs, and plan for extravagant "functions," choosing the most wasteful way of spending their wealth. All honor, then, to any executives like Governor Powers of Maine who insist that it is as necessary for a State to practice economy in times like these as it is for its citizens; to any State officials like Comptroller Roberts of New York State, who calls a halt in State expenditures and shows that whereas the population of the State has only grown twenty-eight per cent. since 1880 its appropriations for State expenses have increased nearly 103 per cent.; to all clergymen who, like Dr. Rainsford of St. George's Church, New York city, dare to say, first to their people and then to the public at large, that these are not the days when people of wealth can, either as a matter of policy or principle, indulge in balls or receptions which scandalize the community by their vulgar, cruel, selfish ostentation. All honor, too, to Dr. Rainsford's brethren in the Christian ministry in New York, who, now that he is under fire for speaking out boldly, are standing by him in his appeal. The most dangerous citizens of this country today are the vulgar, sordid, selfish rich and their minions who sit in legislative halls.

Non-Partisan Civil Service and a Free Ballot.

Large majorities seem to have made certain Republican leaders mad—mad not in the sense of indignation at abuses which exist and need rectification, but in the sense of insanity—desire to strengthen the machine at any cost. In New York they are planning to "take the starch" out of the Civil Service Law, to use Governor Black's expression in his inaugural, and in Massachusetts a bill is now before the legislature, indorsed by Secretary of State Olin, which attacks the Australian ballot law in a vital way, and if passed will be a retrograde step, damaging to the reputation of the State and discreditable to the party which fathers it and permits its enactment. The essence of the proposed law is that section which permits one "x" to be made at the top of the list of party candidates which will carry a vote for every candidate of the party so marked. The present law shields every voter from the prying eyes of either political boss or employer. He is out of the reach of intimidation. He must discriminate in the case of every candidate who is offered for his suffrage. The proposed plan destroys the safeguards of the voter and prevents the State from securing the benefit of a discriminating vote upon every candidate who is presented. If the bill were to pass it would require a voter to remain only a few seconds in his booth to make his "x" at the head of his ticket. If he were in the booth more than those few seconds it would be presumptive proof that he were not voting the straight party ticket. The purpose of the law to encourage independent voting would be practically destroyed.

Ante-Mortem versus Post-Mortem Philanthropy.

Dr. D. K. Pearsons can sit back in his chair and chuckle as he contrasts his method of doing good with his surplus wealth, and the method chosen by Samuel Tilden and Daniel B. Fayerweather. The latter died in November, 1890, leaving a fortune of $2,100,000 to twenty American colleges, which bequests were paid without any litigation. By the terms of the will as originally drawn the residue of the estate, then amounting to $2,500,000, was to be divided equally among the same institutions to which direct bequests had been made. But the will was altered, and the residue was bequeathed to the three gentlemen serving as executors, with an understanding that they were to distribute it in the manner originally indicated by Mr. Fayerweather. This understanding they disregarded. They proceeded to distribute the money among institutions not named by Mr. Fayerweather, and, in short, treated the money as if it were their own, not his and held by them in trust. Naturally the institutions thus discriminated against began a suit to test the legality of the executors' action, and they won in the lower courts. Last week the New York Court of Appeals, the court of highest resort, affirmed the decisions of the lower courts and decreed that the twenty institutions named originally in the will were to receive the residuary estate, now amounting to $3,000,000. Unfortunately, this is not the end of the matter. Relatives of Mr. Fayerweather, who it was thought had been appeased, now are proceeding to test the right of Mr. Fayerweather to disregard them, and notice of another suit has been filed. Hence the institutions benefited by the Court of Appeals decision must wait still longer for their money, the estate must defray more legal expenses, and a corps of eminent lawyers, already historic by reason of its size and quality, representing the many interests, will have another opportunity to earn fat fees. Dr. Pearsons's money goes where he wishes it to go, and little, if any, of it goes to court officials and lawyers.

Great Britain's Parliament in Session.

The British Parliament reassembled Jan. 19, and thus far the ministry has suffered less from criticism than had been predicted, the coalition between the Irish Unionists and Nationalists on the issue of unjust taxation proving to be less effective than was anticipated. Lord Kimberly, as Lord Rosebery's successor as Liberal leader in the House of Lords, will not be a very formidable opponent for Lord Salisbury, but Sir Vernon Harcourt, as the Liberal leader in the House, may be counted on to use every effort to defeat the ministry in its scheme of compelling ratepayers to support denominational schools. The Soudan campaign, the responsibility of the British South African Company for the Jameson raid and Lord Salisbury's foreign policy are sure to be discussed with much acrimony before the session ends. Sir Vernon Harcourt's praise of Lord Salisbury's settlement of the Venezuelan dispute and negotiation of the arbitration treaty could not have been more cordial had they been the work of a Liberal minister, and everywhere in Great Britain there is a feeling of relief and joy that the two peoples are about to agree to pioneer the world into a sane and Christian method of adjudicating international differences of opinion. Of course, as Lord Salisbury has pointed out, it is understood we are not living in a "millennian" dispensation, and that no treaty, however wisely drawn, could restrain a Napoleon or a Bismarck. But the people also feel with him the intolerable burden of taxation which present day armaments demand and they have reason to hope that the ratification of the treaty will do much to lighten the burden, not only in countries directly affected by the treaty, but in those which will profit by the influence of the example of Anglo-American comity.

The Situation at Constantinople.

The publication in London last week of a British Blue Book, giving Lord Salisbury's correspondence with Russia and the other European Powers relative to the method of coercing Turkey, is said to have convinced the British public that he has done his entire duty and retrieved his reputation as an astute diplomatist. Neither the correspondence itself nor the course of events in Constantinople warrant any such opinion. Queen Victoria, in her speech at the opening of Parliament, expressed the situation exactly: "The conferences of the six ambassadors to the Porte are still proceeding." Not until action supplements or takes the place of conference will the situation in Constantinople change. Both Russia and Germany, not as allies especially, but for selfish purposes, are standing out against anything like forcible intervention, and if no reforms are wrought and the sultan is permitted to pursue the demoniacal tenor of his way Christendom will have to bear the responsibility, for is not the czar the head of the Greek Church and is not the Emperor William God's vicegerent in Germany?

The Indian Famine.

Steps have already been taken by our Federal officials to guard against the plague, and the New York State Board of Health is taking ample precautions to prevent its gaining a foothold in the metropolis. As was indicated by us last week, the European Powers are moving swiftly and effectively, and all vessels from India and Red Sea ports, from this time on, will be carefully inspected at all European and American ports. Latest reports from Bombay do not indicate that any successful method of coping with the plague has been discovered. The British officials in India have ordered all religious pilgrimages stopped, and that will do much in preventing the spread of the contagion. Those on the ground in India describe with considerable enthusiasm the methods and the vastness of the scheme of relief work, but they also agree that there is a large field of work open to private philanthropy. At last the necessary official sanction for soliciting funds from the British public has been secured, and the lord mayor's relief fund now amounts to $750,000, which seems large until it is compared with the amount given at the time of the last famine, or until it is set side by side with the work to be done. Then it seems quite insufficient. Given an adequate amount of money and the problem is by no means settled, for the distributors of aid have to encounter customs, prejudices and hatreds, even, which render the task almost insurmountable.

NOTES.

Much of the proposed legislation against "trusts," now being thrust before our legislators, suffers from suspicion of the purity of the motives of those who father it.

Bills are before the legislatures of Indiana and Nebraska forbidding football, and the corporation of Harvard University has decreed that Class Day no longer shall be marred by the brutal scrimmage around the tree. The pendulum is swinging back.

Times have changed. Inventors nowadays, more frequently than they used to, profit by their wit. Grant Bramble, a telegraph operator and station agent at Sleepy Eye, Minn., has just received $6,700,000 for all patent rights, foreign and domestic, on a rotary engine in which steam is applied as water is in a turbine. An English syndicate is the purchaser.

The Administration has decided that the Government will foreclose on the property of the Union Pacific Railway, the reorganization committee of the railroad guaranteeing a minimum bid of $45,000,000, which the Government agrees to accept in lieu of its claim of $70,483,812. In making this agreement the Administration probably has accepted as true the saying that "half a loaf is better than none," but there are those who feel that the public's interests might perhaps have been guarded better.

Our Interior letter gives an estimate of Illinois's senator-elect. The rejection of Senator Peffer of Kansas by the legislature of that State, and its choice of an ex-Confederate soldier, is an omen of changed and changing conditions in the Middle West. Senator Pritchard's success in the North Carolina legislature insures his return to the Senate, is a victory for the Watson faction of the Populists, and apparently makes it certain that the Republicans in the next Senate will have votes sufficient to pass a protective tariff bill.

The organization in Boston last week of the American Irish Historical Society indicates that the time has come when men of all sections and all faiths can unite to see that justice is done to a people whose contributions to our national history and life have not been insignificant. It has for its president Rear Admiral Meade of the United States navy. On its executive council are men like Theodore Roosevelt, Augustus St. Gaudens, James Jeffrey Roche, Maurice F. Egan and Prof. R. E. Thompson. The society has for its mission the plain recital of facts concerning the share the Irish race has had in founding and upbuilding the United States, the correction of errors that have crept into popular standard histories, and the abatement of racial prejudice and passion.

The installation of Rev. Dr. T. J. Conaty as rector of the Catholic University at Washington was a ceremony not without significance to Protestants, owing to the number of Washington officials present, and the declaration by Cardinal Gibbons that, if he had the privilege of modifying the Constitution of the United States, he would not expunge or alter a single paragraph, a single line or a single word of that immortal instrument. "The Constitution," he said, "is admirably adapted to the growth and expansion of the Catholic religion, and the Catholic religion is admirably adapted to the genius of the Constitution. They fit together like two links in the same chain." Dr. Conaty's inaugural address revealed his ability and catholicity, but gave no indication of future policy.

IN BRIEF.

Bear in mind Mary Lyon Sunday, Feb. 28, when contributions in behalf of Mt. Holyoke College are earnestly desired and richly deserved.

The Anti-Slavery Society of Great Britain still finds work to do, and has just filed a petition with Lord Salisbury protesting against the perpetuation of slavery in Zanzibar.

There will be wide-spread sympathy with Dr. John Hall of New York. While watching at the bedside of his son Thomas C., the well-known Chicago minister, who is very ill, news came of the death of another son in California.

Evangelistic methods have greatly changed in some respects within the last fifty years. Who could imagine Dr. Finney evoking bursts of laughter and applause by his references to the future punishment of sin, after the manner of Sam Jones?

The United States Army is limited by law to 25,000 men, and it cost the Government last year $50,000,000 to maintain them, or $2,000 apiece for every soldier. With this rate on a peace footing, those who think a war would increase business prosperity can easily figure on the gains which would accrue to the country.

John Bach McMaster says in the Atlantic Monthly that, in the beginning of this century, "in all our land there was not a reformatory, nor an asylum for the blind, for the deaf and dumb, or for lunatics." And yet there are people who believe that the world has been growing worse and worse the last hundred years!

Of a woman who died in Brooklyn last week, whose bequests will make many missionary and philanthropic institutions glad, it is said: "She lived simply in order that she might be able to give largely." This is usually the habit of the great benefactors of the race. Luxurious personal habits seldom breed compassion for the multitude.

According to Dr. L. H. Cobb of New York, twelve missionary societies of five denominations have a total indebtedness of $1,013,632, and would have three-quarters of a million added but for severe retrenchment, which must have greatly limited and crippled their work. These figures suggest the financial depression through which the country has been passing and from which it has not yet emerged.

The New York Observer lectures those people in Massachusetts who are dissatisfied because of the presence of a colored man in the governor's council, and winds up with the reversed saying that "a white man is as good as a colored man, if he only behaves himself." But the Observer ought to have learned by this time that the trouble arises from the fact that in this case the colored man hasn't behaved himself.

Yale leads all American colleges in the number of its graduates for the last fifty years, 4,311, and in the number of its alumni who have become ministers, 1,041. Harvard, with 3,399 graduates, sent out 386 ministers, while of Amherst's 1,626 graduates, 754 became ministers. So says President C. F. Thwing. But these proportions are changing now, and suggest greater reasons than ever for earnest prayer for our colleges.

Dr. F. E Clark's bright article, published on page 121, was written in Germany several weeks ago, but it is just in season for Christian Endeavor Day, Feb. 2. A private letter accompanying the manuscript speaks of the encouraging growth of Christian Endeavor in Germany, though its progress there naturally is not so rapid as in English-speaking lands. Dr. Clark has now moved forward as far as India, being scheduled to speak at interdenominational rallies in Calcutta next week.

Rev. Dr. H. S. Burrage of Portland declares in the Examiner his emphatic approval of the Interdenominational Commission of Maine, to which we have often referred. Its aim is to prevent the needless multiplication of churches of different denominations in the smaller communities of the State and to promote mission work in them. Its purpose is so sensible and Christian and its work thus far is so valuable that it ought to be studied by leaders of the churches in all the States.

So recently as 1880 a standard work on international law said:

> It must be permissible, while human beings are human, to distrust arbitration as a means of obtaining an equitable settlement of international controversies, except where the matter at stake is unimportant, and the questions involved are rather pure questions of fact than of law or mixed fact and law.

Human beings are still far from divine, and yet today Great Britain and the United States are about to seal a compact leading to perpetual arbitration of disputes of all kinds.

While the December receipts of the American Board show a slight gain over those of the preceding year, this is because of The Congregationalist's fund for Armenian orphans. Otherwise there would have been a loss of more than $10,000. In the same month the receipts of the Presbyterian Board were $80,145 less than in December, 1895. What this decrease means to the work of giving the gospel to foreign lands can only be faintly appreciated by those who remain at home. The missionary sees close at hand churches and schools and colleges, into which years of life have been put, crumbling to pieces while the people are sinking back into barbarism.

A forthcoming anniversary, in which Christendom generally may be expected to participate, is that which marks 400 years since the birth of Luther's co-laborer, Melanchthon. That great and influential German scholar well deserves many tributes from press and pulpit on or about Feb. 18, the exact date of the anniversary. We are glad to learn thus early of special preparations being made for the occasion. The students of Andover Seminary will hold a service in the Seminary Church. Besides the rendering of appropriate music, including hymns from Melanchthon, addresses will be made on the Life and Personal Traits of Melanchthon, Melanchthon as a Scholar and Melanchthon as a Religious Reformer.

The Congregationalist having received a number of emphatic protests against some criticisms made on pastors and churches by Mr. Moody, as reported in the newspapers, and being unwilling to discuss them in its columns, presented to him the substance of these protests for his consideration. At his request, the editors invited the Congregational ministers of Boston and vicinity to a private conference with him, last Monday afternoon, at Pilgrim Hall. The meeting was largely attended. There was much plain and kindly speaking, and earnest prayer. Some misunderstandings were removed, and, while differing judgments found expression, cordial confidence in Mr. Moody's spirit and purpose was made evident, and many of those present renewed their assurance of hearty co-operation with him.

The Congregationalist Handbook in its successive editions, covering now ten years, has been put to many good uses, and each year brings us some fresh evidence of its adaptation to various kinds of excellent purposes. But to make the Handbook itself the subject of a prayer meeting is certainly one of the most novel ideas yet, and perhaps nobody but an inventive Western pastor would have thought of it. It might well be applied elsewhere. We quote from a recent letter from southern California:

> We received the Handbooks in due time and are much pleased with them. I write to tell how useful and suggestive they became this week, when I made them the subject of our midweek prayer meeting. It gave the pastor an opportunity to urge daily reading of the Word, daily prayer for the pastor, the church and the un-churched, the value and helpfulness of the creed, loyalty to our own parish and the great encouragement in the growth and extension of the kingdom of God.

"O, I am glad you mentioned it; our church will drop the C. B. S. from our list this year." So said an officer of one of our churches when he heard of the $300,000 which the Church Building Society will probably receive sometime in the future. Another man said, "Spread this great gift over a wide expanse of time, the C. B. S. meanwhile being out of the field as a solicitor for the offerings of our churches." Such a misunderstanding as these thoughtless comments reveal would be disastrous. The Stickney legacy is not yet within the grasp of the Building Society, for though the former announcement that the courts had decided in its favor was correct, the contestants have now secured a stay in the proceedings for one point which will take sixty days. They seem determined to make good their expressed intention to keep the society out of the money as long as they can possibly find a point which will keep it in the courts.

To see the sons of great and good men achieve honor is always gratifying, and to see them fall short of it is always deplorable and the cause of grief to their father's friends. There are not a few admirers and friends of Gen. U. S. Grant who will regret that his son, now a police commissioner in New York City, has recently said:

> I do not believe in trying to stop Sunday liquor selling, gambling and the social evil completely. If we could have a system of legalized gambling, it would be a great blessing to the community. A public lottery, run by the State, on a small percentage, with tickets sold for small amounts, would furnish a fairly safe outlet for the gambling spirit. Large public gambling places, conducted under very strict rules and where the adventurous could stake their money at faro, roulette or poker, with the assurance of a square deal, would solve the gambling problem—at least as far as it can be solved while people want to gamble.

Fortunately, Colonel Grant understands how futile it is to expect such action, for he also says:

> If I were a member of the legislature I would not introduce such a bill, because I would know the bill could not be passed, and I would know that I could not be re-elected after introducing such a bill.

CURRENT THOUGHT.

AT HOME.

The New York Evening Post sums up admirably the real meaning of the Anglo-American arbitration treaty: "Whether ratified or not the moral effect of the treaty cannot be lost, and it is moral effect mostly that is sought for in the effort to bring it about. It puts off the motives leading to war. It accustoms the public mind to forbearance, moderation, discussion, negotiation. It causes waiting, and waiting is almost always promotive of peace. It teaches the public to expect peace rather than war, and to exhaust peaceful methods before resorting to war. When we look back upon all the bloodshed that has smeared the pages of history, at the misery and destruction that have blocked the march of civilization and put a stigma upon religion itself, we must welcome as a priceless blessing the very smallest gain to the cause of peace. So we are bound to consider this treaty, even if we can imagine its rejection by the Senate, as one of the greatest triumphs of the century that is now closing—a triumph which ought to immortalize every man who has had, or shall yet have, a hand in bringing it about."

ABROAD.

Our letter from India last week called attention to the Salvation Army's recent record there—a record which its friends in this country must not only deplore but squarely face. We find in The Indian Witness, Bishop J. M. Thoburn's organ, the following reference to this subject. It says: "Tidings that have reached us from other points in India makes it appear as if the Salvation Army has deliberately inaugurated the policy of invading the universally recognized, well-provided-for territory of old established missions, with the fixed purpose of seducing their converts. At all events this is the impression that one cannot but derive from a survey of the tactics and operations of the army in some places for the past twelve or fifteen months. Such procedure is simply outrageous and utterly indefensible from every point of view, and must eventually be attended with the divine displeasure. Having so egregiously failed in their attempts to build up an organization out of converts honestly won directly from heathenism by their own prayerful and patient efforts, they seem to have resolved to win 'glorious victories' somehow, and the disgraceful methods by which they seek to accomplish their object apparently is that which promises speediest success (?)."

H. J. Palmer in The Nineteenth Century (February) says: "The danger which threatens the well-won glory of the press (in England) is not bribery in any direct sense, but bribery by advertisement," by which he means that at last English journalism begins to suffer from the curse that affects so many of our newspapers, namely, publishing as reading matter that which they have been paid to publish.

The London Chronicle, commenting on the treaty, says: "It is a great treaty, and it will be a great force in the history of the world, because it is the act and the agreement, not of sovereigns or ministers, but of the two most advanced, most civilized and in the end most powerful of the peoples of the world. The 'high contracting parties' are the people of the United States and the people of the United Kingdom. The rulers, left to themselves, would never have arrived at this. The peoples, or the best part of them, compelled it. And as they have used this power in 1896, so they may be trusted to use it in the coming years. If ever frictions and quarrels should arise the two peoples will have not merely the power but the duty to refer them to the calm discussion of a tribunal always open; and if those who for the moment may hold power on either side of the Saxon Sea should be tempted to destroy or to evade the purposes of this new judiciary, it is to the best instincts of the peoples that we must still appeal."

REVIVAL MEETINGS IN BOSTON.

Tremont Temple continues to be the center of a throng of earnest worshipers. Some of the morning meetings last week were rather thinly attended, but the afternoon audiences filled the spacious building, and the interest certainly does not seem to be lessening. Mr. Moody says he is greatly encouraged by the feeling manifested and by letters he receives from all parts of the country.

Francis Murphy has conducted daily meetings in Berkeley Temple, and has addressed crowded assemblies at noon on Bedford Street. A large number have signed the pledge, and many young men have been lifted up from habitual drunkenness into sober lives, for the time at least. Mr. Murphy has a tender heart, a wise head and eloquent lips. He gets down among his hearers and seems instinctively to interpret their feelings and to know when and how to say the right word. Last Sunday evening Berkeley Temple was crowded to the doors. Owing to the preoccupation of the Temple by the Christian Alliance people, Mr. Murphy is this week holding evening meetings at the Ruggles Street Baptist Church, but his work is still under the auspices of the Berkeley Temple Church.

The People's Temple has been daily filled to hear Sam Jones. Rev. George R. Stuart, another Southern revivalist, is sharing his labors and, apparently, his popularity also.

Special services are being held in a number of churches in and about the city, and in several of them the preaching is by evangelists. Rev. Dr. William Patterson of Toronto, Can., is laboring in the Fourth Presbyterian Church. Dr. Lorimer is conducting revival meetings every afternoon and evening in Lorimer Hall, one of the audience-rooms in Tremont Temple. Mr. W. P. Hall is holding evening meetings in the Dudley Street Baptist, Roxbury, while at the Walnut Avenue Rev. C. I. Scofield is assisting Dr. Plumb, preaching every evening. Miss E. W. Greenwood of the W. C. T. U. is conducting the third week of union meetings in Chelsea. From all these and other services come reports of large attendance and indications that the churches generally are feeling and welcoming the quickening influences of the Holy Spirit.

WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING.

CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, JAN. 22.

Isaiah 60, with its pictures of the glory of the church in the abundant access of the Gentiles, furnished the opening theme for Mrs. A. A. Berle. Those who follow the Board calendar and read under Friday's date, "Miss Ellen M. Stone, Philippopolis, 1878," would have been glad to look straight into Miss Stone's face and hear her voice as she said: "Can you think what it means to the missionaries to know of this united prayer for them, this systematic setting the work before the people here at home, something for every one of the 365 days in the year? I cannot tell you how beautiful it is to have a day." Then she went on to speak of Bulgaria as she has known it these nineteen years, especially as it is today, of its young men, and of the high school in Philippopolis, her city 300 miles west of Constantinople by rail. A neighbor to Armenia, Bulgaria has now the privilege of opening its doors to Armenians who are fleeing for their lives, and, remembering her own days of peril, receives them without passports and cares for them as she can. Miss Fraser, recently of Van, is at Varna on the Black Sea, where she is carrying on relief work which she has most efficiently organized, furnishing employment to a host of needy men and women. Dr. J. F. Clarke gives most emphatic testimony to the value of this work. Miss Maltbie and Miss Haskell of the Samokov school are rejoicing in the recent grant of £200 from W. B. M. I., for a new gymnasium, and in connection with it, what every practical housekeeper will appreciate, a drying-room. In Bible women's work and school work, in many places in that country, a wonderful tenderness of heart is manifested. A backward step is painfully noted in the suspension of the publication of the Zornitza, the mission paper which has been so valuable an aid in the work, suspended because of lack of funds to carry it on, but it is hoped that this suspension may be very temporary.

Mrs. Page, herself a missionary in Samokov twenty years ago, emphasized the value of this paper even in the earlier days, with its political and religious intelligence and its hymns set to music, and with Miss Stone hoped and prayed that its publication might soon be resumed. Mrs. Greene related some incidents showing appreciation of the calendar. One woman who could not afford to buy it said she was going to use her old one over again, and she did not believe the missionaries would mind if she did change the dates.

Miss Child reported a letter from Mrs. E. S. Hume of Bombay, giving an account of the ravages of the plague in that city. Thousands—Mr. Hume thinks 300,000—have left town. Mrs. Hume says: "The Baroda Railway alone has put on six extra trains a day to provide accommodation for those leaving by their line. In the railway station here at Byculla there sit scores and hundreds waiting for an opportunity to leave by the G. O. P. trains. The people are dazed and terrified. In the Hindu burying ground down on Queen's Road, where Mr. Hume had to go a few days ago to give testimony concerning the death of one of my blessed little Brahman girls in the Middlesex school, who died suddenly of the plague, Dr. Jeddo, the assistant coroner, a native Christian of the Free Church, told Mr. Hume that the papers gave not a fractional part of the facts as to the plague; that in one burying ground the day before 150 bodies had been brought, and they could not dispose of them fast enough—one-half, and more, of the plague. In the Mohammedan burying grounds we are told that they are laying four and five bodies in one grave. And yet, with all this about us, not a native Christian has had an attack."

Miss Stanwood reported the union meeting held on Thursday in the Clarendon Street Baptist Church, under the auspices of the Baptist, Methodist and Congregational Woman's Boards. Mrs. Alvah Hovey presided. Professor Currier of Wellesley College read the Scriptures, and Mrs. Capron, Mrs. Hanaford and Mrs. A. J. Gordon led the devotional part of the service. Miss Child talked of her Pilgrimage Among Missions, and Miss Hodgkins, editor of the Methodist Magazine, the Woman's Missionary Friend, conducted an open parliament with discussion of three themes: Missionary Literature and How to Use It, opened by Miss Hodgkins; The Neglected Grace of Giving, opened by Mrs. Joseph Cook; and The Workers of the Twentieth Century, opened by Mrs. Waterbury, once a missionary in India and now secretary of the Baptist Board.

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM NEW YORK.

The Congregational Club.

Don't smile, ye Bostonians, that it should soberly discuss New York as an Educational Center. Its opportunities for study in collegiate and professional work were shown up by Prof. Nicholas Murray Butler; in literature, by Prof. Francis H. Stoddard; in art, by Mr. William A. Coffin; and in business, by J. Aspinwall Hodge, Jr. Professor Butler thought this greatest commercial center pre eminently the place for the greatest university, and showed its rapidly increasing facilities for study along the lines of education, political science and literature.

Mr. Coffin, artist and art critic, thought our schools for art instruction as good as those of Europe, but the great need of New York was "an atmosphere" and beautiful public buildings put where they could be seen.

Professor Stoddard vindicated the city's claim to be a literary center, where the author comes in close contact with life and writes of life as he finds it. He rejoiced in our coming three great libraries unhampered by needless restrictions. Mr. Aspinwall spoke of our business colleges, evening schools, training schools, free lectures of the Board of Education, as compared with the great English technical schools, graduating 200,000 yearly. Our nearest approach to them in quality he thought were the lately organized schools of the Y. M. C. A., a movement of great promise. He sharply condemned the interference with our trade schools by the trades unions, that seek to create classes within the masses.

The club voted to receive to membership women who desire it, and three were voted in at this meeting.

A Unique Ceremony.

Our Russian church on Second Avenue surprised the East Side population last Monday with a ceremonial procession such as New York never saw before. It was the first importation to our shores of the Russian Church's Epiphany custom of "blessing the waters," which, in the czar's dominions, is yearly performed with the greatest pomp and display, the czar and his court taking active part in it. Here all the accessories were, of course, on a small scale, but the resident priest, with two others just from Russia, robed in purple, lilac and silver brocade, led the procession, over which floated the American and Russian flags, and were followed by the people of the congregation in their gala day attire, the men bareheaded and their long hair lifted by the cold, piercing wind. From a vessel of consecrated water brought from the church a portion was cast into the East River at the foot of Thirty-second Street, with a brief address from the officiating priest, then the church people drank or carried to their homes the rest of the blessed water, and the service ended. It is to be hoped that the blessing is not to be confined to the river, but may reach the adjacent shore, which surely has not less need of purification.

Greater New York.

The proposed charter for "Greater New York" has been the most absorbing topic hereabouts since the national election. The hearings before the commissioners closed this week and the commission is beginning its executive sessions trusting soon to get the charter before the legislature. As was to be expected of a measure covering so wide a territory, with interests so diverse, but few of the many sections of the charter meet with unanimous acceptance even of its friends, and the hearings will doubtless result in many changes. But there still remains the settled opposition to the consolidation by thousands of the best citizens of both cities, opposition that grows stronger and more bitter as the plans of Tammany and other parasites come more and more to the front. Large taxpayers are appalled at the prospect of being saddled with the debts of all the proposed additions to the metropolitan family, but far more at the rising specters of countless "jobs" already plotted by thirsty vampires for sucking the blood of the as yet unborn child.

Our New Senator.

The effort of decent people to send to the United States Senate a worthy representative of the Empire State turned out as was expected, Mr. Choate having received the votes of seven legislators to 142 for Platt. The votes of these seven, like the speeches of men like Dr. Storrs and others, were given in the spirit of the early Covenanters, "for a testimony," and they will remain on record as a protest against the depths of degradation to which "boss rule" has sunk New York politics. If any one believes that the vote represented the choice of the people who sent those voters to Albany, or anything else but the will of a self-appointed autocrat, he must have a large capacity for credulity. The names of the seven are on a card in the boss's pocket, for early punishment, but the names of the 142 will abide in the memory of the State's honest citizens for some time yet.

College Men's Meeting.

A meeting nobly manned and of unusual interest, led by college men and for college men, was held here last week, the services being shared by Presidents Gilman of Johns Hopkins, and Low of Columbia, Bishop Potter, Dr. Van de Water, Columbia's chaplain, and others. Before his chief address at this general meeting, President Gilman met socially the Yale alumni in the parlors of the Students' Club and addressed them to their great satisfaction and profit.

Revival Meetings.

That held daily in the large hall of the Cooper Union, and now led by Dr. J. W. Chapman, still continues to be well attended, and apparently with good results. Several of the city churches are holding extra meetings also. The same is true of Brooklyn. A union meeting of the east district churches has been for some time in progress, gathering in Dr. Duryea's (First Reformed) and the New England (Dr. McElveen's) churches, 1,000 members often being in attendance, Drs. Meredith, Lyman, C. L. Thompson and others taking part in the services. The Rochester Avenue Church is holding a series of extra meetings, Drs. McLeod, Lyman and Dickerman assisting Mr. Newton, the pastor. Union meetings of Brooklyn Presbyterian and Methodist churches, among others, are in progress.

Personal.

The hosts of friends whom Dr. William Kincaid, in his work as a pastor in Kansas and this State and for eight years as one of the secretaries of our national Home Missionary Society, has won for himself all over the land will be grieved to hear of the serious illness which has partially, and now for some weeks wholly, laid him aside from his work. The knowledge of his condition cannot fail to secure from many praying souls petitions for his speedy restoration to a position to which he is so well adapted and has filled so admirably.

Dr. M. McG. Dana, since the successful issue of a surgical operation for the removal of a tumor, has continued to improve and is gaining strength with fair promise of recovery. Rev. Joseph A. Fisher is to preach for the Lee Avenue pulpit during Rev. J. Brittan Clark's three months' pursuit of health in California.

HUNTINGTON.

FROM THE INTERIOR.

Religious Outlook.

While there is nothing like a decidedly revival interest in any of our churches there is a hopeful state of feeling in many. Among the smaller churches the interest seems deepest. In one or two from fifty to seventy-five conversions are reported. The ministers' meeting Monday morning was occupied in listening to reports from the churches. On the whole they were encouraging and indicated an earnestness on the part of pastors which ere long will certainly be rewarded. Reports from missions like the Pacific Garden and the Chicago Avenue Church are uniformly hopeful. Rev. Mr. Torrey is still conducting noon meetings in the auditorium of the Y. M. C. A.

Congregational Club.

This met Monday evening at the Palmer House. For some months the meetings have been at the auditorium. But, as accommodations there were not quite what were desired, an experiment was made with the Palmer House. It cannot be put down as a success. Although the auditorium is no satisfactory substitute for the old Grand Pacific, it is yet preferable to any other place the club is likely to find.

Wisely and unanimously Dr. J. G. Johnson of the New England Church was made president. Altogether the club is in a good condition. It has between seven and eight thousand dollars at interest. Sometime it may be possible to secure a Congregational House even in Chicago. The general subject for discussion Monday evening was The Church and the City. Rev. S. Gilbert, D. D., spoke of the church and journalism; C. H. Case, Esq., of the church and temperance reform; Thomas P. Ballard of Evanston, of the church and the clubs; and Thomas A. Banning of the University Church, of the church and city politics. Each speaker took the ground that the church must be given the supreme place, but that its members should not neglect their duty to reforms, nor be indifferent to the peculiar movements of the day. These should be controlled and directed in the interest of the church.

The First Church.

The benevolence of this mother church reached last year $7,500, an increase of about $1 300 over the preceding year. This is a gratifying showing for, as is well known, the drift of population for some years has been away from the church. Many of its most earnest and wealthy members have gone into suburban churches. Yet the First still lives, and in the persistency and usefulness of its work and in the amount of its gifts is a stimulus to every church in the city. For three or four years seats have been free. Money for current expenses has been obtained by voluntary contributions or subscriptions made at the beginning of the year and paid every week. The plan has succeeded admirably, better, in fact than with the system of pew rentals in more prosperous times. Dr. Goodwin has been laid aside a full month, but is now better and able to resume his work.

Christian Science.

The followers of this religious cult are becoming more numerous every year. Meeting at present in the center of the city they have decided to lay plans for three separate organizations, one on each side of the city. Land has been obtained on Drexel Boulevard, near Fortieth Street, for a building on the South Side which is to cost $65,000 and to seat 1,500 persons. In architecture it will depart from the ordinary models. It will have a plain front of marble, a recessed porch with Ionic columns, reached by broad steps. The porch will open into a vestibule leading to a foyer, from which seven flights of stairs furnish access to the auditorium.

Salvation Army.

The members of this army have this week been holding a congress in the city. While discussing the present condition of the army and forming plans for future aggressiveness zeal for service has carried the delegates to the congress out into the streets and especially to the levee, one of the hardest spots in the city, with the message of the Master. On the levee they met with considerable opposition. The residents jeered at them and a cabman tried to drive over them while they were on the knees in prayer, but met with such determined resistance from stalwart members of the army that he was glad to turn back and seek some other street. Sunday evening they are to conduct services in the Union Park and the Third Presbyterian Churches on the West Side, and in several other churches in different parts of the city. More and more the army seems to be coming into sympathy with the churches, and to desire their co-operation in efforts to reach and save those whom the churches as a rule do not reach. It is not easy to estimate the value of the work which the Salvationists and the Volunteers have done in preventing vice and in reclaiming those who have gone astray.

The New Senator.

The power of the machine, we are thankful to chronicle, has been broken, and both its candidates, Madden and Lorrimer, compelled to retire. Although its members voted for Mr. Mason, who is now the successor of Senator Palmer, the latter is under no obligation to them and is in no sense a creature of theirs. On the whole, the election of Mr. Mason has given satisfaction to the entire State, although Mr. Hitt would undoubtedly have brought more dignity to the office, and an understanding of the problems of statesmanship which few men in the country possess. But Mr. Hitt is needed in the House and he can be kept there indefinitely. In some respects Mr. Mason resembles Senator Douglass. He is quick at repartee, a good debater, a man whose integrity has never been questioned, whom the people like to hear, friendly, social, the father of a large family, a poor man, a Republican from principle, yet in no sense narrow-minded, and not so old that by hard study he cannot meet any deficiencies in present knowledge of the questions upon which he will be asked to vote. When we think of the escape we have had from the candidates of the machine we are profoundly grateful.

The Coming Municipal Election.

For this both politicians and the friends of good government are making very thorough preparations. No man is yet certain of nomination for mayor. Business ability of the highest order, combined with perfect integrity and the power to read men at a glance, is demanded. These are hard to find. But at present attention is chiefly directed to the record which present members of the Common Council have made. Under the direction of the Municipal Voters' League, the record of those aldermen whose terms of office are about to expire and who desire re-election have been carefully examined and, whether good or bad, put in print and sent to every voter in the city. Very few of these aldermen receive clean papers. Of most it is said, after giving an account of the jobs for which votes have been recorded, He should not be re-elected. Through the efforts of the league a number of good men were put into the council at the last election who have stoutly resisted all attempts to rob the people through the giving away of valuable franchises, and who if re-enforced at the coming election will be able to carry the city a long way forward on the road to good government. The prospects of victory for righteousness are better than they were two years ago. We believe they will be better still two years hence.

Two Famous Germans in the Classroom.

Wellhausen and Harnack.

By Rev. Francis E. Clark, D. D.

Let me try to picture for Americans at home two striking figures of the German classroom, in these end-of-the-century days. I will not speak of their orthodoxy or heterodoxy, or the hair-splitting differences of the philosophy which they advocate, but simply of the way in which they strike an American on his first introduction to their classrooms, in the hurry and press of other duties in Germany, and so profess to give only first and surface impressions.

Let us go to Göttingen first. An old middle-of-the-era city is this, with crooked, narrow streets and beetle-browed houses placarded with famous names, showing that Bismarck and Longfellow and Bancroft and many another celebrity once dwelt in them. The town is surrounded by an ancient wall, now entirely unused except as a promenade—the "Indian Ridge" of Göttingen. All my readers who have been Andover students will understand this allusion.

There are only about 26,000 people in the city and the students constitute one-twenty-sixth part of the population, giving them a far more predominant and conspicuous place in the town than they occupy in Halle or Berlin, or the larger university cities of Germany, where, though the students are more numerous, they are swallowed up to a larger extent in the vaster population. Many of the students, though by no means all of them, belong to the different corps which are distinguished by the most brilliant of caps, red, green, blue or purple, forming a headgear which is surpassed for ridiculous absurdity only by the jaunty little red cap which the English Tommy Atkins balances in a most precarious way over his right ear, holding the strap thereof apparently in his mouth, lest it should at any moment topple down from its insecure perch. Most of these corps students are scarred and seamed like veterans of a hundred battles, as indeed they are, for they are obliged, on pain of expulsion from the corps, to fight at least six duels a year. Some of the faces are perfectly hideous with the deep and brutal scars of which their owners are so proud.

But here is a handsome university lecture hall where almost all the lectures, except those in medicine and chemistry, are given. It is thronged with students hurrying to the different classrooms before the hour for the lecture arrives, for punctuality at lectures seems to be one of the virtues of the average university student. We take our seat on one of the long benches, with a desk in front of us carved with the names and initials of many generations of students, together with various symbols and devices which tell of wandering thoughts. Evidently the minds of the students are not always on high theology or lost altogether in the fog of metaphysical speculation, for the names of "Emma" and "Lisa" and "Ida" and various other feminine appellations appear upon the much-carved desks.

The students are all in their places, when the door opens and, with a quick, nervous tread, the professor enters. It is the famous Wellhausen, whom many timid souls have feared would shake the very foundations of our faith and uproot all our traditionary views of the Word of God. He is not, however, by any means, a fierce or malevolent looking individual. Of stout and muscular build, a man with iron gray hair and beard, he hurriedly enters the room, hastily throws off his overcoat, steps on to the platform behind his desk and begins to talk in a most nonchalant and indifferent sort of a way almost before he has fairly hung his coat upon its appropriate peg.

This studied indifference of entrée and exit seems to be affected by many German professors. I say "affected" advisedly, for no man can really be quite so utterly indifferent and unconscious of all his surroundings as many German professors appear. No word of kindly salutation to the class, no prayer such as we are all accustomed to in our theological seminaries before the lecture begins, nothing but a jump into the subject, in medias res, and a talk at railroad speed until the three quarters of an hour are exhausted, when, with equal abruptness, he puts on his coat and hat, talking up to the last minute, and leaves the room almost before the echo of his last word dies away. The whole attitude of the average German theological professor seems to be, "Hear me if you can, but it makes very little difference to me whether you do or not." As to any personal interest which he may have in the individual student, it seems to be the furthest from his conception.

In fact, Professor Wellhausen rarely seems to lecture to his students, but directs most of his attention to a crack in the floor about eight feet from the base of the platform on which he stands. As this crack is on the right hand side of the desk, near the back wall of the lecture-room, the students can rarely catch a glimpse of his face, but at the most, if they are happily situated, of a somewhat sharp profile, with a good view of his right ear. Sometimes he turns squarely around with his back to the students and his face to the wall; sometimes he lifts his eye aloft and fixes it upon a spot in the ceiling, but inevitably the crack in the floor attracts his attention once more and he brings his eyes back to their favorite resting place.

Just now Wellhausen lectures chiefly on philological subjects and the heavy guns of his battery are not turned as formerly upon the books of Moses. Whether it is owing to a lack of interest in the subjects on which he discourses, or to his uninteresting style, or to the fact that much of his best work has been published, many of his lectures are attended by very few students, the one which I have described attracting less than a dozen, if I remember correctly.

But it must not be supposed that all German professors adopt this nonchalant, indifferent style. Let us go into Harnack's lecture-room, for instance, in the University of Berlin. Here we find an entirely different state of affairs. There are 250 or 300 students present at least, among whom are nearly a score of Americans, to hear the great authority on church history. We leave our overcoats in the hall outside, and if we are especially anxious to resume them again when we go out we chain them to the wall with long steel chains and heavy padlocks which conveniently hang from every hook, for overcoat thieves are both numerous and wily at the door of this theological lecture hall. The room is so full that we are obliged to take the very front seat and literally sit at the feet of the great lecturer.

Scarcely has the last student taken his place when the door opens once more and a tall, wiry man with a thin, scattering mustache and hair brushed straight back from his forehead enters the room. He is ill-dressed and looks underfed, and we at first think he is one of the poor theologues who is working his way through the university, spending more for midnight oil than for oatmeal porridge. But he mounts the platform instead of taking his seat with the rest of us, and after a pleasant word of greeting begins his lecture, for this is none other than the celebrated Harnack. There was nothing of the indifferent "take-it-or-leave-it" air about him.

He soon warms to his subject. He is evidently thoroughly interested himself and seeks to interest his pupils. He gesticulates freely and appropriately. His eyes sparkle with interest in his theme, and now and then he runs his fingers through his long hair, pushing it back from his ample forehead. At times he becomes decidedly eloquent and sallies of wit frequently bring a broad grin to the faces of the eager students, who are diligently pushing their pens to keep up with his torrent of words. Evidently Harnack does not despise the graces of oratory and is not afraid to make his lecture interesting as well as instructive. He seems to have very few notes before him and seldom refers to them. His narrow platform too much cabins and confines him, and he frequently comes down onto the lower step and then goes back, balancing himself upon the arm of his professorial chair in a most insecure way until we become so anxious for fear it will topple over and land him in an undignified sprawl upon the floor that we almost forget to listen to his eloquent periods.

To look at it from a material view, if we may be pardoned for so doing, it is well worth the lecturer's while to make his lectures interesting, for he receives, in addition to the somewhat meager salary paid by the state, a large percentage of the students' fees, something like $5 00 for each of the 300 students who take this course. All Andover students of the olden days naturally compare every new lecturer whom they hear with that prince of instructors and king of the lecture-room, Professor Park. Who of us will ever forget the eagerness with which we looked forward to those rare literary treats? Who does not remember the human interest with which every dry theological theme was lighted up? Who of us cannot recall the gleam of shrewd humor which used to come into that marvelous face before the lips uttered some sharp witticism or told some extraordinarily good story? Was there ever an instructor who so impressed himself upon his students, or so affected all their modes of thought as did Professor Park?

Professor Harnack, of all German professors, in these respects seems to have more in common with the great preacher of Andover Hill than any one whom I have heard. As we were going out from this lecture, Professor Weiss was going into his lecture room—an old man, with snow-white beard and hair and a most pleasing and benignant expression. But his work has all been published and his pupils are few in these days.

Speaking of the inevitable tendency to run after new and brilliant luminaries, as illustrated in Professor Weiss's career, Professor Harnack said to a friend of mine: "It comes to all of us sooner or later. It will come to me as well as to the rest. I shall lose my popularity and my students one of these days. The night cometh, the night of decadence and unpopularity, as well as the night of death. It becomes us all to work while our day lasts." Surely the prosaic minister of the simple gospel could utter no more sensible or practical truth than this. For the great scholar, as for the humblest worker, the night cometh. Let us work while it is called today.

WANTED, NEW MEN AND NEW MEASURES.

II.

BY REV. HENRY A. STIMSON, D. D.

It does not do to charge the lack of support of our missionary societies wholly to the hard times, nor to quiet our minds with the fact that the mission boards of the other denominations are suffering in the same way. There may be different reasons for the different cases, and there may be deep-seated causes underlying all. Great changes are taking place all about us, changes of thought, of method, of desire. In rapidly moving machinery every adjustment, however small or delicate, is a matter of importance—even the smallest may involve the welfare of the entire machine. There is certainly every reason to make sure that in our societies and in our churches the adjustments are as they should be.

At the annual meeting of the Home Missionary Society in New Haven a question of representation rose to the surface for a brief moment, and was passed without discussion. A member of the executive committee, whose term had expired, declined re-election on the ground that, in his judgment, the interests of the society require rotation in office. At his request the executive committee was instructed to report an amendment to the by-laws, for discussion and adoption at the coming annual meeting, prescribing that no member of the committee shall be eligible for re-election until after one year from the expiration of his term.

The principle involved has been slowly finding its way into recognition in the churches and some of our societies; the time has come for its general adoption, for it has wide reaching influence.

We have two classes of officers, the administrative and the representative; to the former belong the secretaries, the treasurer, the clerks in the office and generally the president; to the latter the members of the executive committee. That the first group should be permanent will hardly be questioned. Administrative duties require largely technical abilities and experience, which increase in value with length of service. Though even with them, human nature being what it is, there is danger of the man holding the office rather than the office the man, and, therefore, the form of reappointment is arranged to take place each year. If this reappointment could be made less a matter of course, and the service rendered for the expiring year and the qualifications of the particular officer for continued service be definitely passed upon, it would do much to confirm and encourage efficient men, and would provide a way for retiring those who are out of place without the long discomfort and eventual outbreak which sometimes occur. Permanency of service is the great desideratum in these positions, and to secure it fitness appreciation, the removal of unnecessary hindrances and a proper compensation are essential.

But another relation exists with regard to the members of the executive board, by whatever name it is called. They are the representatives of the constituency. They are chosen primarily not to govern, but to represent. The aim and the general line of operations of the society are determined at the outset and fixed by its charter; its operating machinery is soon created and its administrative officers are secured. What the members of the society, who are the society, then need is that their purpose shall be efficiently carried out. Obviously they cannot see to this themselves. Therefore certain of their number are chosen to supervise the administration, keeping fully informed as to the work to be done and the methods of doing it, counseling with the administrative department and securing its highest efficiency, and all the time representing the known wishes of those whose representatives they are, to whom at stated times they report.

This is all obvious enough and in some instances is fully embodied in the laws of the land. There is no suggestion of prescriptive right, or of title acquired by tenure; there is no intimation of authority to govern either the society itself or the administrative department, except in the performance of defined duties. Yet, again, human nature being what it is, there is a tendency for the representative officers, especially if they have been long in office, to come to feel that they are the society, and, what is of far more consequence, a tendency for the members of the society to think that they are no longer represented. The same men are so obviously always re-elected, or control the election of those who are to be their fellows, that the society loses its sense of grip upon its own affairs. Few die and none resign, and when these are practically the only ways of creating a vacancy on a board representation ceases.

I incline to think that, under these circumstances, the better the board the worse it is. It destroys the sense of responsibility and so dries up the personal interest of the members of the society. An incompetent or a tricky or dishonest board, if that were conceivable, would awaken active opposition and in time be cast out, but an efficient and self-sufficient one may be groaned under but will hardly be disturbed, and that whether it be of women or of men.

The need of the hour, in comparison with which all others are secondary, is greater interest on the part of the people in the missionary work, both home and foreign. That alone will secure funds and missionaries. To secure this interest the people must feel that the work is not a committee's work, nor a society's work, but their work. Everything that will help to create and maintain this feeling is important. News of the work must be brought to the people, as the new paper, Congregational Work, is helping to bring it, and it must be brought as news of what they themselves are doing. More than ever the annual meetings ought to be occasions for the fullest and freest discussion of the methods of administration and the details and ever changing needs of the work upon the particular fields. The people ought to go home feeling that they have been taken into the fullest confidence of the executive officers and have gained intimate knowledge which otherwise they would not have had; and, above all, they ought to feel that they have attended the meeting for the purpose of electing whom they would, and, if need be, with a wide choice, to represent them and their views on the board.

The chief reason for the rule prohibiting re-election till after one year is that only so do you secure real freedom of choice. Without it nothing short of a personal attack upon the incumbent prevents his uninterrupted tenure of office. He has no means of knowing whether he is the real choice of the members, and the society has practically no choice offered it. To assume that there are not enough competent men available for the change is to be ignorant of the churches, and if desirable any man can be returned after one year. It is a poor service that has not made impression enough to keep a good man in mind for a single year, and to secure his re-election if he is pre-eminently the best.

The main thing is to keep the people close to the work. If the representative places are open, and the choice free, any man may be called to the service, and the responsibility of both officers and members is constant. The American Board adopted this rule tentatively two years ago, applying it after three terms of service. It ought to be applied freely and promptly at the close of each term by all our societies. It works excellently where it is in use. In our churches it is emancipation from what is sometimes a paralyzing bondage; it is a step in the right direction in our missionary societies.

After special prayer and evangelistic effort it is important that the church should have a welcome ready for all comers. The cordiality of individuals needs to be indorsed by the sympathy of the church. At such a time the prejudices of men are softened, and they are prepared to respond to invitations which they would previously have dismissed without consideration. Some of them have drifted away from early habits of church attendance, others have had at least their curiosity aroused, and some are feeling their way toward faith without having had the courage to enter an inquiry meeting or to open their hearts to a Christian minister or friend. The social atmosphere of the church ought always to be genial, but never more so than when the community has been stirred by calls to faith and obedience, and the stranger in our gates may be only waiting for an invitation to become one with us in faith and service. And to this genial atmosphere individuals must contribute each their share, or the geniality of the whole will suffer.

Life's great teachers are friendship, occupation, travel, books, marriage and chiefly heart-hungers.—Newell D. Hillis.

THE SOWER.

I.

A sower went forth to sow;
His eyes were dark with woe;
He crushed the flowers beneath his feet,
Nor smelt the perfume, warm and sweet,
That pray'd for pity everywhere.
He came to a field that was harried
By iron, and to heaven laid bare.
He shook the seed that he carried
O'er that brown and bladeless place.
He shook it as God shakes the hail
Over a doomèd land,
When lightnings interlace
The sky and the earth, and his wand
Of love is a thunder-flail.
Thus did that sower sow;
His seed was human blood,
And tears of women and men.
And I, who near him stood,
Said: "When the crop comes, then
There will be sobbing and sighing,
Weeping and wailing and crying,
Flame, and ashes, and woe."

II.

It was an autumn day
When next I went that way.
And what, think you, did I see?
What was it that I heard,
What music was in the air?
The song of a sweet-voiced bird?
Nay—but the songs of many,
Thrilled through with praise and prayer.
Of all those voices not any
Were sad of memory;
But a sea of sunlight flowed,
A golden harvest glowed,
And I said: "Thou only art wise,
God of the earth and skies!
And I praise thee again and again,
For the sower whose name is Pain."

There are many encouraging tokens of a new interest in our Lord's life awakened by other influences than those which we call distinctively religious. One sign is a marked impulse toward the study of sacred art. Several Sunday school teachers of our acquaintance are helping their pupils to illustrate their Bibles with photographs from scenes in the life of Jesus. A mother wrote recently: "I cannot resist the temptation to tell you how pleased I always am to see one of your Madonna articles. They are all cut out for the 'collection' which is one of our four year-old's Sunday treats." We are confident, therefore, that a series of illustrated articles on the parables by Estelle M. Hurll, the first of which appears this week, will be welcomed by our readers. The choice reproduction on our cover page is taken from the exquisite miniatures of Liberale da Verona, found upon the old missals in the cathedrals of Siena and Chiusi and specially imported by Miss Hurll to elucidate her articles.

When the soldiers asked John the Baptist what they should do to show fruits worthy of repentance he answered, "Do violence to no man." This is indeed a negative command as compared with "Do good to all men," and yet if we try to follow it for a day even we shall be astonished at its far-reaching influence. So often our misdirected desire to do good results in violence to our neighbors' feelings or convictions! It is strange, but generally true, that no sooner do we find a weak point in our friends' characters or beliefs than we set ourselves to direct some keen thrust at that very point and cajole ourselves into thinking that we do it for their good. It would hardly be too high an estimate to say that half the aspirations toward better things among young people, and among those wishing to give up bad habits, meet with a violent death because of tactlessness on the part of people who should know better.

In speaking of the average religious life of the present time, especially that of young women—with which she was particularly conversant—a lady recently remarked: "I am not afraid of the modern critical view of the Bible as 'a literature,' nor even of the reaction from so-called 'Calvinistic doctrine,' but the great defect I see in the religious experience of young women is in the matter of prayer. They are leading upright, moral lives, they have a certain reverence for God and his public worship, but their religious life seems to lack almost entirely the element of communion with God through habitual prayer. As long as they remain at home they will unite, out of deference to their parents, in the observance of family prayer, but it is to them so much a form that they will not be likely, when they have homes of their own, to adopt it there." These words have recurred again and again to the one who heard them and have suggested serious queries. Does this defect in the Christian life apply to others besides young women? Has private prayer on the part of professing Christians ceased to be observed or, if observed, to be a reality, a joy, a help? Is the good old custom of family prayer, with the reading of the Bible either at morning or evening, given up in Christian homes? If so, should it be so? Mr. Moody's selection of the subject of prayer for his earnest exposition and exhortation for a whole week at Tremont Temple shows the important place it holds in his mind as a fundamental part of true personal religion. "The Lord Jesus," Mr. Moody began one of his afternoon talks, "never taught his disciples to preach. But he taught them to pray." Have we learned of him the secret and the privilege of prayer?

PARABLES IN PICTURES.

I. THE SOWER.

BY ESTELLE M. HURLL.

It was a memorable day in the course of the three wonderful years of our Lord's ministry when he began to teach in parables. He was sitting on the shore of the Sea of Galilee talking to the people gathered about him when the number of listeners grew so large that he took up his position in a boat. Then followed, one after another, a series of short, illustrative stories of which the sower came first. So dear and familiar to us are these today that we naturally wonder why they have not been prominent among the subjects of great works of art. We may be sure that this would have been the case had the New Testament been in the hands of the people in the period when Christian art was developed and perfected. But when we remember how limited, before the age of printing, was the opportunity to study the Word, we can better understand that only a certain set of subjects was selected for art. These were chiefly scenes of Christ's active ministry and the incidents connected with his nativity and passion. These were not only of prime importance in themselves but they lent themselves more readily to artistic interpretation.

The scene of Christ's parabolic teaching by the Sea of Galilee is, therefore, rare in art. Two examples which I can mention are exceptional. One is by old Brueghel in the Munich gallery (a copy is in Dresden), and one is by the modern English artist, Edwin Long. Very rare also are pictorial representations of the parabolic stories themselves. In the earlier art centuries we find almost none, but as time went on there was an occasional example. At length, by the seventeenth century, some of the longer parables became quite popular.

The sower has never been of the popular class, and we prize the more the exceptional picture which forms our illustration. The original belongs to an exceedingly interesting department of art, namely, that of illuminated manuscripts. We are carried back in thought to those old monastery libraries where, day after day, the patient monks bent over the parchment with their inkhorns and brushes, transcribing the precious words of the evangelists in "gospel-books," or copying the musical scores for the church services in "missals." The lettering alone of these great volumes seems to us a wonderful piece of work, but when we examine the exquisite paintings scattered through the pages our admiration knows no bounds. We try in vain to fathom the secret of these brilliant colors, red, blue and green, unfaded after all these years, and of the gold enamel, untarnished by time. We marvel over the delicate outline of the tiny figures and the perfect smoothness of their finish. There is no more fascinating study for the European traveler than to linger over these lovely books as we come upon them in the old world libraries. The cathedral "Libreria" at Siena contains some interesting specimens, among them the fine set of miniatures by Liberale da Verona, an Italian painter of the fifteenth century. It is a delight to examine these richly decorated pages, with their beautiful arabesque borders and illuminated initials. The whole story of the sower is compressed into the circle of a single letter. The picture has exactly the idyllic character appropriate to the parable. The sower steps blithely on his way with a rhythmic grace of motion almost like dancing. He is a genuine story-book sower, not the stolid, prosaic husbandman of actual life. What a contrast there is between his sweet, poetic face and the toil-worn features of Millet's famous Sower. The Italian painter doubtless kept in mind the double meaning of his story, and intended the sower as a representation of our Lord himself. He carries the seed in a basket on his left arm and flings it, as he walks, into the furrows of a plowed field. Around this field we trace the various results of the sowing. On the right the fowls of the air are flying up, having devoured the seed; in front are the thorns which have choked out the rightful crop; on the left are the stony places where the sun has scorched the new growth; beyond stretch the fruitful green fields where the seed fell into good ground. These four types of ground are represented in a series of four panels by a modern painter, Robert, but there is nothing to be seen in either of the sower himself. Liberale's picture illustrates the parable more completely and is in itself a charming bit of artistic work.

MOTHER AND SON.

Few things in nature have more power of suggestiveness than a perfume. A breath of brier rose or the scent of newly mown hay suddenly wafted into the consciousness of a man in the whirl of city life transports him instantly to the old farmhouse of his boyhood. The dingy office vanishes and there arises a vision of green meadows and babbling brooks, while the roar of the street is displaced by the sweet jargon of birds and the swish of the mower's scythe. Occasionally a book is written whose chief strength lies in its suggestiveness, in its power to awaken

> Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears.

Such a book is Margaret Ogilvy. Other sons have loved their mothers as devotedly as Barrie loved his. Other children have written noble and appreciative tributes to the memory of their parents. But it has been reserved for this man of genius to touch the universal chord of filial affection and set it vibrating alike in lowly hut and lordly hall. In this respect it reminds one of what George Eliot says concerning Thomas à Kempis's Imitation of Christ: "The small, old-fashioned book, for which you need only pay sixpence at a bookstall, works miracles to this day, turning bitter waters into sweetness. . . . It was written down by a hand that waited for the heart's prompting."

This rare quality of being able to stir the finest sensibilities in old and young, in the child away at school, in the gray-haired author tired with "that weary writing," in the plodding business man, in the patient housewife darning worn socks or patching tattered trousers—this it is which makes Margaret Ogilvy pre-eminently a volume for the home. The portrait, too, which forms the frontispiece is no less eloquent than the text itself. The snowy mutch, "made out of snowflakes, its exquisite frills that look like curls of sugar and the sweet bands with which it tied beneath the chin," the placid face, the simple room, awaken emotions that lift us to the highest levels.

> Though inland far we be
> Our souls have sight of that immortal sea
> Which brought us hither, when we gaze on this face. The eyes are downcast, but we believe what the son says: "When you looked into my mother's eyes you knew, as if he had told you, why God sent her into the world—it was to open the minds of all who looked to beautiful thoughts."

One can conceive that this "gospel of her precious Christian life," if placed within the hands of a man behind prison bars, would act upon him with a regenerating force. And men who have grown only careless or neglectful of their filial duties have been profoundly moved by the lovely lyric. One such said with deep feeling: "I would give all I'm worth if I could say what Barrie does at the close of his book—'Everything I could do for her in this life I have done since I was a boy. I look back through the years and I cannot see the smallest thing undone.'" Best of all it gives expression to all that unutterable yearning which other young men have felt after laying away their own mother in the kirkyard. The book is to them "the heart's sweet Scripture to be read at night."

And for mothers—ah, what a book it is for them! The way in which Margaret cherished the little white christening robe, "the one of her children that always remained a baby," her habit of watching at the window when her boy went out to walk, her trick of saving the first checks which he received for writing, tied up in an envelope with a bit of ribbon around them, her pattering into his bedroom with bare feet to make sure that he is nicely covered up, how these homely acts reflect the self sacrificing spirit of motherhood the world over! Then her pride in her son's progress. Is there a boy struggling for an education whose pulses do not throb more quickly as he reads how she drained all available libraries for books in order to keep pace with him intellectually, and even learned scraps of Horace that she might bring them into her conversation with "colleged men"?

The book is full of the perfect sympathy which existed between Margaret and her son, but nowhere is it more delicately set forth than at the critical stage when he is crossing the mysterious boundary between childhood and boyhood. A real horror seizes him when he realizes that the time has come to put away childish games. But he takes the shadow to his mother and she tells him her own experience "which convinced us both that we were very like each other inside." Thus was established an understanding between the two which deepened as the years rolled on. By and by there came a day when the relations were reversed, when the frail mother was grown so little that it was the big, strong man who put his arms around her to protect her from the shadow of death which darkened her pathway.

MARGARET OGILVY.*

Let no one imagine, however, that the harmony between these two natures was developed along the serious side of life alone. The book bubbles over with delicious humor, showing that the two were comrades in their jovial moods as well as in all others. Perhaps a young college professor had this phase of the book in mind when he exclaimed with enthusiasm, "You see that Barrie not only loves his mother but he actually likes her and he likes to have you like her, too!" Altogether it is a fireside classic and wonderfully fulfills the words of Phillips Brooks when he says: "More is accomplished in this world always by the suggestions of motive and force than by the impositions of form and rule. The whole world is waiting to start into far higher action than anything yet, if one could only touch the springs." Barrie in Margaret Ogilvy has touched the springs.

THE MISTRESS OF THE MANSE.

BY MRS. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

I have an affection for the old word manse, designating the home of the minister, and bringing up a throng of beautiful domesticities and simple hospitalities whenever it appears on the printed page. In our country, where the pastor lives in his own hired house, as a rule, and not in a house owned by the parish and set aside for the clergyman's use, the "manse" has only a poetical meaning, but the minister's wife is as dear and sweet a reality as in any moss grown or ivy-mantled manse in the world.

We hear it stoutly affirmed in many quarters that the mistress of the manse, as we shall call her for the sake of convenience in this bit of talk, is of no more account in the congregation which her husband serves than is any other lady there. She is not included in the contract, has no stipulated obligations, draws no salary, is in every way independent and free and, so far as the parish is concerned, is a mere private gentlewoman. All of which is in a manner true. At the same time, the truth is at best to be accepted with qualifications. Let it be supposed, for example, that the minister, marrying in his youth, has fallen upon those evil days which are the portion of the man who marries for beauty only; let us fancy him with a vain, or silly, or petulant, perhaps with a poorly educated and ill-disciplined, wife. Does anybody for an instant think that he will not be very much handicapped professionally, his career of usefulness impaired, by this unfortunate marriage? Granting that in any social position a man's rank and value largely depend on the sort of a wife he has taken to himself, is not the man in the ministry, whose candle cannot be hidden under a bushel but must shine conspicuously in the sight of the whole town, in a worse condition if he have not a creditable and sensible helpmeet?

Providentially, ministers' wives, as I have known them, have been usually women of rare loveliness, amazing tact and charming discretion. They easily take precedence among gifted and agreeable women, and they take hold of their end of their husband's work with wonderful command of resources and unfailing courage; for the instances are few in which something is not expected of them by the congregation, or else in which, expected or otherwise, they do not womanfully—I had almost said manfully, but the other word is better—share the crosses and the losses of the day, conciliate the offended, soothe the irritated, and in many a quiet, unsuspected way sustain their husbands in their work of love and constant toil.

A popular minister's wife makes very secure her husband's position in a difficult parish. A beloved minister's wife helps to win love to her husband.

In a certain parish, where there were peculiarly inharmonious elements, several pastors in turn did their best, but retired vanquished from the field. Finally a man accepted the post, fully aware of the various causes of trouble, the jealousies between the young people and the older people, the feuds between certain families, and the clashing of interests which had made the church in question a reproach and a byword. Meeting the brave pastor after he had held the position with increasing success for several years, I asked him how it was that he had not been defeated too.

"Under God," he said, "I owe everything here to Lizzie. She captured all hearts from the first. There isn't a home in the parish where her influence is not felt. The women adore her, the young people consult her. She is the confidante of the whole congregation. I never could have gained a foothold here had I not been aided by my wife."

It is not every husband, nor even every clergyman, who is candid and discerning enough to see and own how large a debt he owes to the unselfish and gentle comrade who stands gallantly by his side in all life's emergencies and vicissitudes. I liked the man who acknowledged so ungrudgingly the debt he owed to "Lizzie."

The manse sets a pattern for many another household. Invited to tea at the manse table, the young visitor notes the simple courtesies and delicate politeness of the lady whom she admires, and absorbs something of the latter's loveliness and charm. Advice given by the pastor's wife is accepted and prized where it would be resented if offered by another.

The parish has no right to exact anything from the wife of the minister, it is true. But she can no more help being influential than a rose can help diffusing its fragrance, and her natural qualifications for leadership, if these she have, cannot be hidden in this sphere of activity. If she does not wish to take the lead officially, she can still, by her own excellence and in virtue of the fact that her husband must be a leader, largely modify the social life of the congregation. She is its first lady, and all are glad to accord her the place of eminence.

"THE U. S. A."

BY REV. WILLIAM BYRON FORBUSH.

The author of the Knighthood of King Arthur, the chivalric Christian fraternity for boys, has devised a new plan for boys' clubs, which is adaptable to his own plan, to the Boys' Brigade, and to any group of boys of similar age anywhere. He calls it "The U. S. A." It is a clinic in citizenship. It consists of an imitation in club meetings of the work of the government of our nation. It seems similar in some ways to the George Junior Republic, but it has been in process of development before the republic was started, and its essential differences from that will appear without pointing out.

The boys are associated for the purposes named in the preamble of our national Constitution, viz., "in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice," etc. This constitution, copies of which are secured for all, is the constitution of the society, it being understood that ages, dates and facts there named are to be interpreted consistently with the exigencies of the case. The boys meet usually as the House of Representatives, being divided by sections so as to represent States. These sections elect each a senator from the older men of the community, to whom laws can be referred for confirmation. Unless, however, the adult leader requests, laws are considered to have passed the Senate when they pass the House. This leader represents the Supreme Court and acts as interpreter, guide and friend, assuming at need any other position in the body. The Boys' Brigade, if there be one, is the national army. The local Castle of the Knights of King Arthur, if there be one, represents the voluntary fraternal society. The Sunday school, of which each boy must be a member, stands in a way for the church in the nation.

The House at its first meeting elects its officers, the speaker and the sergeant at arms being the principal ones. Then lawmaking begins. A revenue must be provided. Naturalization (initiation) fees and direct taxes would be suggested. The tariff might be brought in here. As differing opinions begin to appear parties arise, hold political conventions, frame platforms and nominate a president. Then political rallies and joint debates are represented. Finally an election is held by Australian ballot and the season closes in the "inauguration," which forms a grand public ceremonial, with parade by the army, message from the president and exercises of a patriotic nature to represent the evening festivities. If there is time before this a town meeting may be held and an evening given to a trial by jury.

If it is desired to introduce the savings feature, the leader may give in return for all voluntary money, aside from the regular treasury, receipts to be known as "national bank notes," redeemable in cash ("gold"), and for savings of over twenty-five cents "government bonds" redeemable at the present in cash or at their expiration (three or six months) with interest. To do this he makes a special deposit with a local savings bank.

The plan is inexpensive, easy to work, instructive, and so far has been received with delight by the boys and has worked well. It seems to be timely in view of recent revivals of patriotism and of the problems now facing us, which even boys may study and should try to understand.

I have no literature on the subject. I think it needs none. But I should like to hear from those who try the plan and to give any help I can.

THE NEW WOMAN.

Here lies a poor woman who always was busy.
She lived under pressure that rendered her dizzy.
She belonged to ten clubs and read Browning by sight,
Showed at luncheons and teas, and would vote if she might.
She served on a school board with courage and zeal,
She golfed and she kodaked and rode on a wheel;
She read Tolstoi and Ibsen, knew microbes by name,
Approved of Delsarte, was a "Daughter" and "Dame";
Her children went in for the top education;
Her husband went seaward for nervous prostration.
One day on her tablets she found an hour free—
The shock was too great, and she died instantlee!

Closet and Altar

No life is complete which does not sometimes sit trustfully waiting to be fed by God.

O my soul, let thine aspirations go up more and more after thy heavenly inheritance! "The Lord is the portion of mine inheritance and my exceeding great reward." What more than this can the compassionate love of God bestow? He gives us life. He gives us his only Son. He gives us his very self. And had he known of anything greater in heaven, or in earth, he would have given that, too. In God we live, we are the temple of God, we possess God here, indeed, in spirit and in mystery, but there in deed and in truth. There our hopes will become blissful reality. There we shall not simply sojourn, but we shall dwell in a secure abode forever and ever.—Gerhard.

Seek not to flee the place God placed thee in,
For where he wills is the true place for thee;
If thou hadst thy own choice thou couldst not win
A spot all restful where no rough winds be.
Live thou thy life, with patience sweeten it,
Make rich the lives of others in thy walk,
Strengthen thy soul with words of Holy Writ
And season with sweet charity thy talk.

—L. Fletcher.

It often seems as if there were a sense in which it might be said that nothing so tended to keep God out of our lives as work for God done in a wrong and superficial spirit. . . . The Scripture reader, the Sunday school teacher, the evangelist, the minister, the working laymen—all of them, I am sure, have felt how religious work tries to push out religious thought and to kill the soul's receptivity. Thought made practical, turned into duty, tends to become like air turned into wind. . . . The more earnestly you are at work for Jesus, the more you need times when what you are doing for him passes totally out of your mind and the only thing worth thinking of seems to be what he is doing for you. That is the real meaning of the days of discouragement and self-contempt which come to all of us, O fellow laborers for the Lord!—Phillips Brooks.

Can God suffice for heaven and not for earth?—Mrs. Browning.

Dear Father, here I am, where thou hast placed me. Thou dost know the plans for me which are in thy mind. Teach me, that I may know them. Give me grace, that I may accomplish them. Make me strong, that I may fill them as thou dost will. I am not here for my own purposes, for thou God hast sent me into the world. Inspirit me, O Holy Spirit, that I may embody thine own self. Mold me, O Creator of us all, that I may take on immortality in the likeness of Jesus Christ. Lead me, O Saviour of life, that these days on earth may be established in truest service and faithful ministry. And the plans of the hour that I follow out will then be thine, so that all the results, about which we thy followers are often anxious, will be thine also. By growth and transformation lead us into rest and peace, that all our inner state and all the works of our hands may be made holy. We pray to thee because Christ Jesus opened up the way. Amen.

6. CHARADE FOR POETS.

(Phonetic.)

First.

Lo! the true measure (every one agrees)
For every printed verse; then do not slight me;
For if familiar rhyme comes not with ease
At last you are always sure to write me.

Second.

Behold! I am in every scribbler's pate.
O that despondent scribblers could but know it!
For by my help it is that Gray is great;
With me to aid him Poe became a poet.

Whole.

Ye poets, when your laurels faded lie,
Cry: hollow! hollow! hollow!—that am I.

HOW ONE DIES.

Few people know how one dies. They have only a blindly superstitious fear and horror of it. The deaths which are to be most dreaded have little or no terror for most people. Now, to decide what is the most painful death we must look into the nature of pain. The greatest suffering is produced not by the surface or superficial nerves of the body, but by a disturbance at some important nerve center. Many deaths which are supposed to be accompanied by the most excruciating agony are almost painless, because only the outer nerves are affected. The most familiar example is death from burning. We imagine that to be burned alive is the most intense torture conceivable. I would rather be burned to death than die from many of the so-called "natural" causes. This is also true of the pain produced by cuts and bruises. Unless such cuts go very deep or the bruises are verv severe a death caused in this way, although distressing, is not as painful as that from many familiar diseases.

Most of the railroad and trolley-car accidents injure people in just this way. Death from such causes is more distressing to relatives. It is grievous to see a body mangled or cut and bruised. We dread such a death and imagine that it is the most painful. But for the victim of such an accident the actual pain is not as great as people fancy. A severe shock produces a dulling or numbing effect upon the system. This is a most merciful provision of nature. A man who falls from a high place is likely to be unconscious before he reaches the ground. The victims of railroad disasters as a rule have their senses dulled, and it is much the same with a person who is burned alive.

On the other hand, some diseases cause at the end the most intense agony. The most painful death a man can die is from tetanus or lockjaw. In this disease the nerve centers are so affected that the muscles are set or knotted together rigidly, so that the pain is acute. The disturbance in this ease directly affects the spinal cord, and this quickly spreads to the brain. It is impossible for any one who has never seen a death from lockjaw to appreciate the terrors of it. Fortunately this disease is rare. It is a mistake to believe that the most violent deaths are necessarily painful. As a rule whenever patients are violent they are delirious and unconscious of their pain.

The easiest death to die is where the patient is absolutely unconscious. That is to say, they pass from sleep, or a condition which closely resembles it, to death. The great majority of deaths occur in this way. In most diseases as the end approaches there is a gradual failing of the faculties, so that the end is quite painless.—Dr. A. P. Smith, in Journal of Hygiene.

The Conversation Corner

THESE pictures, sent us by a friend of the Corner, were provided by the courtesy of "Platt, photographer, Nantucket." They represent scenes in that grand old island on our Atlantic shore, whose unique beauty is only equaled by its interesting history. The quaint lanes may be recognized by those who have voyaged in vacation time to this kingdom in the sea, but the larger picture will require explanation—at least, in order to be understood by "off-islanders."

Anybody on Nantucket could tell you who its "Pilgrim Fathers" were and when they landed. Thomas Macy, accompanied by Edward Starbuck and Isaac Coleman, fleeing from persecution on the Merrimack, sailed across Massachusetts Bay, around "the bleak and stormy cape,"

> And on Nantucket's naked isle,
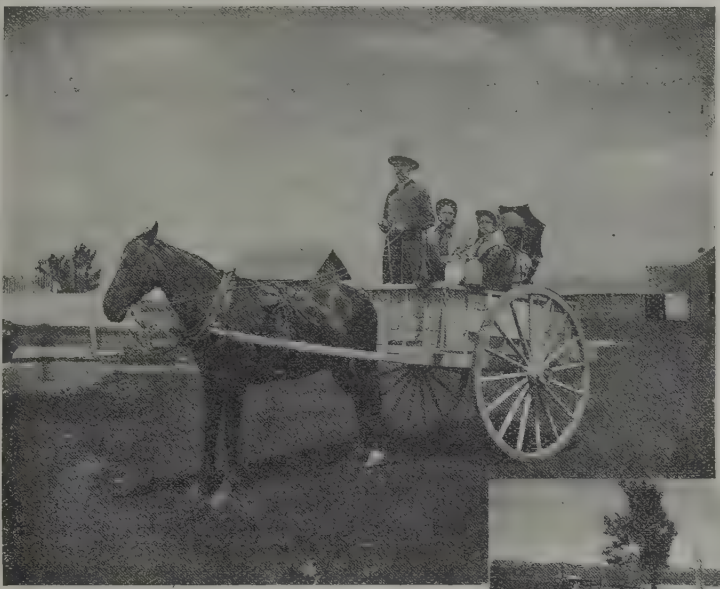
> Drew up his boat at last—as described, no doubt with some poetical license, in Whittier's "Exiles." That was in 1659. The island was then inhabited only by Indians and dogs. A little later the pioneer boatmen were joined by other families from the same region—Coffins (Tristram Coffin was a great man among them), Barnards, Mayhews, Husseys, Gardners, etc. Peter Folger came over from Martha's Vineyard because he was a surveyor and a "learned and pious" interpreter to the Indians. These and a few other names have continued common in the island to this day. Peter Folger's daughter was Benjamin Franklin's mother. It is said the highest genealogical honor is to be descended from the Coffins, through the Starbucks—or vice versa! A gentleman, who bears one of these names, told me the other day that he was descended from the other family in five different lines.

Almost from the first there were two great lines of industry. One was fishing, which ultimately became whaling,

> Until to every wind of heaven
> Nantucket's sails were spread.

After the discovery of petroleum, whale oil was no longer needed for light, and that immense business entirely disappeared. The other industry was raising sheep. This brings us to the picture. The sheep were pastured in common on the prairie-like lands of the island. The rest of the story is kindly furnished by one of our Corner members, who of course is descended from one of the families named above—perhaps from the Coffins, Starbucks, etc., also.



NANTUCKET, MASS.

My Dear Mr. Martin: The Nantucket shearing is not within my remembrance, having been given up in 1848. But I obtained a good account of it from relatives who lived during those glorious times when the whale fishery was at its hight and the shearing was the principal event of the year. It was held as near the 20th of June as possible, so that the washing of the sheep could be done on Friday and Saturday, leaving Sunday for the sheep to dry their wool; the shearing would then be on Monday and Tuesday. Those were gala days for all the island. The people dressed in their best clothes, rode in the old two-wheeled carts—like the one in the picture you sent me—out to Miacomet Pond, southwest of the town, and one of the loveliest spots on the island.

The sheep from the eastern and from the western parts of the island were driven by their owners to this pond. Here were built a great many pens, as in the picture. A clerk counted the sheep as they were driven in and recorded the number after the owner's name. Each man was allowed sheep according to his land. If it was found that he had more sheep than his land would feed, he must either buy more land or get rid of his sheep.

There were tents scattered about over the grounds. Some were used for dancing to the music of "Blind Frank's" fiddle. This old man lived somewhere "on the Cape," as Nantucket people call Cape Cod, and, with a queer character called Barney Gould, always came to the Nantucket shearing. There were other tents where "shearing buns," lemonade and other delicacies were sold. Each owner provided a huge dish of baked beans and pork for his shearers.

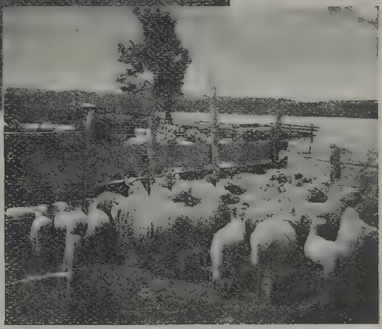
As time went on the men who owned the most sheep did not own any land, and as the land owners naturally did not want other people's sheep pastured on their land, a great deal of quarreling ensued, which at last brought about the abandonment of the sheep raising to a great extent, although small flocks have been kept ever since. In those times the sheep roamed over the commons at will, and even came into the town, where they became a great nuisance. People had to have high fences around their gardens to keep them out, and even then some of the sheep would open the gates with their horns and walk in. At one time from seven to ten thousand sheep lived on the commons. Without fences driving over the commons is beautiful in summer and autumn.

Yours truly, JULIA B.

There was still another thing to be explained. The photograph from which this cut was taken had inscribed on the cart these strange words:

> 'Twas "tew I can't and tew I can,"
> All the way to the shearing pen!

What could this mean? At last I found a poem, written in 1844, called "The Harper," describing the arrival of the fiddler from "coofdom" (that is, from the mainland, or the "continent") and his part in the festival, every stanza ending with the same refrain. This is one example:



> Coppers from many a hand were wrung,
> As wading through the sand he sung:
> 'Tis "tew I can't and tew I can,"
> All the way to the shearing pen!

After considerable inquiry I received this from our Nantucket correspondent:

I am glad to be able to tell you at last on good authority the meaning of the couplet, "Tew I can't and tew I can." Blind Frank could play only two dancing tunes. Being a "coof," he pronounced two, tew, and can, ken. There were no more than these two lines. The dancing tunes had no words.

I suppose there is not room now to tell you of my Nantucket vacation twenty years ago: boarding with Captain Nickerson, the last survivor of the famous whale-wrecked ship "Essex" (when the crew were in an open boat eighty-seven days); driven over to "Sconset" by Captain Fisher and sailed to the "Haul-over" by young Hussey and the principal of the Admiral Sir Isaac Coffin School (who proved to be a schoolmate of mine in early boyhood); visiting Ratliffe, the old British sailor who was on the "Bellepheron," which carried Napoleon to St. Helena, and—that was a memorable week!

Lesson for Feb. 7. Acts 4: 32–5: 11.

TRUE AND FALSE GIVING.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D. D.

The first great obstacle to the growth of the new church came from its enemies without. We have seen how their first attack was repulsed. The second great obstacle arose within the church. This lesson tells us how it was met and overcome. But in order to appreciate the gravity of the trial and peril we have set before us:

I. A picture of the prosperous church. It is a special privilege to belong to a new church. Its members all know one another. They are interested in one another's welfare. Their communion is delightful. Their sacrifices for the church are sweetened by their fellowship. This first Christian church, many of whose members had been personally acquainted with Jesus, must have been a community with rare experiences. The light and warmth of the Holy Spirit pervaded its meetings.

These Christians do not seem in the first few years to have apprehended clearly the missionary charge which Christ left with them [Acts 1: 8]. They still tarried in Jerusalem. But many of them were poor, while others were well to do. They remembered the words of the Lord Jesus, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." The church needed money, and contributions were liberally made in the very spirit in which God gave to them all. This generous giving won attention and admiration. It helped to spread the gospel, because it showed what characters were produced by the gospel. Among these noble givers was a real estate owner named Joseph. He was filled with the Holy Spirit and a man of influence. He knew how to say the right word at the right time to comfort, encourage and lead forward the brethren. After a while they came to call him Barnabas, which means one who leads and consoles. He saw the pressing need for money. Moved by the Holy Spirit, he sold some of his real estate and laid the proceeds at the feet of the apostles to be used for the church. That instance of true giving, with others, led to:

II. The first apostasy in the church. That was a startling instance of false giving. It consisted in:

1. Surrender to Satan. The facts were these: A married couple, presumably young, had united with the church. They were impressed by the generous gift of Barnabas and the esteem he received. They owned land also. They, too, had already names as full of meaning as the one the people had given Joseph. Ananias meant "favored of the Lord." Sapphira meant "beautiful," Why should not their influence be as great as that of Barnabas? They talked together about it. They agreed to sell some land, as Barnabas had done, and lay the price of it at the apostles' feet. But they thought they could get the credit of generosity and the influence which would come from such a gift, and yet privately retain part of the money. They tried their plan and thus permitted Satan to fill their hearts. They sold themselves to him and set their price as truly as Judas sold Jesus to his enemies for a fixed sum. They did what is often done in the church today.

2. Setting a price on the Holy Spirit. They wanted to be filled with the Spirit as Barnabas was. They thought, as later on Simon of Samaria thought, that they could buy the Holy Spirit and use the purchase to make a great impression on others. They thought they could, in making a gift, drive a sharp bargain for the greatest gift. Is it unusual now for men in the church to show a devotion and generosity which they do not feel in order to gain influence and a reputation for goodness? Often when the contribution box goes round Ananias and Sapphira are glad that no Peter is at hand to ask them, "Tell me whether ye sold the land for so much."

3. Pride and covetousness. They cared more for the applause of men than for the approval of Christ—more for the good opinion of others than for the character which deserves it. But they cared most for money. They sought to buy popularity and power and not pay for them. Money is a good thing. It opens the way to great opportunities, enjoyments and power to bestow blessings on our fellowmen. But when it is sought for selfish ends, the love of it becomes a root of every kind of evil. All classes are exposed to the temptation. The poor may be as covetous as the rich, and often are more so, charging God and society with withholding unjustly from them what they most crave.

4. Lying to God. Ordinary lying destroys confidence among men. It kills business. It undermines government. It ruins character. The hard times of the last few years are largely the consequence of lying for gain. But this sin of Ananias was more than ordinary lying. It was an attempt to cheat the Holy Spirit while professing to be controlled by him. If it had succeeded it would have placed the new church in a false position before the world. It would have undone the work which Christ came to do. No professing Christian can pretend to be what he is not for the sake of winning respect for his Christian character and influencing men to be good, without destroying himself and lying to God.

III. The punishment of apostasy. We may find in what followed this act of Ananias and Sapphira answers to questions often asked now.

1. Who executed punishment for this sin? Not Peter. He pronounced no judicial sentence. He simply announced the fact of Ananias's sin. He must have been as awed as were the other disciples at the sudden death of the culprits. The shock of discovery, suddenly revealing their sin in its true character, arrested the vital currents of their lives, and they sank down in a swoon which ended in death. God executed the judgment on them, which suggests and illustrates the fatal blow that must fall on all unforgiven souls when the true nature of their sins is fully revealed to them, "at the revelation of the Lord Jesus from heaven, with the angels of his power in flaming fire, rendering vengeance to them that know not God, and to them that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus; who shall suffer punishment, even eternal destruction from the face of the Lord and from the glory of his might."

2. What was its purpose? It was to bless the church and the world. The lightning that shatters the tree is destructive, but that is only incidental in importance to its great work of purifying the atmosphere. The whole church, in its beginning, needed the lesson taught by this display of divine displeasure on sin. The world, to whom the church was carrying the message of salvation, needed to know that the wicked cannot dwell in God's sight.

3. What was its effect? [v. 11] If such sins as this had passed unrebuked, the new stream of life flowing into the world would have been polluted at its source. The peculiar gift of the Holy Ghost to the new age would have been profaned by those who claimed to possess it. As Achan, stoned to death for covetousness and lying when the Jews entered the promised land, was a warning to the nation for ages, so even to this day the church is blessed by the judgment which fell on Ananias and Sapphira. The world still, through that testimony, acknowledges that Christ's followers renounce the sins of covetousness and hypocrisy, and still men believe that judgment at last is sure to be executed on liars and hypocrites by him who always abhors sin and loves righteousness.

BOOK REVIEWS.

HISTORY OF THE GERMAN STRUGGLE FOR LIBERTY.

Readers of Harper's Magazine will recall Mr. Poultney Bigelow's recent papers upon this subject, which have been a conspicuous attraction to its readers. They have now been collected into two handsome volumes. They contain a graphic and picturesque study of German history from about 1806 to 1814, years crowded with events pregnant with significance to the then future of Germany. The salient features of political and military development are discriminated with good judgment, and are woven together into a narrative as scholarly as it is spirited. The style is more popular and vivacious than is common in works of this class, but its naturalness and enthusiasm add to the interest and value of the work.

It is largely, of course, a history of individuals. Recounting at the outset the story of the execution of John Palm, the bookseller, it also gives prominence to the character and story of Queen Louise of Prussia, and to those of Gneisenau, Scharnhorst, Yorck, Stein and Blücher, as well as of Frederick William III., king of Prussia, Alexander, the czar of Russia, and Napoleon I. Justice also is done to the educational and patriotic services of Jahn, Körner and others. Mr. Bigelow is frank and sometimes slashing in his criticisms, an enthusiastic admirer of patriotic wisdom, patience and gallantry, and having a natural and intense contempt for the political shufflings of the Prussian king and the military incompetence of many of his generals. His comments on the military qualities of Napoleon also are suggestive. Much has been written of late by others in regard to the alleged decay of Napoleon's powers after the retreat from Moscow. Mr. Bigelow believes that in general, when he conducted a battle himself, he displayed abilities equal to those of his best days, but that sickness, discouragement and the incompetence of his subordinates handicapped him heavily.

The especially valuable feature of the book is its portrayal of the gradual, determined and at last successful development, during the period described, of a military spirit generally prevalent, even among the peasantry, and of a military training inspired by lofty patriotism throughout a crushed and beaten nation. After Jena, which was simply the annihilation of the Prussian forces by Napoleon's armies, in spite of the gay confidence with which the incompetent Prussians had gone out to battle, Napoleon had literally trodden Prussia under foot for several years, treating it not only like a conquered province, in defiance of treaties, but subjecting it and its rulers to indignities and cruelties difficult to be believed were they not so abundantly established. But, owing to the enthusiasm and versatility of Gneisenau, Scharnhorst, Stein, Jahn and others, Prussia was lifted out of even so debased and depressed a political and moral condition, and, in spite of the cowardly subservience of her king to the least demand of the French emperor, elevated to the position of a well-disciplined and victorious military power.

Thus the foundation was laid for her future greatness. And it is noticeable that the idea of German unity, which was realized at the close of the Franco-Prussian war, was in the hearts of these popular leaders from the beginning of their endeavors. The work confirms, on the whole, the generally prevalent impression of most of its leading characters, Napoleon, Alexander, Frederick William III., Metternich, Talleyrand, Bernadotte and others. But it brings into deserved prominence the names of the German patriots, generals and statesmen whom we have mentioned already, to whom pre-eminently was owing the new growth of Prussian life and progress, and who have not always received the credit fairly due. Mr. Bigelow has traversed Germany frequently and in all directions, often in his canoe, not only studying the archives and other accredited sources of information but also visiting battlefields, acquainting himself with the recollections of surviving veterans or their children, and taking every pains to make his work a thorough and trustworthy treatise. That he also has rendered it more than ordinarily entertaining no reader will deny. It is illustrated freely and admirably and the two volumes are handsomely bound. [Harper & Bros. $5.00.]

RELIGIOUS.

The late Rev. John P. Coyle, D. D., who died while pastor of the First Congregational Church in Denver, about three years ago, was one of the most able men of his age in our ministry and had before him a brilliant future, not only in respect to distinction, but to what he prized unspeakably more highly, usefulness. A volume of his sermons, entitled The Imperial Christ [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.50], has just been issued, to which President Gates of Iowa College has supplied a biographical introduction. Dr. Coyle, undoubtedly, was regarded by many as dangerously radical in respect to theological belief, but no one can read these sermons without feeling that, although they are unconventional in phraseology and although doubtless he did not hold some of the doctrines of the fathers in their ancient form, the essential principles of the Bible, nevertheless, are honored and asserted, and some of the most characteristic of the old faiths are strongly emphasized. They illustrate the preaching of a man on fire with the spirit of a divine mission to his fellowmen, and comparatively careless of form provided he can get at the heart of things and impress his hearers for their good. We have found him, as here represented, far less in sympathy with so-called new views of truth than he has been charged with being and, although we should have expressed some things differently, we gladly concede the strength and beauty and Christian consistency of these discourses as a whole. The book will do much to add to his hold upon those who knew him and will extend his reputation among those who were strangers to him personally.——In connection with the several volumes of stories by Mrs. Stowe, to be mentioned below, appears a volume of her Religious Studies, Sketches and Poems [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.50]. This, too, in its own different way, appeals tenderly and powerfully to the Christian public, and many who do not call themselves Christians will enjoy it and be benefited by it.

American Presbyterianism in Its Development and Growth [Presbyterian Board of Publication and S. S. Work. 75 cents] is by Rev. Dr. R. M. Patterson. It is perhaps sufficient to describe it as a short, compact and clear statement of the history and character of Presbyterianism in this country, as viewed from the inside. Its facts are of general interest and it is a useful handbook which Presbyterians and many others will consult.——In the College of the Apostles [F. H. Revell Co. 75 cents] Rev. J. J. Vance, D. D., has furnished a series of character studies of the apostles with some lessons thereby suggested. He has endeavored to portray the apostles successively so as to make them seem real to readers of today and has attained a considerable degree of success. The book will help to interest young people as well as their elders in the personality of the disciples and in their work.——Prof. A. C. Zenos has written A Compendium of Church History [Presbyterian Board of Publication and S. S. Work. $1.00] and Prof. John Dewitt has furnished its introduction. The book apparently is intended to supply the ordinary needs of theological students and clergymen and a large number of the laity also will appreciate it. Its conciseness has caused some statements which need qualification, for example, its statement that the Jamestown Colony in Virginia prospered materially and increased in numbers, implying that its career from the first was successful. The original colony was practically abandoned, as a matter of fact, but was soon resettled and then was made a success. But, as a summary containing only the principal facts of church history, the book deserves commendation. It is as complete a work upon the subject as thousands of readers care for or need.

The Mosaic Authorship of the Pentateuch, by Dr. D. MacDill [W. J. Shuey. $2.00], is a restatement of the arguments for the traditional view and an attempted refutation of the opinions of many prominent scholars of today. The author traces their origin to the celebrated French philosopher, Voltaire, hoping thus to discredit them. Facts, however, must stand or fall according to their own merits. The absence of any further contribution to our knowledge makes the book unnecessary and of little value.——A Narrow Axe in Biblical Criticism, by Rev. C. L. Caverno [Charles H. Kerr & Co. $1.00], has an entirely different tone. He is far from accepting the views of the higher critics, but he treats them with all courtesy. The book is written in a broad and reverent spirit and abounds in suggestive thoughts. It cannot fail to be helpful to all its readers.

Two or three volumes on the Bible are at hand. One of them is entitled When, How and By Whom Was the Bible Written? [F. H. Revell Co. 75 cents]. The author is Rev. James Todd, D. D., and it answers these questions in a terse and readable manner, going somewhat into detail, and is serviceable.——Another is Helps to the Study of the Bible [Henry Frowde. 60 cents]. The successive books of the Bible are taken up and the important facts concerning them are stated, and there is a great deal of miscellaneous material touching the political conditions of the Bible lands, their geography, geology, botany, animals, etc., and concerning the Jewish nation, its customs and other characteristics. A small concordance is appended. The work is a comprehensive and useful compilation, although portions of it, notably the concordance, are, perhaps necessarily, printed in type too fine for most people's eyes.

The Preachers' Tool Basket [W. B.

Ketcham. 50 cents] is one of those commonplace aids for feeble ministers which any self-respecting person should be ashamed to use. It contains outlines of sermons, offered especially to those who have to prepare discourses at very short notice. Here is an example: "Learn of me. Mark 6: 29. Jesus is the great teacher, for he will teach us to know God, to love God, to serve God and to enjoy God." If any Congregational minister is so lacking in self-respect as to be willing to appropriate outlines which are not his own and so weak minded as to be unable to think out such an outline as that for himself, even at the shortest conceivable notice, he may be glad to buy this book. There is a limit beyond which the effort to help men to think for themselves becomes not only dangerous but foolish, and we believe this book to have passed it.——Object Lessons for Children [F. H. Revell Co. $1.25], by Rev. C. H. Tyndal, Ph. D., contains a number of short and well-conceived sermons for children. We like it very well and cheerfully commend it. It has a few illustrations.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

Rev. G. H. Emerson, D. D., has written a life of Alonzo Ames Miner, S. T. D., LL. D. [Universalist Pub. House. $2 00], the great Universalist leader in this region for the last half-century. Dr. Miner certainly was a remarkable man, singularly versatile in his powers, and deservedly honored and beloved even beyond the bounds of his own branch of the church. He was a distinguished preacher, a zealous reformer, an able organizer and executive and a prominent educator, serving for a term of years as the president of Tufts College. From every point of view he was a man of pronounced individuality, fearless, enthusiastic, aggressive and efficient in behalf of every cause which he believed to be good. That he was not always wise is no more true of him than of most other men possessing the same general characteristics, but that he often was unwise enough to permanently injure his credit no one will assert. Dr. Emerson has written a very interesting biography of him, a little repetitious and perhaps a little more eulogistic at times than calm judgment must approve, but, nevertheless, a clear, impressive and essentially faithful representation of his subject. Dr. Miner was one of the three or four great leaders in the Universalist denomination, Murray and Ballou perhaps being the two others who were in some respects his superiors. Beginning his ministry at a time when the Universalists were distrusted by evangelical Christians, and not without some reason apart from theological differences, inasmuch as their churches sometimes did not celebrate the sacraments and consisted of little more than loosely organized audiences, he lived to see the denomination become well knit together and largely efficient. And it was due preeminently to his own endeavors that he himself and his ministerial associates became respected as generally as other ministers. His portrait, which forms the frontispiece, is a fine likeness and suggests the stalwart and admirable character of the man. The volume is a valuable addition to Universalist literature in particular and to biographical works in general.

The Life of Roger Sherman [A. C. McClurg & Co. $2.00], by L. H. Boutell, is a clear and well-arranged volume, lacking somewhat in enthusiasm, but giving a calm and well-ordered record of the career of its distinguished subject. There is great value, in these days of superficial thinking and frequent political corruption, in volumes which set before young men thus plainly and impressively the sterling character and honorable fame of such self-educated, unselfish, large-minded and immensely useful citizens as Roger Sherman, and Mr. Boutell deserves praise for his work, which will do good service.——Under this same head may be fairly classified Mr. Curtis Guild's new book, A Chat about Celebrities [Lee & Shepard. $1.50]. It is the story of the author's "extension," in the now familiar manner, of his copy of the late Mr. James T. Fields's Yesterdays with Authors from one volume to four, by the insertion of portraits, manuscripts and other material relating to the persons there referred to. Many of them Mr. Guild has known personally and he has been exceptionally fortunate in securing memorials of others. The long index of the book contains a surprising number of distinguished names, and what he has to say about each is of interest in itself and is said in a delightful, companionable manner. He takes the reader into both his library and his confidence and the book is rich in exceptionally enjoyable material.

EDUCATIONAL.

Two volumes illustrating the late Prof. G. C. Robertson's philosophical work have been edited from notes of his lectures at University College in London by Caroline A. F. Rhys Davids. One is Elements of General Philosophy [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.00]. Professor Robertson was not only a profound scholar and an expert and successful teacher in his department, but was to some extent an original investigator. He was not in entire sympathy with the individualism of the last century and labored earnestly to show the continuous evolution of philosophical thought, believing that the evolutionary point of view must be adopted in order to give full value to the experientialism of the present, and that the best rationalistic teaching, especially that of Kant, also is of immense value in accomplishing the same result. The present volume includes seventeen lectures, in which are presented an outline history of Western philosophy and a study of its three main problems. Two lectures on logic and ethics complete the first part of the book. In the second part are ten special lectures intended to serve advanced students as a course of reading. The specialist in this line, to whom of course such a work chiefly appeals, will prize the book as embodying the conscientious and valuable labor of a competent and discriminating scholar. The other volume, which should be read in connection with the foregoing, is Professor Robertson's Elements of Psychology [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.00]. It is offered not merely as an introduction to psychology and also to philosophy, but also, as the editor remarks, as an introduction to philosophy by way of psychology, more especially to philosophy under the aspect of theory of knowledge (epistemology) by way of the psychology of the process of coming to know. The volume is an elementary treatise, but none the less to be commended for its ability.

The Method of Darwin [A. C. McClurg & Co. $1.00], by Frank Cramer, is a careful study of Darwin's works as a basis for an analysis of scientific method. It was wise to select the writings of a single author for the writer's purpose, and it is important that the method of such a scholar as Darwin should be comprehended as thoroughly as the results which it has enabled him to reach. The author has not endeavored to discuss Darwin's method exhaustively but suggestively, and he has done this with sufficient clearness and fullness to render the work well worth respect.——Kindergarten Principles and Practice [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.00], by Kate Douglas Wiggin and Nora A. Smith, is well described by its title. It is a thorough and sensible, and at the same time a bright and inspiring, study of kindergarten work, in its purposes, methods and results. The value of kindergarten schools may be said to have been triumphantly demonstrated long ago, and such a treatise as this will do much to extend their usefulness.——Suggestions for Kindergarten Work [C. W. Bardeen. 50 cents], by Marion Strickland, is a small book in the same line. It condenses into brief compass a great deal of valuable material and will be found practically serviceable.

Studies in Historical Method [D. C. Heath & Co. 70 cents] is by Mary S. Barnes. This, too, is a little book, but not less useful on that account. It is eminently practical, and points out how method is, or ought to be, determined by the nature of history, by the historic sense and by the aim of historical study, and how the principles of method should be applied to history in our high schools. There is also a short but valuable bibliography of volumes about method.——Another school History of the United States [Silver, Burdett & Co. $1.04] has been compiled by Dr. W. A. Mowry and Mr. A. W. Mowry. It is necessarily too much condensed for reading use, but is a fine example of successful presentation of the distinguishing facts in our national career. The topical arrangement has been followed, yet without needless sacrifice of chronology. The material of the book seems to be well proportioned, the style is good, it is illustrated lavishly and well, and an admirable feature is the introduction in marginal notes of extracts from historical authorities, often original. The book seems to be more than ordinarily well adapted to actual use.——Mrs. Elizabeth S. Kirkland's series of Short Histories, which we have had occasion to commend more than once, has been supplemented by a Short History of Italy [A. C. McClurg & Co. $1.25], which begins as far back as 476 A. D. and comes down to 1878. It is notably readable and tells the story of Italy, being not intended for study and recitation, although it might be so used, so much as for the impartation of knowledge by absorption. The style is popular and often graphic and we have noticed no inaccuracies. It tells clearly and entertainingly the story of Italy, which in some of its features is exceptionally picturesque as well as valuable.

Mr. C. A. Hobbs has prepared The Elements of Plane Geometry [A. Lovell & Co. 75 cents], having had carefully in mind the aim to develop the reasoning faculty of the pupil rather than the memory, yet without putting upon the student more than his mind justly may be expected to master. Educators will find the book thoroughly worthy in its way.——The Earth and Its Story [Silver, Burdett & Co. $1.00] is by Prof. Angelo Heilprin. It is a first book about geography. It blends scientific knowledge, simplicity of method and intelligibility of language very successfully and its illustrations are as superior in excellence as they are abundant in number. It is a compact and rewarding treatise, which embodies the features most desirable in such a work in an unusually successful degree.——The issue of the ninth edition of Mr. R. P. Williams's Laboratory Manual of Inorganic Chemistry is evidence of the successful adaptation of the work to the purpose which it was intended to fulfill. An examination of it will intensify this conviction. It treats one hundred topics in general, qualitative and quantitative chemistry in a learned but lucid fashion.——Two more volumes in the Studies in English Classics, edited by Dr. H. B. Sprague, are Shakespeare's Tempest and his Midsummer Night's Dream [Silver, Burdett & Co. Each 60 cents]. They are out in the familiar form with tasteful type and scholarly notes.——Part I. Autumn [Ginn & Co. 35 cents], edited by Francis L. Strong, is the opening number of All the Year Round, a reading-book about nature for children. It introduces them simply and pleasantly to many animals and plants and is well illustrated.

Messrs. Ginn & Co. also send us Preparatory Latin Composition, by Mr. F. P. Moulton, aided by Mr. W. C. Collar. The book is intended to supplement daily work in translation and to promote intelligent mastery of the peculiarities and even the intricacies of the language. It is thoroughly up to date in all respects.——Some of the material of Greek Inflection, published ten years ago, has been reproduced by Mr. B. F. Harding in the Strong and Weak Inflection in Greek [Ginn & Co. 60 cents]. An appendix is added upon Latin inflection. It deals with fundamental principles in a practical and expert fashion.——Two more volumes of Heath's Modern Language Series are Le Conscrit de 1813, by Erckman-Chatrain, edited by Prof. O. B. Super, and Bataille de Dames, by Scribe and Legouvé, edited by Prof. B. W. Wells, Ph. D. [65 and 25 cents]. They are furnished with sufficient but not superfluous notes, and the former of the two volumes has a vocabulary. They will do good service as readers.——Prof. C. B. Goold also has prepared a volume of Tales from Hauff [Ginn & Co. 80 cents], issued after much the same method and intended and adapted to do similar service for the student of German.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A course of popular patriotic lectures, by Rev. David Gregg, D. D., has been gathered into the volume Makers of the American Republic [E. B. Treat & Co. $1.50]. They have been delivered in public with large acceptance. They are full of a sturdy patriotism and they set forth an interpretation and application of history which in the main is trustworthy and which cannot fail to have a valuable influence, but it is to be regretted that greater accuracy was not attained in respect to some facts. Who would suppose, for example, that this author would repeat the old and repeatedly exposed slander, that the Puritans burned witches! It was bad enough to hang them, but this is the worst which the Puritans did. Moreover, does he really mean that "throughout the nations of Europe they were burned by the thousands and tens of thousands"? There is more to be said in favor of the new theory, that the Pilgrims owed many of their important institutions to the Dutch, which Dr. Gregg seems to accept for substance, but he has left an exaggerated impression in this respect. We question, also, the wisdom of introducing the story of the Courtship of Miles Standish into such a series of lectures, as if it were a definitely known fact, and especially as a conscious and deliberate illustration by Standish of a Biblical example.——Dr. David Gregg also has been furnishing a series of addresses to young people to the Treasury Magazine. A number of these have been gathered into a book, Ideal Young Men and Women [E. B. Treat & Co. 50 cents]. They are wholesome, practical talks, graphic in manner, sensible in substance and elevating in tendency. They read as if they might have been Sunday evening sermons. They will do the older boys and girls substantial good.——Messages of Today to the Men of Tomorrow [American Baptist Publication Society. $1 50] is a somewhat similar volume of addresses by Rev. Dr. George E. Lorimer. They are brilliant in some respects and deal in a practical, striking way with useful themes. Such subjects are discussed as Cherishing Noble Ambitions, Migrating to the City, Seeking Something for Nothing, Cultivating a Love of Books, Dealing Honestly with Time, and they embody the fruits of wide reading and considerable active thinking.

Mr. Charles Dudley Warner's papers, which have been such conspicuous features of the Atlantic Monthly and the Century of late, have been gathered into a volume, The Relation of Literature to Life [Harper & Bros. $1.50]. The title essay, however, has not been printed before, but has been read as a lecture at several conventions. The freshness and conscientiousness of Mr. Warner's thinking, his large experience of life, his wide knowledge of literature and the grace of his language render such a volume from his pen pre eminent at once. Other topics discussed in the work are: Equality, What Is Your Culture to Me? Modern Fiction, the Novel in the Common School, etc. The book is full of delight to the present reader, and should be kept at hand in the library for the equal enjoyment of the future.——The third series of Mr. Austin Dobson's Eighteenth Century Vignettes [Dodd, Mead & Co. $2 00] deals with literary persons, most of whom are not famous, yet all of whom deserve commemoration, and literary subjects equally full of interest. Such a paper as that on Dr. Richard Mead's library, with a portrait of the collector, is of special interest to all who love books, and the paper on Thomas Gent, the printer, which also has a portrait, is a biographical sketch of a remarkable man. The contents of the work all have been printed before, mostly in periodicals. The portrait of Charles Lamb is one of the best which we have seen.

NOTES.

—— For a Socialist, and a leader among them, the late William Morris left a somewhat inconsistent fortune—over $200,000.

—— The British Museum reports additions during 1896 to the number of 234,337 books and pamphlets—a large library in themselves.

—— A volume dealing with the life and speeches of the late Governor Greenhalge of Massachusetts is in preparation. Mr. J. R. Nesmith is the author.

—— New magazines continue to appear in England, and most of them live and appear to prosper. The English were somewhat late in acquiring the taste for the popular magazine, but now they hardly can satisfy it sufficiently.

—— A subscription list has been opened at the Boston Public Library for the purchase of a bust of Sir Walter Scott to be placed in the Poets' Corner of Westminster Abbey. It is supplementary to a similar one opened in England.

—— The Critic thinks that "by the death of the late Horatio Hale, which occurred at Clinton, Ont., on Dec. 29, ethnology has lost a man who contributed more to our knowledge of the human races than perhaps any other single student."

—— A contributor to the British Weekly shows that twenty years ago Samuel Neil of Edinburgh, in his notes in the Library edition of Shakespeare's works, gave the same interpretation of Falstaff's dying words which Mr. Locke Richardson, through The Critic and other journals in this country, has been claiming as a new and ingenious interpretation.

—— A papyrus manuscript containing a number of the lost odes of Bacchylides, a contemporary of Pindar, has come to light, apparently in the British Museum. Only about a hundred scattered lines from his pen were known to exist before. Now about five hundred consecutive lines and nearly as many more in separate but not irreconcilable fragments have been added to them. The author was one of the most important of the minor poets.

Dr. Arthur H. Pierce, '88, the first incumbent of the Kellogg fellowship at Amherst College, having completed the required three years of study abroad, is about to begin at Amherst his lectures in the department of philosophy. He will deliver not less than thirty in each of the four years remaining of his incumbency. This fellowship, providing thus for seven years full support of one incumbent and also for the publication of his lectures in book form, constitutes a valuable endowment of research, and is one of the richest prizes offered to high scholarship by any American institution.

Congregationalism in Greater Boston.

The First Anniversary of the New Church Union Successfully Celebrated.

The meeting in the Old South Church chapel last Thursday evening has never been approximately paralleled in the history of Boston Congregationalism. The audience of over 200 was composed chiefly of pastors and lay delegates from most of the ninety-nine churches within a radius of ten miles from the State House. They were summoned through a letter missive sent out by the Congregational Church Union of Boston and Vicinity, which desired to submit its work for the past year to the scrutiny of the churches whose instrument it wishes to be, and to receive from them their Godspeed in the larger work to which it hopes to address itself. It was worth much to see so fine a representation of local Congregationalism. The churches had evidently selected their delegates from among their leading men, and the presence of well known and successful merchants, lawyers and physicians, as well as of a large number of younger men who are coming forward to bear burdens in church and state, was in itself a cheering sign of the reserve strength and vitality still characteristic of Boston Congregationalism. The pastors, moreover, were there in large numbers, especially the Back Bay and suburban contingent of them.

Be it remembered, first of all, that this was not a gathering for a dinner or for social ends, but for illumination, deliberation and consolidation of forces. It is to be hoped that it may become a precedent for future years. Once a year, surely, is not too often for the messengers of the churches to gather by formal appointment and consider the problems that are before them as a denomination.

Pres. S. C. Darling of the Union reviewed its labors since it was incorporated nine months ago, spoke of the practical sympathy extended to Leyden Church, of the efforts in behalf of the Swedish Church, of the inquiry by committees into the needs of Berkeley Temple, and of other subjects of inquiry and discussion which had come before the executive committee of eight business men, who meet on an average once a month.

Dr. Dunning emphasized the hopefulness of the present outlook, pointed out special cases where the union might be of service in the way of pre-empting lots or even of restraining unwise undertakings, and urged the necessity of strengthening, first of all, our local forces. Dr. W. H Davis spoke from a knowledge of what similar organizations are accomplishing in Western cities, urged that greater prominence be given the principle of fellowship, and deprecated the let-alone policy, which he considered as harmful in religious activity as in other departments of human industry. Dr. Reuen Thomas spoke with particular appreciation of down-town work with which his London pastorate made him familiar. He thought that persons leaving such churches and societies should, if possible, contribute to their endowment, and declared his hearty belief in the Congregational polity both as apostolic in its origin and as suited to our own times

Dr. Gordon said that the Union would commend itself to the churches in proportion as judgment, thoroughness and statesmanship marked its deliberations and activities. He believed that there was a great field for this work. Dr. Gordon did not refer, though other speakers did, to the generous part which the Old South has had during the last thirty years in extending and sustaining Congregationalism hereabouts. In that period for every dollar of trust funds given away it has raised more than two dollars from its own members. Probably the aggregate of the Old South benevolences in that time would amount to nearly a million dollars. In a true sense it is our cathedral church, and what it is doing on a large scale may well be imitated by other churches whose resources are not so great but which still owe a duty to their sister churches. The Union cannot, of course, expect to do anything like what the Old South does, but it may become its efficient ally in working together harmoniously for common ends.

The main feature of the evening was the report presented by Rev. W. E. Barton, D. D., and prepared by him and three of his ministerial brethren. Never has there been such a complete, exact and suggestive inquiry into the actual condition of our churches in and around Boston. Many hours of labor were expended upon the report and the figures are of great value to other denominations as well as to our own. We therefore surrender a generous portion of space for the main section of the report.

It began with a glowing tribute to Boston as the spring and center of our Congregational work and passed on to justify the existence of the Church Union as necessary to relieve the Home Missionary Society from their local work and as also necessary because the City Missionary Society limits its operations to the city proper and confines them principally to labor among the poor. The report went on as follows:

In time past the theory of our church organization has been something like this. If, in a given community, there are people of Congregational faith who want a church, and they are able to build one and pay the bills, they may do so, and that's the end of it. They will call a council, to be sure. The pastors and delegates will assemble and examine the confession of faith prepared by the brethren and the chicken salad and cold turkey provided by the sisters, and ask their stock questions and keep their misgivings, if they have any, to themselves, and let the new enterprise live if it can. This Spartan treatment of exposing our infants on the rocks has made tough youngsters, but now and then one gets cold and dies, and we complacently remark that we never really expected that church to live, and we look on in peace while a Methodist or Episcopal church is erected on its site.

And when a church gets weak, through removals or a shifting of population, it has thrown upon it the burden of deciding for itself how long it must maintain its struggle, and how it is to provide means for its support in a place where it was founded in answer to a divine call, but where it never was so much needed as now.

To be sure, benevolent individuals and other churches and the Home Missionary Society have all assisted in both these classes of cases. Figures now for the first time obtained show that the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society has in the last twenty-five years—and practically that period represents all that it has done in and about Boston—spent the following sums: For native work in Boston, $100,722, almost all in the last ten years from a special fund; for foreign work in Boston, $30,760. Total for work in Boston, $118 681. For work in the vicinity of Boston, $65,154. Total for all work in Boston and vicinity for twenty-five years, $196,636.

The Swett Fund of the Home Missionary Society has practically all been used here, and is now nearly exhausted. The Old South has given $300,000 to Boston Congregationalism in the last twenty-five years. But the burden has been most unequal in its distribution, and the support, both moral and financial, has often been less than has been deserved. It is perfectly evident that the ideal condition has not been attained.

That we may not speak in generalities, let us turn to the statistics that have been carefully gathered for this purpose. This is believed to be the best and most accurate collection ever made for this purpose in Boston, Taking the Metropolitan Water District as our area, the following is true of the six leading denominations during the past ten and twenty-five years. In this district are the following twenty-eight cities and towns: Boston, Nahant, Swampscott, Lynn, Saugus, Revere, Winthrop, Chelsea, Everett, Malden, Melrose, Wakefield, Stoneham, Woburn, Winchester, Medford, Somerville, Cambridge, Belmont, Arlington, Lexington, Waltham, Watertown, Newton, Brookline, Hyde Park, Milton, Quincy.

*The Unitarians do not register their membership or benevolence.

These things deserve remark as between the ten and twenty-five year periods.

1. That both Methodists and Episcopalians, who have gained rapidly during the twenty-five year period as a whole, have gained less rapidly in proportion to population in the last ten years. The Methodist decrease of proportionate gain has been most apparent in membership where, taking the twenty-five year period as a whole, the gain was much in excess of population (107 to 97 per cent.) and for the last ten years considerably less than the gain of population (30 per cent. to 37). But the Episcopalian decrease of gain, while nearly the same ratio as to membership (97: 122 and 34: 37) shows particularly in benevolence, where with an increase of benevolence of 29 per cent. for the whole period, the last ten years have shown a net loss in benevolence of $7,695 or 7 per cent.

2. The most marked percentage of gain has been that of the Presbyterians, and has been almost wholly in the last ten years. They gained but one church and 401 members in the first fifteen years, and have gained seven churches with 1,645 members in the last ten years. Their total membership, however, is still exceedingly small, being less than one-tenth that of either Baptists or Congregationalists, but they are growing rapidly. Their growth is very largely from the Provinces, which afford continual reservoir of strength, but the increase of this body in New England is significant, and is an evidence of the strength of a centralized body in planting new enterprises.

3. The proportion of church membership as a whole is keeping pace, and apparently more than keeping pace, with the growth of population. Exact figures cannot, of course, be given without having at hand the statistics of all denominations, the smaller as well as the larger, but there is an apparent increase of considerable size, and chiefly in evangelical churches.

4. The Baptist churches have made the largest positive gain in membership. And this gain has been most marked in the last ten years. They have gained more rapidly than the population, which is true of no other large body in the latter decade (37 to 47 per cent.), though none have fallen far behind the population. It would seem that the period of greatest prosperity for the Unitarians had been prior to this twenty-five year period, of the Methodists and Episcopalians in the first and second decades of it, and of the Baptists in the last few years. It should be marked, also, that the Baptist gain in benevolence has more than kept pace with their growth in membership. Nothing lies like figures, but if figures are ever to be trusted, this is just now, or has just been, the ascendant body in Boston. Dr. A. J. Gordon was the Phillips Brooks of this denomination. Whether these gains are to continue in like ratio is not certain.

5 The Congregational statistics are far more encouraging than is sometimes thought. Our percentage of gain has been slightly smaller than the Baptists, Episcopalians or Methodists, but we had a larger membership to start with, and it takes more to give a percentage of gain on a large beginning. Our positive gains have been greater in number of churches, and in membership they have been greater than any except the Baptists, and within a few hundred of them Immigration is a fruitful source of increase to Baptists, Methodists and Episcopalians. Almost all our Congregational growth is native. Taking this into account, our gains are probably the largest of all in native growth. Our benevolence is more than twice as large as any of the others. We have almost, but not quite, kept pace with the population, and have been holding our own as well in the last decade as in any portion of the twenty-five year period. Our gains have not fluctuated like the rest, but have been steady and continuous. And we still have the largest membership and the largest number of churches of any denomination within the district. Though having the Baptists for a close second, and the Episcopalians and Methodists well round the turn, Congregationalism comes under the wire a full neck ahead in number of churches, in church membership, in financial strength and in benevolence.

Clearly this is not discouraging. But there are conditions now confronting us which are modern, and which call for the application of other methods, in part, than those which have made this excellent record possible; for it must be remembered that we have not kept our proportionate rank. The new conditions which confront us have grown out of our rapid development of the suburbs through means of rapid transit, and the consequent opening of new fields on the one hand and depletion of old ones on the other.

At this point the report spoke of the newer openings for the denomination at Field's Corner, Roslindale, Brookline, Winthrop Beach and Savin Hill. It continued as follows:

In the matter of the down-town churches, statistics have been gathered from five Boston churches—Maverick in East Boston, Phillips in South Boston, Winthrop in Charlestown, Park Street in the business section of the city proper and Shawmut in the South End. The general facts concerning them are believed to be representative of all our down-town churches. In the last ten years one of these has had a net decrease of 34 per cent. in membership; three others have lost respectively 18, another 17, another 14, and the remaining church has gained 5 per cent. The difference is accounted for in part by the different methods of keeping up the roll and the revisions to drop members long absent. The same general causes have been at work in all. The total membership of these five churches in 1886 was 3,408, and in 1895 was 2,892, a loss of 516 This is the net loss. The gross loss has been very great, as will hereafter appear. During this period these five churches have had 2,199 additions, of which 1,235, a very large majority, were on confession. Taken as a whole, the additions to these churches were more numerous in the first half than in the second half of this decade, but there were 13 per cent. more additions on confession in 1895 than in 1886. It must be conceded that, considering their disadvantages, these churches have done well to show a net loss of only 15 per cent.

These five churches have lost, in the last ten years, 473 by death, 1,211 by letter and 796 by revision of the roll, a total of 2,480. If to this be added the present absent membership of these churches, 993, which is as really lost to them as if it had been dismissed, the total loss in this last decade is 3,473, or sixty-five more than their total membership ten years ago.

When it is remembered that these churches are losing their entire membership once in ten years, and that of the people who constitute their present congregation somewhat more than 20 per cent. drop out each year, it may well be asked whether these five churches have not done bravely to maintain themselves and to carry on their work with such vigor as they have manifested in this last decade.

Another striking thing should be mentioned. It is shown that of all the losses by letter a clear majority have gone to other churches in and about Boston, and almost invariably to stronger churches. Moreover, this army of absent members is, to a great extent, accounted for in like manner. Statistics on this point are manifestly less certain than concerning actual dismissions, which are matters of record. But it appears probable that more than half the absent members of those churches that have revised their rolls within this period are in other and usually stronger churches in and about Boston.

The decrease in wealth in these churches is clearly shown by the decrease in benevolence. It has fallen off from $38,428 in 1886 to $21,006 in 1895, a loss of 45 per cent. But in these ten years it aggregates $232,409, and represents not only a very respectable sum but a vast amount of heroic self-denial.

Let us remember this. The problems which confront us in our down-town churches are new. They are not peculiar to our own city or denomination. Other churches here and our own church elsewhere feel them. No city has solved the problem. We have not come this way hitherto. The questions are for us to settle today, and we must find a way.

Let us remember another thing. These churches are not on trial for their lives, but our method of sustaining down-town and weak churches is on trial. It is not Park Street, it is not Berkeley Temple, nor is it the pastor of Union nor of Maverick that is being weighed in the balance. The question is whether our Congregational churches ought not to adopt some more efficient means for maintaining churches of our faith and order in these localities.

The report concluded by showing how these churches were trying in their different ways to adjust themselves to their particular surroundings, that they are where they are not to demonstrate any particular theory, that it is missions and not churches that the people in their vicinity want, that if these churches seem expensive it must be remembered that a large part of their expenses admit of no substantial diminution.

BOSTON CITY MISSIONS.

At the eightieth annual meeting of the City Missionary Society, held last Monday afternoon, Treasurer S. F. Wilkins reported that the receipts for the regular missionary operations of the society, including a balance of $2,747 25 on hand at the beginning of the year, had been for all purposes, missionary and charitable, $49,793 70.

The secretary, Rev. D. W. Waldron, presented the eightieth annual report of the board of directors, from which we gather the following facts: the society was organized Oct. 9, 1816, and its early work consisted largely in establishing Sunday schools. Through its influence primary schools for children under seven years of age became in 1817 a part of the system of public education. To this society are due the earliest efforts in Boston, and probably in the world, to establish a preaching service for men of the sea when on shore, such a service having been commenced in 1818. In 1821 there was opened at the West End a mission house in which were anticipated many features of modern college settlements, and the same year the Refuge was founded, located at 32 Rutland Street, which is still doing excellent work. One hundred and forty-two missionaries have been in the service of the society during the past eighty years.

The following statistical statement of the labors and results for the past year was presented: 20 missionaries employed; 59,160 visits made to 20,205 families, 4,617 of the visits being to the sick; 600 Bibles and Testaments and 132,490 religious papers and tracts distributed; 237 persons induced to attend public worship; 895 children gathered into Sunday schools; 1,907 meetings held; employment secured for 541 persons; 9,361 garments given away; pecuniary aid afforded to 2,145 families at 9,281 times. Through the Fresh Air Fund there were distributed 50,772 street car tickets and 1,726 round trip harbor tickets, and 9,978 persons were permitted to enjoy a day's vacation or a visit in the country. At Thanksgiving 1,128 families were remembered.

During the past twenty-five years, as compared with the preceding quarter of a century, the years of missionary service advanced from 416 to 527; visits made from 858,136 to 1,204,890; different families visited from 174,705 to 333,283; children gathered into Sunday schools from 15,409 to 21,422; meetings held from 39,543 to 47,858; persons furnished employment from 5,171 to 12,766; families afforded pecuniary aid from 27,143 to 50,948. Several important missions have been planted, a successful work among the Chinese carried on, and there have also been established such charities as the Easter and Christmas missions, the Fresh Air Fund, the Thanksgiving dinner charity and the apple mission. The receipts the past twenty-five years for all purposes, missionary and charitable, were $455,064 09 against $206,604.41 the preceding twenty five years. The total receipts for all purposes since the organization of the society in 1816 have been $1,218,620 93.

I have no doubt but that before 1950 a life pension to all aged people born in Massachusetts and resident there through life will be a part of our system of righteous dealings with our own citizens.—Edward Everett Hale.

PASSING COMMENT ON THIS WEEK'S NEWS.

The modern attention to select church music has been brought to our notice of late. However, with hard times and more pressing calls for actual support of church work and worship, we hear of instances where the dismissal of highly paid soloists and quartets is only a matter of time. Such an outlook may presage a brighter era for congregational singing.

Among accessions to working forces, as gleaned from reports of the churches and worth chronicling, are: Twelve members in foreign missionary fields, twelve young men who have entered the ministry and six young women who have become ministers' wives.

No mushroom growth, but strong and solid as the everlasting hills, is that of the Iowa church which has built its edifice on the pay-as-you-go plan. In an important sense that house is founded on a rock.

The Minnesota churches which are agitating the question of consolidation set an example of what may be practical Christianity.

A lecture course such as that arranged by a Rhode Island church and conducted in a manner so widely helpful will go far beyond the matter of instruction.

An excellent movement to follow special services is a campaign of house to house visitation like that in progress in a California town.

Iowa contributes a suggestion for programs of annual meetings.

DR. MC KENZIE'S THIRTIETH MILESTONE.

Last Sunday was a memorable day in the old church at Cambridge, founded by Thomas Shepard 261 years ago. The noble building near the Washington elm is the sixth that the church has erected, and Alexander McKenzie, D. D., is its eleventh pastor. For 125 years this was the only church within the borders of what is now Cambridge.

From 1650 to 1829 its house of worship was in the college yard. The presence of Thomas Shepard is believed to have shaped the destinies of the colony. The college was founded here because Thomas Shepard was here. Its first Commencement in 1642 was held in the First Church. The covenant still used by the church was written by John Winthrop, who also wrote an account of the formation of the church, in 1636, at which he was present.

Eight years after leaving Harvard College Dr. McKenzie returned to Cambridge from his first pastorate of five years in Augusta, Me. His installation took place one winter day in the vestry of the former building, which was planned by Washington Allston. Professor Park preached the sermon. Dr. Kirk gave the right hand of fellowship. After five years the present building was dedicated, in 1872. A convenient chapel was afterwards built. Through the munificence of the family of the late Professor Horsford, a silver communion service, a brass lectern and memorial windows have been added.

This thirtieth anniversary has just been commemorated by the congregation by placing in the church a window especially in remembrance of Dr. McKenzie's pastorate. Affectionate mention was made in his address of those who had been his early friends and helpers in the church, who have now joined the glorious company beyond. For those who now work with him friendship, esteem and trust were expressed. A tender tribute was paid to the work and faithfulness of the young people. The large and well-organized Sunday school was mentioned, also the work of the women of the church for the needy at home and abroad.

The church and parish have borne their share in the affairs of city and State, and the loss during the year of the late ex-Governor Russell and his honored father—both former mayors of Cambridge—was recalled. The faithful ministry of Leonard S. Parker, D. D., who for ten years has been the beloved assistant pastor, was also mentioned. A grateful tribute was given to the one who for twenty-three years as sexton had ministered to his comfort—kind, courteous, trustworthy, honest. The solemnity of thirty years of service was mentioned impressively. "I am thankful that they have become a part of this ancient Puritan church," he said.

His closing words were from O. W. Holmes:

> Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
> As the swift seasons roll!

One of the hymns sung was also written by Holmes, "once a Sunday school boy here." The other hymn was written by the father, Rev. Abiel Holmes, D. D., a former pastor.

Following the morning service were the anniversary exercises of the Sunday school. A few words from several of the seven former superintendents were followed by words of greeting and flowers from representatives of the different departments of the school, to which the pastor responded.

The meeting of the Young People's Alliance was interesting in reminiscence. It grew out of a Tuesday evening prayer meeting for Sunday school teachers, formed thirty-two years ago, and became a young people's meeting with 150 members. It was re-organized some years later, and adopted rules and chose officers, and afterwards met on Sunday evenings. Former student members were gratefully named in connection with the good work done by them. Dr. McKenzie expressed his deep interest in the young people and his satisfaction in their work.

Following the alliance was a large meeting in the chapel, to which the young people remained. Hon. J. M. W. Hall presided. After the opening prayer by the assistant pastor, addresses were made by ex-Mayors Sanders and Bancroft, Hon. William B. Durant, Secretary F. A. Hill, Mr. Barrell and Frank Gaylord Cook, Esq., and letters were read from the Ladies' Societies. Many interesting historical statements were made, and worthy tributes were paid to Dr. McKenzie on account of his services in the community and the university as well as at Wellesley, Hampton and Andover.

Deacon Munroe read from the old record book Mr. McKenzie's letter accepting the call, thirty years ago, after which Dr. McKenzie spoke of his love for his first church and his grief at leaving it. He then spoke of his present congregation, of the good and able people constantly joining it. His audience has the look of youth, partly because students from Harvard and Radcliffe are present. There are many strong men in the congregation, and the work of this historic church is carried on in the spirit of its noble founders. K.

A FRUITFUL QUARTER-CENTURY.

The Eliot Church in Roxbury is this week taking suitable notice of Rev. Dr. B. F. Hamilton's long service in its pulpit. His historical sermon last Sunday, based on the text, "Having obtained help of God I continue until this day," set forth the salient facts in his ministry, paid honor to the men who have been instrumental in carrying forward the various branches of its usefulness, described the peculiar difficulties of the field arising from the rapid migration of the population, and expressed tenderly the deep affection and esteem which have marked all his labors.

It seems almost incredible that only twenty-five ministers beside Dr. Hamilton remain in active service in the same parish today in which they were stationed a quarter of a century ago, but this is only one of the many striking facts which Dr. Hamilton gleaned from consulting the official records. Eleven of the twenty-one ministers on the council which installed him have died, while of the ten still living only Dr. Herrick and Dr. Plumb are pastors in Boston. As respects the ebb and flow in the communion of his own church only 52 who were included in it in 1872 continue there today. Three colonies have gone forth to establish other churches. In all 271 letters of dismission have been issued. On the other hand, Dr. Hamilton has welcomed 405 new members, baptized 156 children, prepared over 2,500 sermons and brought the consolation of the gospel to 400 homes on funeral occasions. The benevolent gifts of the church in the period named amount to more than $95,000. The church has given six of her sons to the ministry, the city has found two of its mayors within the ranks of the Eliot congregation, and the commonwealth one of its governors.

The service last Sunday evening took on a reminiscent character, former members returning in good numbers. Among the speakers were Dr. Hamilton's brother, Rev. J. A. Hamilton, D. D., Messrs. William F. and Frank E. Day and ex-Mayor Edwin U. Curtis. The reception this week Wednesday evening completes the special services commemorative of this important anniversary.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.

Professor Goodell now begins a history of the English Bible.

CONFERENCES AND ASSOCIATIONS.

CAL.—Twenty-three of the 34 churches were represented at the Ministers' Meeting of Bay Conference, in Bethany Church, San Francisco, Jan. 12. Encouraging reports were given. The general subject, Modern Pentecosts, was discussed under the following heads: The Source of the Power, The Agents Employed, The Methods Appointed and Approved and The Historical Results of Revivals.

CLUBS.

MASS.—At the annual meeting of the Newton Club last week the address was given by Rev. Alexander McKenzie, D. D., on The Wheels and the Spirit. Mr. A. C. Farley was chosen president.

At the annual meeting of the Boston Club last Monday evening, Rev. W. E. Barton, D. D., was elected president and the chief address was made by Rev. S. L. Loomis, his topic being Forecasts. The treasurer's report showed a balance on hand of over $5,000. The report of the outlook committee was notably good and embodied this reference to international arbitration, which was afterwards adopted as the sentiment of the club:

> Resolved, That the Congregational Club of Boston hereby expresses its earnest approval of the arbitration treaty between this country and Great Britain. That such a treaty should be carefully made we have no doubt. We anxiously observe the delay of the Senate and earnestly desire that no mere incidental imperfection or technical objections may defeat the ratification of this bond of union between the two great English-speaking nations with a common heritage, a common literature and a common mission and message to the nations of the earth.

The 23d annual meeting of the Worcester Club was held Jan. 18. It was voted to extend the membership limit from 200 to 225 and all the vacancies were filled. The address of the evening was by Dr. Eldridge Mix on The Mission of Art. C. H. Hutchins, Esq., has been elected president.

The Essex Club met Jan. 25 in Salem for its annual meeting. Rev. W. C. Merrill spoke on Congregational Ideals.

MICH.—The Western Michigan Club, Jan. 18, considered Education and the Church. Prof. W. E. C. Wright of Olivet spoke on Relation of Church and College; Prof. A. J. Volland, Grand Rapids, on Relation of Church and Public Schools; and Prof. M. L. D'Ooge of Ann Arbor on Historical Relation of Christianity to Education. The old officers were re-elected for 1897—H. J. Hollister, Esq., president, Rev. R. M. Higgins, secretary.

MO.—The St. Louis Club held its first meeting for the present year, and the 61st since its organization, Jan. 18, at the Southern Hotel. Among the addresses was one by Mr. W. B. Homer on Ten Years of the St. Louis Congregational Club. He said that of the 71 men who attended the first meeting of the club ten years ago all were living with one exception, and 22 were still members of the organization. Mrs. W. M Jones, whose witty paper was regarded as the best of the evening, had for her subject Woman's Relation to the Congregational Club. Dr. J. H. George closed the program with an address upon An Ideal Club.

NEW ENGLAND.

Boston.

The Young Men's Congregational Club, which hitherto has held its meetings regularly the first Wednesday evening of the month, contemplates a change in accordance with the expressed desire of the majority of its members. Next month the meeting will be held the fourth Wednesday, Feb. 24, at the American House. The speakers will be Rev. G. A. Gordon, D. D., and Prof. A. B. Hart.

Park Street. The troubles which have for some time promoted division among the members of the church seem likely soon to culminate in the resignation of the pastor, Rev. I. J. Lansing. The society has made to him a proposition which he has signified his willingness to accept, and he has announced his purpose to offer his resignation, to take effect March 31. The society agrees to pay the pastor's salary in full to that time and for six months longer.

Mt. Vernon had an exceptionally large attendance at its recent annual meeting, and the review of the year in all departments was encouraging. An event of the occasion was the presentation of a loving cup to Deacon T. Y. Crowell in recognition of his 25 years of service. The general condition of the church is vigorous, and congregations of the morning and evening are steadily increasing. Dr. S. E. Herrick is pastor.

Shawmut. Dr. W. E. Barton takes up next Sunday with his Bible class The Neglected Books of the Bible, beginning with Revelation.

SOUTH BOSTON.—Phillips. A class for Bible study has been in successful operation for some months. It numbers 100 and is in charge of Rev. Lawrence Phelps. This systematic work is supplemented by special lectures from ministers and laymen. The Men's League has added greatly to the efficiency and interest of the Sunday evening service, besides promoting the social life of the church among the men. The Week of Prayer developed a widespread religious interest. The meetings have been continued, and will culminate in union services with all the evangelical churches of South Boston. Rev. C. A. Dinsmore is pastor.

NEPONSET.—Trinity. A "9.15 class" is organized to study the geography of Palestine, in connection with which the events and teachings at the various places will be taught. The pastor's Biblical and doctrinal class begins its annual course preparatory to the March communion. Cottage prayer meetings are a help to the regular church services. Rev. E. C. Webster is pastor.

Massachusetts.

CAMBRIDGE.—Pilgrim gives evidences of vigorous life and aggressive work. The auditorium, vestibules and vestries have been recarpeted, the vestries frescoed and settees displaced by new folding chairs. Under an efficient leader a large chorus is being organized, and is already doing excellent work. The attendance, interest and financial support are steadily increasing. Special services have been held during the month, and over 20 persons have expressed a purpose to begin the Christian life. The new pastor, Rev. F. E. Ramsdell, and his people are in thorough accord. The council to assist in his installation is called for Feb. 10.

SOMERVILLE.—Prospect Hill. The woman's societies have united, forming the Woman's Union, with six departments. A year's experience has proved that better results have been seen in spiritual, social, charitable and financial work than under the old way. An invalid wheel chair, owned by the church, is loaned to those needing it.

EVERETT.—First. The growth and work of the Sunday School are highly encouraging. The school numbers, including the home department, 1,010. The regular school has a membership of 815. For the past month the average has been 530. Rev. A. B. Patten is pastor.

NEWTON CENTER.—First, at its annual meeting Jan. 21, had a bountiful supper, at which the presence of the former pastor, Rev. T. J. Holmes, and his wife added enjoyment to the reunion. Encouraging messages were received from many absent members. Reports from all departments were cheering. The free seat plan provides amply for the current expenses. Twenty-two new families have entered the parish. A society for working girls was organized during the year. This is an anniversary year for the church, as its house of worship was built in 1847, and Dr. D. L. Furber, the pastor emeritus, was ordained 50 years ago, Dec. 1. Rev. E. M. Noyes is pastor.

NEEDHAM.—At the annual reunion and roll-call a large representation was present. The reports were encouraging, 69 having united on confession and 22 by letter. Rev. A. S. Walker, D. D., is pastor.

SALEM.—Tabernacle. Rev. Dr. DeWitt S. Clark preached a sermon last Sunday suited to the 18th anniversary of his settlement. Next day the congregation and many other friends, having learned that the pastor and his wife were quietly celebrating their silver wedding by themselves, dropped in on them with exquisite bouquets and other gifts, to which the school board, on which Dr. Clark has served for several years, added a magnificent set of candelabra.——An interdenominational rally of the churches of Essex South Conferences was held at the Tabernacle Church, Jan. 22, with a large attendance. Systematic Beneficence was presented in very able addresses by Drs. Wright, Taylor, Barbour and Crane, Mrs. A. J. Gordon, Rev. W. G. Puddefoot, Hon. H. M. Moore and S. M. Wilkins, Esq. The exercises of the day were cumulative in their impression and closed with an evening meeting, at which Drs. J. L. Barton and H. C. Mabie of the Congregational and Baptist Foreign Missionary Boards made powerful appeals, showing the opportunities and obligations of world-wide evangelization. The mingling of the different denominations in this common cause and fellowship was delightful, and it was generally pronounced a most helpful and impressive religious gathering. The fruits of such a meeting must be seen in larger and more intelligent giving for Christian work.

NORTH READING.—Union has growing congregations and renewed activity. A series of Sunday evening discourses on Womanhood has attracted non-church-goers. A series on Manhood will follow.

LOWELL.—First has voted to drop the names of 162 members from the roll of membership, among these are the officers and more prominent members of the so-called First Trinitarian Church. The action was taken under the following vote:

> Whereas, The following named persons have withdrawn from the worship and communion of this church and have formed themselves into another church without taking letters of dismissal for that purpose; and whereas, by such action according to Congregational usage they have ceased to be members of this church, it is hereby voted that their names be dropped from its roll of membership.

CHELMSFORD.—Central. The pastor, Rev. E. C. Bartlett, resigned, to take effect Jan. 31, but the church has unanimously voted its unwillingness to accept his action. It also heartily pledged its prayers, sympathies and best support. Three months' leave of absence on account of his health was granted.

GROTON.—Union shows marked interest. A paper with the heading, "I hereby express my desire and my purpose to live a Christian life," has been placed upon a table for signatures at the close of each meeting. Thirty persons, including pupils from the high school and from Lawrence Academy, have signed the paper, and many others are interested. Among the signers is a Japanese woman, resident in the town, who has been for many months studying the Bible and the creed of the church. Rev. L. B. Voorhees is pastor.

TAUNTON.—Winslow, which was organized by a colony from the Trinitarian Church in 1837, has just celebrated its 60th anniversary. The pastor, Rev. T. C. Welles, preached a historical sermon last week Sunday morning, and in the evening reminiscences were given by various persons connected with the church. The following Wednesday occurred the social gathering with supper and speeches. The first pastor of the church, Rev. S. H. Emery, now pastor emeritus, and Rev. G. H. Reed of Haverhill, the only other ex-pastor living, were both present and participated in the exercises.

ORLEANS shows spiritual growth and special meetings are continued from the Week of Prayer with deep interest. The church has now entered upon its 251st year. A pipe organ was put in last year. The congregation gave the pastor, Rev. E. I. Rackett, and his wife a well-attended reception on the 20th anniversary of their marriage.

WORCESTER.—At the Ministers' Meeting, Jan. 18, Dr. A. E. P. Perkins read a scholarly paper on The Epistle to the Hebrews.——Lake View is fortunate in securing a new pastor without candidating. Rev. J. H. Matthews is a young man, having had but one charge previously. He supplied for the retiring pastor and was unanimously called by the church.

RUTLAND completed extensive repairs on the edifice last year. All the services are well attended. That of Sunday evening is like a general conference. Passion week is observed as the Week of Prayer. Rev. Sidney Crawford is pastor.

SOUTHBRIDGE.—Union meetings during the Week of Prayer were well attended. There were eight additions last year. The benevolences were larger than last year. Rev. S. A. Burnaby is pastor.

SPRINGFIELD.—South spends more for its music than any other church in the city. Its Sunday afternoon vesper services are largely musical, when the choir is assisted by a large chorus and important works are sung. The coming year even more attention will be paid to the musical part of worship. Several of the local churches have reduced their music appropriations. The church held its annual meeting last week. A net gain of six is reported for the year. The C. E. Society has disbanded. The women's societies are prosperous. Dr. P. S. Moxom is pastor.——North enters its new year with all bills paid, a balance in the treasury and $5,000 already paid in toward the parish house fund. The Endeavorers take an active part in the church services.——St. John. Rev. J. W. Tolliver, the pastor, has been ill with scarlet fever. His wife contracted it also, but both are now convalescent. The pulpit has been supplied by students from the School for Christian Workers.——Eastern Avenue. The vestry is used for a free daily kindergarten in charge of competent teachers.

CONWAY.—First. Three-fourths of the membership were present or sent messages for the annual meeting. Encouraging statements were heard. Although $400 were expended on repairs the benevolences increased by about one-third. United with Deerfield, South Deerfield, Sunderland and Whately, the church has secured Evangelist Jordan, who began Jan. 21 a 50 days' evangelistic campaign. He will spend 10 days with each church.

WARWICK held its first annual roll-call this year, nearly every member responding. Letters from some of the oldest members were full of good cheer.

MOORES CORNER.—The new church is prospering finely. It has a pastor and has raised $250 towards the salary. The S. S. average for the last quarter was 40. The congregation numbers about 50. The church united with the Baptist church at North Leverett for the Week of Prayer.

BELCHERTOWN.—The S. S. average attendance has gained largely over the last two years. Weekly teachers' meetings have been held. The school has been thoroughly graded. The good results are due chiefly to the earnestness and perseverence of the superintendent.

LONGMEADOW.—First. The annual meeting was well attended. A social with supper preceding the business meeting was the program. The roll-call was responded to by nearly 100. Additions during the year were 10. The pastor, Rev. S. G. Barnes, was given a vacation of eight weeks for recuperation.

MILFORD.—The roll-call was well sustained this year. Extra meetings were held several evenings during the Week of Prayer with an interest that was continued in an extra service each week this month. The Sunday evening service this winter is a gospel meeting with an occasional service with the stereopticon. Rev. Webster Woodbury is pastor.

Maine.

SCARBORO has made an advance the past year, 20 having joined the church, 18 on confession. The vestry has been completed, the church debt raised and the parsonage improved. In extra expenses $850 have been laid out. The benevolences have aided all the societies.

BREWER.—First has held its anniversary exercises with annual reports. At a recent parish meeting a movement was made to devise a way of raising a $300 debt. The union meetings of the Week of Prayer were continued the following week.

ALFRED has made improvements in its meeting house and parsonage. Fifty copies of Congregational Work enter the homes. The name of the pastor, Rev. R. C. Drisco, has been added to the list of life members of the A. M. A.

ASHLAND.—Recent additions, including some young men, have gladdened the hearts of this church. The congregations overflow the vestry while the auditorium is undergoing improvements.

CUMBERLAND CENTER.—The annual roll-call made a good showing, 12 uniting on confession. The benevolences have increased largely. The S. S. and C. E. departments are growing and active.

VEAZIE.—The number of regular attendants at the services is steadily increasing. Messrs. H. A. Beadle and D. E. Putnam of Bangor Seminary supply the church regularly.

During the present four years' pastorate in South Paris 60 additions, all but 10 on confession, have been received.——Misses Washburn and Burdett are at work in North Ellsworth.——Nine additions in West Cornville have been received.

New Hampshire.

KEENE.—First. The special services begun lately were continued with increasing interest, the members helping the pastor in many ways, and a marked deepening of the spiritual life of the church being visible. Conversions are reported also. During the fourth quarter of 1896, 71 members of the Sunday school were present at every session. The Home Mission Circle gave a fine supper, for a small fee and some contributions for a barrel. As a result it will send $25 to the debt of the C. H. M. S., and has already forwarded a large barrel to the frontier.

WEARE.—North and South. Rev. W. S. Randall has been assisted in two weeks of evangelistic services by Rev. M. S. Howes. The meetings have been followed by spiritual quickening. Already 30 persons have avowed their purpose to begin a Christian life. Within two years congregations and Sunday school have doubled.

TILTON.—The Sunday school the past year has made a net gain of 19 in average attendance. A copy of Congregational Work has been put into every family connected with the congregation—150 in all.

DERRY.—The expenses the last year were $1,350, and benevolences $624. To avoid confusion with the First Church at East Derry, the name has been changed to Central.

Hudson gave $70 in benevolences last year.——Kensington has new furnaces in its house.——Wilmot has a new organ.——Salmon Falls receives $2,000 from the late Miss Sarah Yeaton.

Vermont.

MORRISVILLE dedicated its new house of worship Jan. 21. The sermon was by Rev. Smith Baker, D. D. Former pastors and neighboring ministers assisted. The old building was moved to the rear, and will be used for Sunday school and social gatherings. It connects with the new building by folding doors. The new house measures 40 x 50 feet and cost $8,000.

HYDE PARK enjoyed a social event of much interest on the fifth anniversary of the marriage of Rev. and Mrs. F. C. Taylor At the parsonage reception about 150 persons witnessed the presentation of a handsome dining-room outfit to Rev. and Mrs. Taylor. Short addresses were a pleasant part of the evening.

GREENSBORO.—Miss E. L. Tobey has recently closed a series of meetings which were profitable and successful. Nineteen persons united with the church on confession and three by letter Jan. 17. Rev. C. L. Guild is pastor.

ROYALTON raised $100 at its annual meeting toward a deficit incurred during two years past. More money was raised last year than for some time.——South has paid all expenses and retains a small balance.

BURLINGTON.—First had a well-attended and helpful annual gathering in the chapel. The reports were especially encouraging.——College Street reported good gains for the year in its fine reports. Twenty-four new members were added last year.

RUTLAND at its annual reunion had a reception and supper, with about 400 present. Additions last year numbered nearly 50. The present membership is 782.

Enosburg at its annual meeting reported all bills paid and a balance in the treasury.——Bakersfield has unanimously requested Rev. S. D. Angell to withdraw his resignation.——Bennington Center had specially encouraging congregations last year.——Fair Haven is holding evangelistic services.——Hyde Park, North, has a new organ.——Poultney, East, has held a series of union prayer meetings with the Baptist church.——Nearly every member of the Wilmington church responded to the roll-call.——Second Church, Bennington, had a net gain of 21.

Rhode Island.

CRANSTON.—Edgewood has arranged for four illustrated lectures in February on the Pilgrims in England and Holland by Nathan Littlefield, Esq., a member of The Congregationalist's Pilgrimage of 1896. The proceeds will be for the building fund. They will take place in different churches of the city and so encourage the fellowship of the churches.

EAST PROVIDENCE.—United. Rev. H. C. Crane completes his term of supply Feb. 1. Mr. H. E. Starr of Brown will conduct the morning services in February. The Sunday school has received the gift of a new piano. The Ladies' Society has raised the money for electric lights for the building.

NEWPORT.—United. Rev. F. C. McClelland has begun work with the church. He comes from the Dutch Reformed Classis of Long Island and from the First Reformed Church of Brooklyn.

PROVIDENCE.—Elmwood Temple. The financial year has closed with hampering debts paid and a balance on hand. The outlook is specially encouraging.

Connecticut.

NEW HAVEN.—The Center, United and Redeemer churches, with their mission Sunday schools, have united in a union teachers' meeting under the leadership of Prof. F. K. Sanders. The meeting has proved so successful that several other schools have asked for admission of their teachers. Outsiders, except visitors for a day, are not admitted. Mr. Blakeslee's lessons are used on The Three Great Apostles. A large number of books bearing on the subject are being read by the teachers, and whatever of value is in them is reported to the meeting.——United. On a recent Sunday evening the Men's Club service had a large congregation to hear Mrs. Ballington Booth, who spoke on work for the redemption of prisoners released from the prisons and penitentiaries throughout the country. The adult Bible class is studying the life of St. Paul under Mr. W. H. Sallmon of Yale.

WINSTED.—First. The report that the idea of a new building has been laid aside is not correct. The progress of the plan to build is not to be retarded. Already $20,000 are subscribed besides the property of the old meeting house. Two sites are owned by the church. An exchange of these for a third one is considered. The trustees hope to secure all the funds before building. Rev. G. F. Prentiss is pastor.

ENFIELD.—First has held its annual meeting and the ladies provided a generous supper. The evening praise service included interesting addresses. There was a large attendance throughout the day, and the gathering was regarded as the most enjoyable during the eight years' pastorate of Rev. O. W. Means. There were 11 additions during the year, 10 on confession.

HARTFORD.—Center has had a successful year financially. Action has been taken towards preserving some of the historic old monuments in its ancient burying-ground, particularly the six tablets erected to the memory of the seven pastors of the church.——Asylum Hill gave last year for charity $5,993, besides $8,967 given by individuals.

MIDDLETOWN.—South has celebrated its 150th anniversary this month. The pastor, Rev. F. W. Greene, gave the historical address, and former and neighboring pastors spoke words of greeting. The special papers had an added interest in reviewing the work of pastorates and societies.

POMFRET.—Five additions were received in 1896. A young people's literary club and a class for Bible study have been maintained with good interest.

The benevolences have increased, exceeding by a little $1,000. The church contemplates incorporation. Rev. W. B. Greene is pastor.

FALLS VILLAGE continues its revival meetings with increased interest. Neighborhood prayer meetings have been started. The church has given its old bell to the church at Seabrook, Kan. It has also given a communion set to the church in Kingfisher, Okl.

DEEP RIVER.—The new organ is now in place and the attendant improvements completed so that the house is again ready for use. The instrument was purchased by the Church Aid Society, assisted by the ladies.

PUTNAM.—The auditorium is being fitted throughout with memorial windows, three of which are already in place. There will be 13 altogether, eight in the lower part and five smaller ones above.

WINDHAM.—This enterprising church gained $200 in its benevolences last year besides paying all the home expenses in full.

DANIELSON has given in benevolences $1,231, and the home expenses in all departments amounted to $4,546.

Westbrook will use the pledge system for benevolences this year.——Besides regular benevolences the individual members of Union Church, Rockville, have given $500.——A week ago Sunday was the 25th anniversary of Rev. E. E. Lewis's ordination and of his installation as pastor in Haddam.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

NEW YORK.—Pilgrim has just held its annual meetings The year has been one of growth, unity and prosperity. The membership is over 750, with 700 in the Sunday school and an equal number in the industrial school. Fifty Chinamen are in the Chinese school. The reports were all inspiring.——Forest Avenue has finally disposed of the remainder of its Washington Avenue property, the site of the old edifice. Thus the financial condition of the church is much improved. In recognition of this providential relief from property complications the people observed Jan. 17 as jubilee Sunday. Rev. R. S. Underwood has now been engaged for evangelistic services. Rev. W. S. Woolworth is pastor.

NORWICH.—Rev. E. J. Klock has been pastor since Nov. 1, and it was he, not his predecessor, as previously stated, who remembered the congregation with New Year's tokens.

New Jersey.

UPPER MONTCLAIR.—The prayer meeting topics for the church meeting and for the Young People's meeting for six months at a time are tastefully printed on one card. A fine lot with a frontage of 200 feet has been given for a new building. The new house, however, will not be begun at once. The standing committee take 138 copies of Congregational Work for the families of the congregation. There are now a hundred who make benevolent contributions through the weekly system. The church exemplifies its name of the "Christian Union" by including in its congregations representatives of about 12 different denominations. There are now 260 in the Sunday school and 140 in the Endeavor Societies.

GLEN RIDGE held a Christian Endeavor "symposium" recently, lasting two evenings. Dr. J. C. French, State president, spoke one evening. The Ladies' Aid Society netted $300 at a recent "sale." The pastor is preaching evening sermons on Some Forgotten Beatitudes. Dr Dodd of Turkey made a moving appeal not long since in behalf of the Armenian orphans.

MONTCLAIR.—Rev. L. F. Berry, called to assist Dr. A. H. Bradford, a graduate of Harvard and Andover, will labor especially at Pilgrim Chapel. The home church has gained 34 over last year. Its home outlay amounted to $12,800. Six hundred children are in the Sunday schools and 104 young people in the Endeavor Societies.

Pennsylvania.

PHILADELPHIA.—Park, in its new monthly, Park Congregationalist, makes known its spirit of enthusiasm and doubtless reflects the spirit of pastor and people in its helpful contents. The current number dwells to some extent on the outlook for 1897, and makes applications from lessons of 1896. Rev. C. B. Adams is pastor. During the past year the membership has doubled. The church is an offshoot of the Central Church, and is situated in a new district which promises to be the most beautiful and comfortable residential section of the city.

THE INTERIOR.

Ohio.

SPRINGFIELD.—First is having a refreshing which began quietly by united meetings of 20 of the churches in the city for afternoon and evening services, held during the Week of Prayer in this meeting house. The plan was continued two succeeding weeks with increasing success. The preaching has all been by local pastors and excellent results have followed. One Sunday four great union meetings were held simultaneously, each having an attendance of about 1,000. The special efforts by this church are now in the fourth week, and are conducted day and evening by the pastor, Rev. E. A Steiner.

ELYRIA.—First has been without a pastor since the sudden death last April of Rev. E. E. Williams. Recently Rev. W. E. Cadmus of Hingham, Mass., has been called. He will enter upon his work Feb. 7.

Illinois.

ELGIN.—First reports a year of marked prosperity and harmony. The work of the various organizations is being prosecuted with vigor. Rev. J. H. Selden is just completing the fifth year of his pastorate.

Indiana.

FAIRMOUNT.—The congregations are steadily increasing and the church is sharing in union revival work. Mr. O. E Emerson, an excellent leader in music, has been of great assistance. The church choir is considered the finest musical organization in the vicinity. Fairmount has been a settlement of Quakers, and for two generations the singing has been in the spirit only. About 40 of Rev. Levi White's parishioners gave him a surprise donation party, Jan. 12. There was a pleasant social time and many substantial gifts were received.

WASHINGTON.—The special meetings which Rev. Thomas Smith has been holding closed Jan. 24. A large number of non-church-going people have been attracted to the meetings and there were several conversions. Mr. Smith has gone to East Mount Carmel to assist in protracted meetings begun by Deacon A. J. Van Sickle. A Sunday school has been maintained here for some time by the Hosmer Church, and the people are desirous of forming an independent church organization.

MARION.—Rev. Samuel S. Condo, who has until recently been pastor of this church, will, for the present, continue to reside here and give himself to evangelistic labors. A premature announcement that the Christian Temple congregation here had voted to become Congregational was extensively circulated through telegraphic press reports last week. This church is now vacant. It entertained the Congregational State Association two years ago.

ANDERSON.—Rev. A. H. Ball, D.D., is recovering from an attack of la grippe. Secretary Haas of the Y. M. C. A. has assisted in Sunday and prayer night services. The ladies conduct a labor exchange and make it profitable to the treasury of the Aid Society.

Michigan.

DETROIT.—The bi-monthly meeting of the Congregational Union was held Jan 18. Reports showed that the Boulevard Mission is developing finely and will soon be looking for a pastor. The committee on the Mt. Hope Church reported plans for alterations and enlargements under consideration. Fort Street Church reported plans under way for a $15,000 edifice, to be erected on the front portion of their church lot. It hopes to be able to build at an early date.

CALUMET.—Last year was one of the best this church has ever had. Nearly 100 additions were received, with a net increase of 79. The Sunday school enrollment is 357. The C. E membership is 145 and its benevolences $202. The Boys' Brigade has 53 members.

ALMONT.—Rev. Joel Martin has just closed a successful 15 days' mission. More than 40 cards were signed. The meetings were in the truest sense union. The pastors and people of the village all worked harmoniously.

ST. CLAIR is planning large things for the new year. The spiritual life of the church is growing. Thirty nine new members added at last communion has given the church a great uplift.

Owosso raised for home expenses $3,931. Benevolences were doubled over the year before. Five hundred dollars were also paid on the debt. J. C. Cromer is pastor.

LAKE LINDEN has had a prosperous year. The income was $1,920. During the present pastorate of seven months an offering has been taken for each of the benevolent societies

Wisconsin.

DARLINGTON.—Rev. J. W. Frizzell is just completing a two and a half years' course of Sunday morning sermons on the Life of Christ. Recently, in the evenings, he has given a course of lectures on Warfare Between Theology and Science. The Men's Club successfully manages a city lecture course. The large Junior Endeavor Society is divided into classes for the study of the pledge, Lord's Prayer, Beatitudes, etc., with promotions from class to class and to the Senior Endeavor Society. The Juniors recently presented for church expenses $30 of their own earnings. Dec. 27 Secretary Carter presented home missions, besides making five other addresses to different departments.

APPLETON.—First. Rev. John Faville has just preached his 11th annual sermon. The roll call and parish meeting were combined, and had the largest attendance and greatest number of responses in the history of the church. The reports evidenced a healthy condition in all lines. The S. S. membership is 908 and the average attendance 639. The C. E Societies have 276 members. The chorus of 101 male voices is doing good work. The Sunday Evening Club is energetic and efficient.

WAUWATOSA at its annual meeting heard encouraging reviews of the year. Lunch was served by the women and Dr. Judson Titsworth of Milwaukee gave an address on The Work of the Church. The pastor is Rev. Henry Holmes.

WEST SALEM, Rev. Philo Hitchcock, pastor, has held its annual meeting. Reports showed good results. Twenty-four persons have united with the church during the year. All bills are paid.

SOUTH KAUKAUNA, Rev. William Kilburne, pastor, had a good annual gathering The roll was well responded to. After refreshments were served a good social time was enjoyed.

THE WEST.

Missouri.

ST. LOUIS.—First. The churches of the city held a union mass meeting here Jan. 15, in response to the call issued by "The Simultaneous Meetings Committee, representing the foreign missions boards and societies in the U. S. and Canada." This is the first of a series of meetings arranged to secure unity and spiritual enlargement.——At the Ministers' Meetings, both Congregational and Christian, held Jan. 18, committees were appointed to prepare a Fraternal Conference, looking to some form of union between the denominations in the city. Rev. Drs. J. H. George and C. S. Sargent represent the Congregationalists.

Iowa.

MOVILLE.—This church, only 10 years old, has its second edifice. The first, becoming too small for the growing congregation and Sunday school, was sold, and about a year ago the people began to build anew. The work progressed slowly, for the building committee would not run in debt. Dedication was deferred a few weeks in order that there might be no money to raise at the services, but it took place Jan. 10. Sec T. O. Douglass preached and offered the dedicatory prayer; Rev. R. W. Jamison preached in the evening. Rev. G. E. Stump, who has served the church for a year, resigned at the dedicatory services.

PERRY.—Sixty-six persons were received to membership in 1896. During Rev. A. D. Kinzer's pastorate of five years there have been 174 accessions, 139 on confession. Almost $1,000 have been raised for benevolences and about $11,000 for home expenses.

DUBUQUE.—Summit raised $400 by a recent effort, thus closing the year without a debt. At the annual meeting encouraging reports were heard from 15 departments. The aggregate enrollment of its three Sunday schools is about 600.

GREEN MOUNTAIN, Rev. O. H. L. Mason, pastor, closes a prosperous year with a membership of 135. At the reunion connected with the annual business meeting the pastor gave an address on Congregationalism.

ALGONA.—Accessions at every communion in 1896 aggregated 78, over 60 on confession. A member recently added two handsome cups to the communion service

HARLAN.—Eighteen accessions followed the special services during the Week of Prayer, in which the pastor, Mr. C. L. Snowden, was assisted by Rev. H. P. Douglass.

Rev. D. E. Evans, pastor at Larchwood, is holding a series of special meetings with marked and encouraging results.——Miles closed the year with all bills paid, but has lost heavily by death and removals.

Minnesota.

DULUTH.—Pilgrim. The annual meeting was held Jan. 19, and was preceded by a supper, at which 250 members and their friends sat down. Reports from various branches of work made an impressive showing. A vigorous pruning of the ecclesiastical vine has been going on during the year, and as a result a considerable reduction in membership was reported. Benevolences amounted to $1,664 and home expenditures to $5,600. A committee had been appointed a month earlier to attempt to raise the floating debt of some $3,700, which has burdened the church for seven years. They reported that they lacked $700 of the full amount. This was quickly made up at the meeting and all joined in singing the Doxology. The raising of this amount under prevailing financial conditions is a most encouraging sign, and it has already quickened the whole life of the church. Special meetings were held during the Week of Prayer and the following week, and the response of the people in the raising of money is probably due in considerable measure to the deep spiritual interest developed in these gatherings. The pastor, Rev. C. H. Patton, is preaching a series of plain gospel sermons Sunday evenings, in accordance with the suggestions of Mr. Moody.

Mantorville.—This church, so weakened a few years ago as to be unable to support a resident pastor, held its annual meeting recently and reported 86 additions during the year, 75 on confession. Much enthusiasm developed and over $350 were raised to pay indebtedness. New hymn-books have been secured, doors placed between the auditorium and S. S. room and all expenses met. Plans have been formed for special evangelistic services. Rev. W. C. A. Wallar, the efficient pastor, has been called to Illinois by the serious illness of his father.

Glenwood.—During the two and one-half years' pastorate of Rev. F. A. Sumner, the meeting house has been repaired, electric lights and furnaces introduced, the membership doubled and the benevolences largely increased. Mr. Sumner goes to Little Falls, greatly to the regret of his people.

New Richland.—Great advance has been made in financial matters, collections are taken for all the benevolent societies and the Ladies' Society is raising money for a new parsonage. The church at the out-station, Hartland, has been reorganized with doubled membership.

St. Paul.—Pacific. Congregations have increased and large additions have been made to the membership. It is hoped that no further H. M. aid will be needed.——Bethany has canceled its interest-bearing debt and has made other substantial progress.

St. Cloud.—The four Protestant churches are discussing the advisability of uniting in one independent organization. Rev. H. S. McCowan gave an address before the representatives of the different churches upon the subject. The matter is not decided.

Faribault.—At the annual meeting reports were encouraging and show the expenditures for the year to be $2,750, benevolences $1,272, including $330 for foreign and $247 for home missions. During the year there have been 31 accessions.

Graceville.—A series of meetings conducted by a band of young men from the colleges has just closed with several marked conversions, a quickening of the church and the strengthening of religious sentiment.

Staples.—All the running expenses for the year have been met for the first time and a large part of its indebtedness has been canceled. Much good has resulted from the evangelistic services which are being held.

Verndale.—Improvements have been made upon the church building, some old obligations have been met and the only remaining debt is to the C. C. B. S. upon the parsonage, which is being slowly paid.

Lake Benton.—Union meetings have been held arousing the churches and resulting in conversions. Rev. C. A. Ruddock, father-in-law of the pastor, Rev. William Lodwick, is conducting the meetings.

Big Lake and Orrock are prospering under Mr. F. P. Ferguson, who came from Y. M. C. A. work to this pastorate in August, since when 16 persons have been added to the churches.

Minneapolis.—Plymouth. Professor Zeublin of Chicago University is delivering a course of university extension lectures on alternate Sunday afternoons.

Stewartville.—A series of meetings is being held in a hall centrally located. The church is trying to liquidate an indebtedness of $1,000.

Kansas.

Pittsburg.—Seventeen new members have been received within the past nine months, and nearly as many more are to unite in February. The Sunday school numbers 96 and the Y. P. S. C. E. 20. The church is steadily growing in spiritual strength and influence in the community. Pittsburg is a mining town, with many poor people.

Seneca—Reports at the annual meeting showed 202 members and a total expenditure during 1896 of $1,950. The S. S. membership is 300. The Ladies' Missionary Society has given $79.40 to missions, and the Y. P. S. C. E. has not only paid $137, mostly for missions, but has also sent $100 to China to erect a church building.

Muscotah.—During the union services conducted by Evangelist R. L. Layfield and wife, 130 persons publicly confessed Christ. A notable feature was the large number of conversions among the young people. Mr. and Mrs. Layfield began work at Pierce City, Mo., Jan. 21.

Brookville has purchased a house for a parsonage, and the women have sufficient funds with which to put it in good order for speedy occupancy. At the annual meeting in January Rev. J. H. Embree was called to continue as pastor another year.

Blue Rapids observed its 25th anniversary on New Year's Day by a church social, a bountiful dinner, an historical sketch of the church by one of the members and an address by the pastor.

Chapman is placing a new stone walk in front of its edifice. This church is energetic, widely useful and bravely self-supporting.

Nebraska.

Lincoln.—First. The Men's Club held its first service Jan. 17. The pastor, Rev. Lewis Gregory, was taken suddenly ill in the morning and was unable to attend either service. Rev. H. A. French preached in the morning and Miss L. A. Wild of the Lincoln Y. W. C. A. gave the address in the evening.——Vine Street, Rev. A. F. Newell, pastor, held its annual meeting Jan. 14. Reports were heard from the different departments and several brief speeches were made by members. Twenty-six persons united during the year, 12 on confession. A small deficit in the current expenses of the year reported by the trustees was immediately provided for and the church is entirely out of debt except $100 still due on the loan of the C. C. B. S., which amount has been assumed by the Ladies' Aid Society.

Wallace, Rev. C. G. Murphy, pastor, made its annual meeting a delightful rally, with large attendance from the home church and the various out-stations. Letters of greeting were read from Rev. G. E. Taylor, formerly general missionary, from the two former pastors, Rev. Messrs. H. B. Frey and G. S. Biscoe, and from Superintendent Bross. Thirty persons have united during the year, 22 on confession, bringing the membership to 96. Six of the benevolent societies were remembered. Sunday schools have been maintained most of the time with a total enrollment of 255. The pastor has preached more or less at all these out-stations.

Crete at the annual meeting gave full consideration to the recommendation of the board of trustees to rent the pews of the church, but voted five to one to adhere to the subscription plan for revenue and to let the pews remain free as heretofore.

Cortland and Pickerel, combining to form one field, have been pastorless since Rev. F. G. MacHenry left the field, but both are maintaining Sunday schools and C. E. Societies with vigor.

North Dakota.

Gardner.—During the three weeks' evangelistic meetings, led by Rev. N. P. McQuarrie, the community has been much moved and the church strengthened. About 15 persons have taken a stand for Christ. Evangelist McQuarrie's labors are being greatly blessed among the churches.

Fargo.—Plymouth. Reports at the annual meeting, held Jan. 13, showed progress. Besides buying a new organ and paying a paving tax and expenses for repairs and insurance, the debt to the C. C. B. S. on the parsonage has been reduced $100.

Colorado.

Colorado Springs.—First reports all debts paid, and $17,253 given to the Pearsons Fund for Colorado College. It gave $1,135 for benevolences. Fifty-seven persons were received to membership, making the accessions double the removals.——Second has just voted not to ask H. M aid for another year. Thirty-seven members have united during 1896.

Special meetings have been held at Montrose. The members have been quickened and several conversions are reported.

New Mexico.

Gallup.—The Y. P. S. C. E., which had been allowed to die some month ago, has been reorganized upon a substantial basis. The church held a reception New Year's Day, which was well attended. Rev. P. A. Simpkin, the pastor, will remain another year. Pulpit furniture and communion table were presented to the church on Christmas Day.

Albuquerque.—The Week of Prayer was observed with evangelistic meetings, in which the pastor was assisted by Superintendent Ashmun. Evangelist C. F. Van Auken of Illinois preached Jan. 3.

Arizona.

Tempe.—Mexican. Ten members were received Jan. 3, making a total of 25. A Sunday school of nine members was organized the same day in a neighborhood near enough to the church to be tributary to it. There are several good openings for schools in the vicinity, but the pastor, Rev. Stephen Edwards, has no time to give to organization. Money is being subscribed toward the support of a Mexican S. S. missionary.

Nogales.—C. E. Societies have recently been organized here and at Crittenden, an out-station, of 20 members at the former place and 11 at the latter. Five persons were received at Nogales Jan. 10 on confession, a large accession to a church of only 15 members.

PACIFIC COAST.

California.

Oakland.—First. Rev. C. R. Brown preached every night but Saturday during the week following the Week of Prayer. The pastor and wife are preparing to start for Palestine, Feb. 15.——Oak Chapel is now supplied by Mr. James C. MacInnes, a student in Pacific Seminary, recently from Chicago Seminary. So much interest was aroused by studying the Sermon on the Mount during the Week of Prayer that services were continued, Supt. L. L. Wirt of the S. S. & P. S. assisting.

San Francisco.—Pierce Street. The women have raised $131 for improvements of edifice.——Joe Jet, for 25 years a resident of the State, was ordained Jan. 14. The same week he returned to China to labor among his own people.——First. Since the coming of Dr. Adams, the pew rentals show an increase of $2,000.

Auburn.—The Ladies' Guild, with 40 members, has during the year paid the running expenses of the church and $50 toward the pastor's salary, has purchased land adjoining church property and increased the fund for an addition to the edifice.

Pasadena.—First. The new manual reports 328 resident members. The pastor conducts a class in topical Bible studies on the general subject, The Christian Life. The study includes four lectures, also papers and discussions.

Niles is rejoicing over the "Open Door" just reopened in more desirable quarters. Beside carrying on reading apartment and game room, midweek prayer meetings and a class in Bible study are held.

Lorin.—Rev. E. L. Hood is spending four evenings weekly in company with different officers of his church, visiting the families of the parish.

Rev. H. H. Cole led Trinity Church, Weaverville, in an offering for world-wide missions during last month, the first of the kind in its history.—— Rev. William Butler of Lincoln is also in charge of the new church at Fruitvale. He is being assisted by H. M. Evangelist Cooke in 10 days' services.—— After eight years of work at Ontario, during which 140 persons have united with the church, Rev. A. E. Tracy resigned his pastorate, but has withdrawn the resignation at the earnest request of his people. ——At Monrovia four denominations held union meetings during the Week of Prayer. The afternoon and evening services were continued another week.

Washington.

Seattle.—All the churches observed the Week of Prayer and the increasing interest has made it desirable to continue the meetings. Conversions are already reported. An interdenominational rally was held with the First Presbyterian Church, with addresses by Rev. W. H. G. Temple and Rev. Dr. Randall of the M. E. church.

Snohomish has cleared up the last vestige of its debt and begins the new year with encouraging prospects. Rev. W. C. Merritt is pastor.

Many of the churches in the State are holding special meetings and conversions are reported.—— An interesting fellowship meeting at Eagle Harbor resulted in the quickening of members and in conversions.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES.

A liberal offering for Armenia was made at the convention of the societies connected with the Foochow Mission, which now number 34 with a membership of about 1,400.

A Junior Society of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., last year furnished 40 scrap-books for a girls' school in India and nearly 90 scrap-books and 300 bouquets for distribution in New York city. It paid a month's board for a little boy whose mother was in the hospital, sent more than 15,000 pages of reading matter to lumber camps in Michigan and raised seven dollars for the Armenians by selling curiosities.

In the Parlor.

There is an old saying that the man who fishes for minnows never catches any whales. Similarly the man who buys a cheap chair gets a cheap chair. You can't have value without cost.

But you can have the appearance of value without cost, and that was what Abraham Lincoln had in mind when he said that you could fool all of the people some of the time. Yet it is expensive fooling, for it means the loss of your money and your purchase both.

We steer you along the path of the greatest possible economy, while still securing you reliable furniture. We take you just as near to economy as it is safe to venture.

Especially is this true in our parlor furniture. Here fashion wears out your goods more than use, and by our low prices we try and make it easy for you to change your parlor furniture before being out of date.

BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES AND THE HARD TIMES.

BY REV. D. F. BRADLEY, GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.

A recent article in The Congregationalist from the pen of Dr. H. A. Stimson sent me to looking up the records of some of our missionary societies, with the result that I am led to offer the humble suggestion that possibly some of our national societies might begin to retrench in their administrative expenditures without detriment to the work and with the added confidence among the churches that would come from such a process. I offer this with the full sense of liability to being thought unduly critical and of being open to the charge of injuring the influence of societies that depend so largely upon public confidence for the means to carry on their beneficent work. But retrenchment is in the air these days. Our churches are reducing the salaries of ministers, cheapening their choirs, making their janitors serve for less, and it is not from a critical or fault-finding spirit that they do it, but because they cannot pay that which they have not. So I may say that when it is suggested that our missionary societies lessen expenses, it is not because of the thought that these expenses have not been necessary in the past, but because the churches have not now the money to spend in that manner.

Let me illustrate by a concrete example. Here is the national C. H. M. S., with an average income of $450,000, spending something like $77,000 in administrative expenses, or about seventeen per cent., not including salaries and traveling expenses of superintendents in dependent States. On the statement of the case that amount of cost for running a missionary institution at home seems large, too large for times when debts mount up and special appeals must be made in churches to wipe out these debts. Moreover, one who is familiar with the workings of the auxiliaries of the national Home Missionary Society knows how deep has been the retrenchment among them, and how great a struggle they have to pay their own bills and turn over a surplus to be used by the New York office.

To such men, laymen and pastors, it seems unaccountable that the expenses of the national society should have been allowed to rise from $35,000 in 1886 to $77,000 in 1896, and that the increase in annual administrative expenses from 1892, the last "year of plenty," has been over $5 000, during the very years when one would expect a prudent corporation to diminish such expenses. In fact, the expenses of 1895 were the largest ever known. In other words, while the increase of gifts to the national society in ten years has been twenty-eight per cent., the administrative expenses have swelled 115 per cent.

In scrutinizing these reports carefully it will be seen that in no case is the increase due to interest charges, but a large part of it is due to the collecting agencies, three in all, costing $12,000, an item that did not appear in 1886, to special appeals and advertising costing $3,300, to an increase of $6,000 in cost of publications, to increased salaries of officers, this increase amounting to $7,000, and to $8,000 larger expense for miscellaneous items. Doubtless this increase in the various items has been gradual in the ten years, but it has been substantial, and the practical question is, can it now be, and ought it not to be, substantially reduced? An item of nearly $3,000 expense in the cost of the annual meeting, for instance—might that not be greatly diminished?

I submit the above with much modesty, not setting my own judgment up for the decision of such grave matters, but in the hope that our societies, whose officers must necessarily dwell somewhat apart from the life of the churches, may be able to receive from other pastors who hear what the constituencies have to say some valuable suggestions as to their duties—duties that have been discharged with distinguished ability.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

As we approach the first of February there are distinct indications of a revival of trade. These are seen not only in the form of increasing confidence, but the demand for merchandise grows day by day, and it is thought that when the spring season is in full tide the volume of business will be larger than for several years.

There are many reasons why a good trade may be expected, viz.: an abundance of money and low rates, the passing of the fear of a debasement of the currency, the prospect of a tariff which will furnish the Government with a surplus instead of a deficient revenue, the sound condition of credit throughout the country and the curtailment of production in all directions, which has been going on since the panic of 1893.

To be sure people are poor and business men have not been making large profits of late, but this is the basis from which great trade revivals must naturally start. Such always appear after several years of depression, low prices and limited production. The most hopeful sign of the times is an increasing interest in old and new enterprises, the prosecution of which will, of course, furnish employment to labor that is now idle.

A notable feature of the current trade situation is the better demand for wool and iron. The print cloth market is also wearing an improved aspect, by reason of the agreement among the manufacturers to curtail the production until the demand assumes more normal proportions. The demand for all kinds of merchandise is increasing gradually but surely, a feature being the purchase of goods in small rather than in round lots. Reports from salesmen now on the road have not yet come in to any great extent, but those which have been received are not of a discouraging nature.

The total bank clearings last week aggregated $1,042,000,000, which was a decrease of one-half of one per cent. from the previous week, but an increase of six per cent. over the third week of January, 1896. In many quarters merchants still complain of poor collections, but even these are thought to be improving. In the stock market, the undertone has continued quite strong and the burden of opinion is that security values will enjoy a rise this spring.

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN.

Topic, Feb. 7-13. Sincerity—with One's Self, with Others, with God. Ps. 15: 1-5; Zech. 8: 16, 17.

No one need sing the praises of the sincere man. He is his own eulogy. He may be blunt or domineering or tactless, but if we know that an honest and guileless heart beats within his breast we feel that the basis for profitable intercourse with him exists and we can wait for the development of certain graces and virtues which he now seems to lack. For unless you know where to find a man, unless you know that he means what he says and is not as variable as the wind in his convictions, you are hampered in all your relations with him.

Sincerity, like charity, begins at home. We cannot deal honestly with our fellowmen unless we have first reached an understanding with ourselves. I noticed the other day in a British paper an article entitled Accepting Ourselves. It struck me forcibly, for I suspect many of us have to live out at least half our days before we are willing to take ourselves just as we are. We cherish pretty little conceits about ourselves. If we succeed in deceiving ourselves the chances are that those who know us best are not victims of the same illusion. Our first need, then, is to strip off the masks around our own personalities and see what manner of men we are. Then shall we be sincere with ourselves, with men and with God.

It is harder to be sincere as civilization becomes more complex, as our obligations to others multiply, as we are forced, to some extent, to conform to the customs of polite society. There is a kind of sincerity, or perhaps frankness is a better word, that goes with primitive conditions and is also a beautiful trait of childhood. We say that the savage and the child are natural, by which we mean that they act out what is in them. We would not go back to savagery or childhood, but we need in these richer and more exacting days to strive for the right kind of naturalness. For us who have been born again may it not be said with true reverence that the natural life is the Christ life? Certainly the closer we come to Jesus the easier it will be for us to be sincere, for he shows us the true values of life, and the sincerity modeled upon his simplicity and purity is sure to have intertwined with it other of the qualities which go to make up a symmetrical character.

How to Visit California.—Since the inauguration of personally conducted tours, railroad travel has been revolutionized. Forty years ago a vestibule train in charge of a tourist agent and chaperon, and equipped with a barber, bath apartments and a ladies' maid, could hardly have been imagined. Yet such progress has been made, and the special Pullman train used by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company on its Golden Gate tours is a veritable hotel on wheels. It is lighted by electricity and heated by steam, and affords all the comforts of a parlor, club-room or private boudoir. The first tour to California will leave Boston Jan. 26, 1897. Space for this tour is being rapidly engaged, the low rate of $315 from Boston placing it within the reach of all. The second tour will leave Feb. 23; $355 from Boston. The last tour will leave March 26; $220. Application for itinerary, detailed information and space should be made to Tourist Agent, 205 Washington Street, Boston, or George W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

MRS. ELIZA HALL TUCKER.

The lingering and painful illness of Mrs. Tucker came to its peaceful end at her old home in Andover on the evening of Jan. 9. She had been so long a member of the Old South Church that she had seen more than a generation pass on before her into the unseen kingdom. She was the oldest member of the Daughters of the Revolution, lacking only five days of eighty-nine years.

She was a rare woman, dignified and queenly in her bearing, having great energy and force of character, by nature a leader, and, though never seeking leadership, she was the acknowledged strength of every social and religious effort in the community. Her pastor relied on her and she carried out his desires and advanced the interests of the church, more than once prostrating evil plans by the wisdom of her counsel and by the enthusiasm and devotion of her heart, which inspired all.

The sweetness and gentleness and grace of her character gave peculiar beauty to her home. The ministries of her life were the blessing of all friendship, and many friends far and near will have their hearts stirred with blessed memories as they learn that she has entered into rest.

At times she was a great sufferer, but patient, trustful and restful on the promises, walking almost by sight in the later years of her pilgrimage. When the end came she was ready and waiting for the coming of her Lord.

Her children were all with her. She left for them her loving benediction and lifted her eyes to the heavenly home with serene and confident expectation. It was the beautiful exhibition of faith in its security and repose.

Just as thou wilt, I do not fear
The valley of shadow, if thou art near.
Thy cloud is my shelter, thy voice I hear,
Saying so gently, " Be of good cheer,"
O blessed Lamb of God.

Just as thou wilt, a mellow light
Falls on me now, illumes my sight,
A dawn of rapture, fair and bright,
For thou art near, there is no night,
O blessed Lamb of God.

WILLIAM ADRIANCE

Died Jan. 2, suddenly, at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., in the eighty-third year of his age. Mr. Adriance was for many years in the dry-goods business in St. Louis, Mo., where for a time he was a member of the church of which Rev. Dr. Post was pastor. Leaving St. Louis in 1864 his later years were passed at Poughkeepsie, N. Y. He was of French-Dutch Huguenot extraction, and since early life had been an earnest Christian. He was an office-bearer in both the Dutch Reformed and Presbyterian churches. An enthusiastic student of missions, a warm believer in the blessings of home religion and childhood conversion, he lived to see not only his children but his grandchildren all members of the church. Mr. Adriance was twice married. He leaves a widow, daughter of the late Alvan Bond, D. D., of Norwich, Ct., and three children, Edward C., of Brooklyn, N. Y., Rev. S. Winchester of Winchester, Mass., and Mrs. Mary E. Minard, wife of Rev. Elias G. Minard of Poplar Ridge, N. Y. When the physician was hastily summoned Mr. Adriance said, " Doctor, I think the Master is calling for me, and I am ready to go."

DR. EDWARD P. ELLIOT.

Dr. Edward P. Elliot, for the past five years first assistant physician at Danvers Insane Asylum, died on Jan. 11, after a brief illness. Dr. Elliot was born in Boston, March 1, 1856, entered the Somerville High School at the age of eleven, Harvard College at fifteen, graduating with honors at nineteen (class of '75). After graduation from the Harvard Medical School he spent two years in the Massachusetts General Hospital as an assistant physician, studied two years in Vienna, and after a famous yacht cruise around the world, during which he was wrecked on one of the uninhabited Pacific islands—an incident which attracted much attention—he entered upon his life work as a specialist in nervous diseases at the Danvers Institution, where he has remained a most devoted student of his specialty. Dr. Elliot, a member of the Prospect Hill Church, Somerville, was the son of Deacon M. P. Elliot, one of the founders of Prospect Hill Church, and one of the best known and most active business men of the denomination.

Dr. Elliot was a man of high literary culture and exact scholarship, but he will be longest remembered for the rare skill through which he was able to benefit by professional science and personal sympathy the afflicted who came under his care. A. E. W.

MRS. ELLEN BUTTRICK STANTON.

Mrs. Stanton, wife of Rev. George F. Stanton, died at her home in Boston, Jan. 16, of apoplexy, after an illness of four weeks. She was the daughter of the late John and Lucretia Buttrick of Lowell, and great granddaughter of Major John Buttrick, who began the fight at Concord Bridge.

Inheriting in full measure the patriotic spirit of her illustrious ancestor, she was singularly loyal and faithful in all the relations of life—to her country, her friends, her home and, above all, to her Saviour and his gospel. She was married Jan. 3, 1867, and began, then at Gardner, Mass., and continued at Fitchburg and later at South Weymouth, a work of tender, sympathetic, self-sacrificing, consecrated service as pastor's wife of unsurpassed faithfulness.

During a fifteen years' pastorate with the Old South Church, South Weymouth, she exhausted, in the manifold and exacting work of a large country parish, the resources of an eager but never vigorous physical nature, and her husband, having resigned his pastorate, declined for two years all invitations to other churches, in the hope that then she would be able to resume the work for which, by all mental and spiritual gifts and graces, she was exceptionally fitted.

This hope was not realized, and now, after eleven years of waning health, she has been called from the weakness and weariness and pain of earth to the eternal rest and reward of heaven.

The funeral services were held at her former home in Lowell and were conducted by her pastor, Rev. Isaac J. Lansing of Park Street Church, and Rev. Dr. A. P. Foster, her former pastor at the time of her marriage, and all the exercises were most tender, appreciative and comforting. A most significant and touching tribute to her memory and worth was paid by the church she last served, from which she has been absent eleven years, reading in part as follows:

" With deepest feeling some have testified of her sisterly sympathy and her Christlike help of the despairing. I am sure she did a large service here and her works do follow her. In steadfast allegiance to the truth, in devotion to Christ and in endeavor for the prosperity of his kingdom, she wrought nobly and its remembrance here will long abide. Our hearts are with you and with her."

The South Weymouth church also sent a beautiful floral harp, and on a pillow of white pinks at the base, in purple immortelles, was the one word, "Remembered," and an engraved card read, " Only remembered by what I have done," "In loving appreciation," " The Old South Church, South Weymouth." Very beautiful floral tributes came also from the " Friends in Sharon," from " The Ladies of the Church," and the Y. P. S. C. E., Sharon, and from other friends and relatives. In the sweet comfort and blessed hope and triumph of Christian faith she fell asleep, prematurely worn out by the arduous and exacting calls of parish service upon a conscientious nature all too responsive and eager to help and bless. "None knew her but to love her, none mentioned but to praise." " Faithful unto death." Hers is the "crown of life that fadeth not away."

JULIA E. OGDEN.

Passed into the heavenly rest at Westville, Ct., Nov. 14, Julia E., daughter of the late Rev. David L. Ogden. With all that was lovely in her character and life she yet trusted alone in the atonement of Christ for her salvation, in his righteousness for her justification. Uncontaminated by the worldliness of the age, unshaken by its unbelief, she still pressed onward with firm and undeviating step towards the goal of all her desires and hopes—the heavenly home to which she has gone.

FROM THE HAWKEYE STATE.

The Fiftieth Milestone.

The formal observance of Iowa's semi-centennial took place at Burlington three months ago with an elaborate program, but the actual anniversary occurred during the holidays. It was noted by many civic societies and by the pulpits quite generally. The State has had a checkered career so far as its political associations are concerned. At first the property of France, then the property of Spain, then the property of France again, it became a part of the United States in 1803 by the Louisiana purchase. In 1812 it became a part of Missouri, in 1834 it was joined to Michigan and in 1836 it became a part of Wisconsin. For a time it was joined to Indiana for judicial purposes. The Territory of Iowa was organized in 1838. The question of statehood began to be agitated almost immediately and called forth a long discussion in Congress. Rufus Choate, Stephen A. Douglass and William Allen of Ohio were among those who took a prominent part in the debate. A vain attempt was made once to fix the boundaries in the shape of Tennessee. The people twice rejected the boundaries proposed by Congress before the final decision of 1846. The people adopted the constitution by a small majority, and the President signed the bill admitting the State Dec. 28, 1846. That was a day of small things. The school enumeration was only 20,000, with 2,400 enrolled. The entire assessable property of the State was only $12,000,000, while the schoolhouses now are estimated to be worth $15,000,000. The public school system proposed by Horace Mann was adopted, and Iowa has always been justly proud of her achievements in educational lines. Our teachers are wide-awake and progressive. At the State association, recently held at Des Moines, nearly 1,100 were enrolled.

Three Lamented Workers.

Our Congregational fellowship mourns the loss of three beloved and influential members. For more than a half-century Dr. A. B. Robbins was a great force in the State. His presence was a benediction to all our religious gatherings. Though his white locks betokened age, his heart was young, fresh and sympathetic, and he always kept abreast of the times. His addresses revealed strength and vigor, he was a student to the end and Iowa College was especially dear to him. Thirty years ago he became a member of the American Board, attended nearly all its meetings, and took the deepest interest in everything relating to the missionary cause.

Dr. Charles Beardsley of Burlington was one of the most prominent laymen in the State. For more than forty years he was closely identified with the interests of Iowa. He was for years a successful practitioner, then he was connected with a leading newspaper, and also held several important positions of trust. He took a deep interest, not only in his home church, but in the work of the State, and was nearly always present at the State gatherings. He was chairman of one of the most important committees in arranging the recent semi-centennial exercises and did an immense amount of work. In 1895 he was chosen a member of the American Board, and he was an important factor in raising Iowa's quota of the debt. His pastor, Dr. William Salter, paid a fine tribute to his memory.

Mrs. George F. Magoun has just passed away after a lingering illness. She was a graduate of Mount Holyoke Seminary, and for some time a successful teacher in that famous institution. In 1870 she was married to Dr. Magoun, president of Iowa College. She was a woman of great personal power and a most efficient worker, particularly in the Sunday school and missionary cause. She was the first president of the Iowa Woman's Board of Missions. Of her personal efforts to bring people to Christ there are many cheering testimonies. So high did she stand in the Congregational fellowship that the last State association nominated her for election as corporate member of the American Board.

Pensions and Politics.

For some time a bitter contest has been going on between the managers of our Soldiers' Home and the beneficiaries thereof. Most of those who go to that institution are receiving a pension of at least twelve dollars a month. The board of managers thought that a portion of these pensions should go to the maintenance of the home, unless the veterans had families depending upon them. The matter was taken to the courts, and the Supreme Court has at last rendered a decision to the effect that the soldiers may retain six dollars of their pensions and the remainder must be turned over to the home. The soldiers naturally oppose this very strongly, but citizens generally think the decision just.

Our legislature is soon to convene in special session to consider the new code. It is a question whether it will enter upon general legislation. Most of our daily papers are demanding that a law be passed to legalize the manufacture of liquors, but the temperance sentiment of the State is strongly against it. We cannot tell what will be done. W. W. G.

THEY BOTH WANT GOLD.—It is a curious coincidence that while Eastern business men are struggling for gold currency the wives of these men are struggling for gold furniture, which this year is in the very hight of fashion. In all the furniture warerooms the visitor is shown gold furniture in a multitude of shapes and forms. To see the largest and most complete exhibition our readers should visit the warerooms of the Paine Furniture Co. on Canal Street. Here, too, the lowest prices are quoted.

Got Strong and Well by Using Dr. Greene's Nervura.

Mrs. J. W. Beale, 52 Eastern Ave., Worcester, Mass., says:

"I was sick for more than seven years, not able to do my housework for five years. The whole length of my spine was very bad, which went to my head, being so bad that it was about impossible for me to stoop to the floor or turn my head to the right or left, my neck was so stiff. I also had kidney trouble.

"I used Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy. Words cannot express my wonderful cure! Now all is changed, and I am strong and well, and able to do all my work. I have gained 26 pounds in weight, and where before all was gloom and despondency, there is now light and hope."

Dr. Greene's Cathartic Pills should be taken with the Nervura if the bowels are constipated. Dr. Greene, 34 Temple Place, Boston, Mass., the most successful physician in curing nervous and chronic diseases, can be consulted free, personally or by letter.

You will find our number for each selection in the list of our Records.

THESE people are certainly enjoying themselves, and no wonder, for they are listening to one of the most varied entertainments ever given in a private parlor. They were first, as you will perceive by the accompanying programme, entertained by a piano solo. They then listened to a popular and patriotic song. The next selection was a banjo solo, and after that a song by the baritone, J. W. Myers, "Starlight, Starbright"; then a recitation, "The Imitation of a Street Fakir." This was followed by a male quartette. Then came the very popular and famous Billy Golden with his plantation song, "Bye, Bye, Ma Honey"; following that a cornet duet, and then the French national song, "La Marseillaise," by Signor F. A. Giannini.

We have introduced in this advertisement the whole programme as rendered at this evening's "Home Entertainment"; each selection was a reproduction of the original. You listen to the quality and strains of the cornet; you absolutely hear the picking of the banjo, while the quartette singing and the solo singing are the natural reproductions of the real artists.

So true to life are these reproductions that if you were to come into the hall and see the people gathered together and yet not know that the evening's entertainment was given by a reproducing or, as it is perhaps better known, a talking machine, you would really never know it unless you had a chance to enter the room.

This special talking machine, the Berliner Gramophone, is the newest and the best. Its results are better than those of the regular $100 talking machines. We have made this result possible because of the discovery of a new way to record sound. It is recorded upon a flat disc and finally placed upon hard rubber, which makes it indestructible, very easy to handle, and, for the first time, thoroughly adapted for family use. These discs cost 60 cents singly, or $6 per dozen, and, as the variety is almost unlimited, you can have a never-tailing source of pleasure and entertainment. Great men and great artists will be recorded, and you will thus be abel to hear, in your own home, people of national and international reputation.

There is no musical instrument that the Gramophone does not reproduce. This spring motor machine, which runs by clockwork, we sell for $25, express prepaid to any point east of the Rocky Mountains. To points beyond we allow Denver express rates. Two records are included with each machine.

We Guarantee Perfect Satisfaction, and will return your money, less express charges, if it is not satisfactory. It winds easily, turns three records without rewinding, weighs only fifteen pounds, and has the great advantage of being always ready for use, because its power is within itself.

We have two other styles for $10 and $15; the $10 machine is run by hand, and is furnished with ear tubes for two people to hear. The $15 is also run by hand, but is supplied with a governor, so that the speed is regulated, and after it is turned as fast as necessary cannot be turned any faster. This makes the hand machine sure to give you a good reproduction, even in the hands of a novice.

These two styles—the $10 and $15 machines—sent prepaid, as above indicated, upon receipt of price. All equipment necessary accompanies each machine. Send for Catalogue. Send Money by Registered Letter, Post-Office Order or New York Draft to

THE CONGREGATIONALIST

Boston Thursday 4 February 1897

AN EVENING COMMUNION.

I.

The large first stars come out
Above the open hill,
And in the west the light
Is lingering still.

II.

The wide and tranquil air
Of evening washes cool
On open hill and vale,
And shining pool.

III.

The calm of endless time
Is in the spacious hour,
Whose mystery now unfolds
To perfect flower.

IV.

The silence and my heart
Expect a voice I know—
A voice we have not heard
Since long ago.

V.

Since long ago thy face,
Thy smile, I may not see,
True comrade, whom the veil
Divides from me.

VI.

But when earth's hidden word
I almost understand,
I dream that on my lips
I feel thy hand.

VII.

Thy presence is the light
Upon the open hill.
Thou walkest with me here,
True comrade still.

VIII.

My pain and my unrest
Thou tak'st into thy care.
The world becomes a dream,
And life a prayer.

CHARLES G. D. ROBERTS.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

Although the snowstorm will prove a help to general trade, its immediate effects were to check the movement of most lines of merchandise. It, of course, stimulated the demand in some retail lines, and this increase will probably lead to enlarged purchases by retailers from jobbers. The distribution of heavy winter goods is increasing, but traveling salesmen report buyers unusually cautious.

Although money is a drug at the large financial centers, mercantile collections in the country are very unsatisfactory. However, the prospects for spring trade are bright, and several large merchants believe that by the middle of February the entire business situation will be much more encouraging.

Raw wool continues in great demand, and there have been fairly good orders placed for woolen goods. In spite of the efforts to relieve the situation by curtailing on the production of print cloths at Fall River, the movement of cotton goods continues unsatisfactory. A slightly better demand for leather is noted, but the expected improvement in iron and steel is dilatory in making its appearance. Concessions in prices on the last-named articles have been reported, but prices are nominally the same as in previous weeks.

A feature of the past week has been the sharp decrease in the number of failures in the country; they aggregated last week 326, against 429 the week previous. This is a falling off of 103, and of 67 when compared with the corresponding week of 1896. Bank clearings last week declined eight per cent. in volume from the week before, but were seven per cent. larger than the clearings for the same week a year ago.

In New York the stock market is quiet but steady. There has been more or less pressure from the so-called room traders, but their efforts to knock prices down were not especially successful. In Boston all the excitement continues to be centered on the copper stocks, although an effort, and a good one, is being made to start a speculation in the gold mining stocks listed on the local stock exchange.

WHERE HISTORY IS BEING MADE.—The attention of the whole country at the present time is turned toward the national Capitol where so many questions of great public interest are being debated by both houses of Congress The personally conducted tours operated under the management of the Royal Blue Line afford an opportunity for every one to visit Washington under the most favorable conditions and at a minimum of expense. The parties start Tuesday, Feb. 16, Thursday, March 18, Friday, April 2, and Tuesday, May 4 The rate of $27.00 from Boston pays for transportation for the round trip, staterooms, meals en route, transfers, five days at the Riggs House, Ebbitt House or Willard's, side trip to Alexandria and Mount Vernon, a stop at Philadelphia and privilege of stop over in New York as long as desired. Rates in proportion are made from other points in New England. Although the rate is low the accommodations are absolutely first class and the managers cater to the best people. A special "Inauguration Tour" has been arranged for March 2, and two tours to Old Point Comfort and Washington will leave March 26 and April 20. Illustrated itinerary and further information can be obtained from A. J. Simmons, N. E. A., 211 Washington Street, Boston.

YOU can be well when your blood is pure, rich and nourishing for nerves and muscles. The blood is the vital fluid, and when it is poor, thin and impure you must either suffer from some distressing disease or you will easily fall a victim to sudden changes, exposure, or overwork. Keep your blood pure with Hood's Sarsaparilla and be well.

$500 IN GOLD GIVEN AWAY!

We have had a number of word contests in the past and prizes have been awarded fairly. The owner of every winning list has received prizes, and all testify to the square dealing of Mr. Plummer. In entering this contest you are sure of getting the money to which your list entitles you. We first adopted these word contests this season. We have given away $800, since we began these word contests, to 94 persons, and would like to publish the names and addresses of all the winners, but it would take too much space. We do publish, however, the names and addresses of the winners of first prizes in each of our preceding contests. Here they are: $50.00—Dr. E. H. M. Sell, 137 W. 94th st., New York City; $10.00—Miss M. Louisa Allen, Upper Village, Marion, Mass.: $20.00—E. H. Burt, West Winfield, N. Y.; $10.00—Mrs. O. H. Coolidge, 93 Maple st., Rutland, Vt.; $20.00—Mrs. Emily Burt, West Winfield, N. Y. This is our largest and best contest. We give

$500 IN GOLD | FREE

61 Prizes, aggregating $500; a Genuine Bona-Fide Offer. We give nothing but cash for prizes. No trash. Here is our proposition. Who can form the greatest number of words from the letters in INSTRUCTION? You can make twenty or more words, we feel sure, and if you do you will receive a good reward. Do not use any letter more times than it appears in the word. Use no language except English. Words spelled alike, but with different meanings, can be used but once. Use any dictionary. Plurals, pronouns nouns, verbs, adverbs, prefixes, suffixes, adjectives proper nouns, allowed. Anything that is a legitimate word will be allowed. Work it out in this manner: INSTRUCTION: In, Tin, Ton, Sin, Son, Sir, Scion, Run, Us, etc. The publisher of WOMAN'S WORLD AND JENNESS MILLER MONTHLY will pay $100.00 in gold to the person able to make the largest list of words from the letters in the word INSTRUCTION; $50.00 for second largest; $25.00 for each of the next three largest lists: $20.00 to each of the next three; $15.00 to each of the next three; $10.00 to each of the next nine, and $2.00 to each of the next forty largest lists—sixty-one prizes in all to the sixty-one largest lists. Don't you think you could be one of these sixty-one? You will enjoy the making of the list. Why not try for the first prize? The above rewards are given free and without consideration for the purpose of attracting attention to our handsome woman's magazine, thirty-two to thirty-six pages, each page containing four long columns, finely illustrated, and all original matter, long and short stories by the best authors; price $1.00 per year. It is necessary for you, to enter the contest, to send 25 cents (money-order, silver or stamps), for a three months' trial subscription with your list of words, and every person sending the 25 cents and a list of twenty words or more is guaranteed an extra present by return mail (in addition to the magazine), of a 100-page book, "BESIDE THE BONNIE BRIER BUSH," by the famous Ian Maclaren. This book has attracted more attention in the United States than any book of recent years. We give a complete unabridged edition, handy size, finely printed. Satisfaction guaranteed in every case or money refunded. Lists should be sent at once, and not later than April 20. The names and addresses of successful contestants will be printed in May issue, published April 25. Our publication has been established ten years. We refer you to any mercantile agency for our standing. Make your list now. Address JAMES H. PLUMMER, Publisher, 225-226-227 Temple Court Building, New York City.

TO EVERY ONE.

HOW many words do you think you can correctly spell with the letters in the word "MANUFACTURERS"? Using each letter as desired, but not more times than it appears in Manufacturers. Prefixes, suffixes, proper nouns, obsolete and foreign words not allowed. Work it out as follows: Am, Can, Cans, Cure, Cures, Rum, Same, Fact, Facts, Fracture, Manufacturers, etc. Words spelled alike but having different meanings count as one.

Our Offer.—We will pay $100 for the largest list, $50 for the second largest, $25 for the third, $10 each for the next five, $5 each for the next ten, and $1 each for the next twenty-five. That is to say we will divide among forty-three contestants the aggregate sum of $300, according to merit. Don't you think you could be one of the forty-three? TRY IT.

Our Purpose.—The above rewards for mental effort are given free and without consideration for the purpose of attracting attention to MODES, by May Manton, the most popular up-to-date Fashion Magazine in the world. Its 36 pages, replete with beautiful illustrations of the latest styles in ladies', misses' and children's garments, make it a real necessity in every household; the Designs and Fashion Hints, being by May Manton, render it invaluable as an absolutely reliable Fashion Guide.

Our Conditions.—You must send with your list of words 25 cents (stamps or silver) for a Three Months' Trial Subscription to MODES.

Our Extra Inducement.—Every person sending 25 cents and a list of 15 words or more, will, in addition to three months' subscription, receive by return mail a pattern of this stylish waist No. 6973 (illustrated above), in any size from 32 to 40 inches.

Our Aim.—The present monthly circulation of MODES exceeds 100,000. We aim to make it 200,000.

This contest will close March 15th next, so the names of successful spellers may be published in the following issue of MODES, but SEND IN YOUR LIST AT ONCE. For our responsibility we refer you to any Mercantile Agency. Address:

Its aim is to place the student in the age and atmosphere when each book of the Bible was written, to enable the reader to study the book amid its surroundings and to become permeated with its life. The writers who have combined to make the volume are among the most celebrated Bible students, scholars, Egyptologists and divines of Great Britain and America. . . . The book contains helps to the study of the Old and New Testaments, with an analysis of the books and articles on the Canon, Monumental Testimony, etc., a series of articles on History, Chronology, Geography and Bible Science; notes on Bible antiquities, Jewish worship and sects—a carefully compiled concordance with a Bible atlas. More than three hundred and fifty illustrations accompany the text, and all of them are of value to the students of the Bible. They are not pictures so much as guides and expositors in the Holy Word. The teacher who has this treasury will be able to bring forth things new and old for doctrine, for reproof, for instruction in righteousness, to answer objections, refute arguments, and uphold the truth of God. Such a book demands attentive study and rewards it. It is a result of ripe learning consecrated to the best of uses and will be of great service to those who read and teach the word of God. This treasury will be bound with several new editions of the Bible, which will make it of special value and convenience."—New York Observer, December 31, 1896.

TO CHRISTIAN WRITERS.

Desiring to secure a religious story of superior merit, we offer ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS in Cash for the best MS. submitted to us before Sept. 1, 1897, and FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS for the second best MS., each to be from 60,000 to 65,000 words in length.

$1000.00 FOR A STORY

PURPOSE OF THE BOOK.—It is customary for Sunday-school teachers and officers to make gifts to their scholars at the Christmas season. This Company aims each year to take advantage of this by offering them, for the purpose, a book of superior attractiveness and merit—one that will be unrivalled as a gift and which will prove a powerful factor in elevating and molding the heart and life of the reader. Of "Titus," our Christmas book for 1894, there have now been sold nearly one million copies. "The Wrestler of Philippi," published for the holidays of 1896, has had a very large sale. The $1000.00 book accepted we shall bring out for 1897. The $500.00 book, if one of sufficient merit is secured, will be published for the season of 1898.

REQUIREMENTS.—We believe that Jesus lived and taught a life which, rightly discerned, would mean a hundredfold more of true happiness and glory here and now, than a life of mere seeking for wealth, honor, or human friendships. We believe that He desired—as we know he prayed for—a union with us as close as His with the Father, and that He offered and does offer a complete and perfect gift of Himself to all who will receive Him—a real and present friendship and companionship, such as alone can call forth the entire love of the human heart, soul, mind and strength. It is not the physical frame that we love, but the soul shining through. One may receive a true mental picture of God through rightly studying the life of God in the flesh—thus coming to know Him and love Him as we realize His unchanging nature and respond to His spirit within us—and so may enter a life of union with Him. The book should help the reader to the best conception of this life and true living of it. It will be judged upon its literary merits and forcefulness for this purpose. The widest liberty will be given writers as to plot.

THE PLAN.—Each MS. will be given a number. A receipt will be sent to the author, stating the number assigned. All MSS. will be submitted (without authors' names) to three competent judges. Judges will not be asked to examine MS. written in pencil or otherwise improperly prepared. Payment will be made for the best two books received, without reserve, on completion of examination and not later than October 30, 1897.

WHY UNDERTAKE WRITING.—There is seldom such an opportunity offered a writer for both usefulness and gaining wider reputation. Few religious story books reach a sale of more than five or six thousand. We can insure a sale of at least half a million. With such an incentive and purpose you should find greater inspiration in writing. If your book is not considered the best, or second best, you will still have as good a chance as otherwise of selling it to some other publisher—and most books are written and a publisher afterwards sought. WE suspect that our Handbook topic for the midweek meetings last week, Our Own Church Covenant, gave rise to considerable earnest and fruitful heart searching. Falling at a time when from certain quarters criticism has been spread broadcast concerning the low spiritual life of the average Christian, this topic must have set people to thinking. In one church with which we are acquainted the pastor and people read in unison their covenant, after which various interpretations and applications of it were made by one and another. It was pointed out that the compact involves one's due share of the financial burdens, proper deference to those appointed to take the lead in Christian activities, as well as friendly thought for individual members of the same flock. It would profit our churches to pay more frequent attention to such a theme as this. The sacred bond which unites confessors of Christ to one another is held too lightly in many cases. If one is negligent of his covenant obligations to his Christian brethren with whom he has promised to walk together, "loving and being loved, blessing and being blessed, serving and being served," how can his loyalty to Christ, the chief among many brethren, be regarded as complete and genuine?

Last Thursday was not a day, meteorologically speaking, to tempt people out of doors, consequently the observance of the Day of Prayer for Colleges had to contend with unusual obstacles. The reports, however, on another page indicate, in many cases, an uncommonly good attendance upon the exercises of the day, most of which were voluntary. This was the seventy fifth anniversary of the day originally set apart "as a season of fasting and special prayer that God will pour out his spirit on the colleges of our country the present year more powerfully than ever before." Conditions have changed mightily since 1823 and Christian life both in college communities and in the outside world evidences itself in different ways but, now as then, the need is urgent for special prayer and effort for the young in process of education. We are glad that in various pastoral prayers last Sunday they were especially remembered.

Criticism which is simply fault-finding is always mischievous, at least in aim. Criticism which springs from genuine interest in the object scrutinized is helpful. It results oftener in praise than blame. In all kinds of work in which we are partners it is our duty, as well as our privilege, to criticise. Even adverse criticism is more to be desired than indifference. And indifference to the ways in which great benevolent societies are administered is one of the chief causes which have brought so many of them into debt. For this reason we heartily indorse Dr. Stimson's article on page 155. After some investigation, we are led to believe that not one in a hundred of the supporters of our missionary societies has ever examined an official statement of their financial affairs, or offered any helpful suggestion concerning them. This is not through the fault of the societies. They invite investigation. Their annual reports may be had for the asking. If each church should devote one of its mid-week prayer meetings as often as once in five years to a careful and sympathetic consideration of the administration of our benevolent societies, the cost of administration of each and the expenditure on the field being presented in detail by persons previously appointed, then the churches would be attending to their own business, and could pray for its prosperity much more intelligently than they now do.

Discouraging signs of indifference to the progress of temperance have not been wanting in recent years. But there are encouraging signs also. Some of these appear in the report presented last week at the annual meeting of the Massachusetts Total Abstinence Society. It appears that in this State the total vote on local option showed a no-license majority of 3,914. While seventeen cities voted for license, fifteen voted against it; and while sixty-one towns voted for license, 275 towns voted against it, and seven towns with license grant no permits for saloons. During the last fifteen years there has been a marked gain in the number of votes against the saloons, changing from a considerable majority in their favor to a substantial majority against them. It is reported also that there is much dissatisfaction at present among liquor dealers in Boston because of poor business. The hard times have no doubt affected them. It is suggested that the influence of the revival meetings now in progress has not been without effect. Many dealers are asking to have their licenses transferred to suburban districts, which is against the declared policy of the police commissioners. Yet it behooves those who would protect their homes against such mischievous invasion to be alert and watchful.

Close upon the recent annual meeting of the Boston Congregational Church Union came last week the yearly anniversary of a sister society, which undertakes to do a similar work in Brooklyn, New York and vicinity. Superintendent Stokes's report showed that there are fourteen churches under the care of the society, three being organized during the last year. There are now fifty-eight Congregational churches in the metropolitan district. Points in the address of the president, Rev. R. J. Kent, D. D., well deserve the attention of all who have at heart the conserving and the propagating of Congregationalism in urban districts the country over. Dr. Kent laid stress upon the responsibility of pastors for leadership in this work. He is an emphatic believer in so enlarging the scope of local church extension societies that they can purchase a site, erect a building, engage a minister and foster the church until it is able to stand alone. He would also pay a sufficient salary to insure to these newer fields the services of an efficient man. His sentiments respecting the responsibility as well as the privilege of those who cast in their lot with weaker enterprises are worth quoting:

> The planting of churches is hard work. It is a test of faith, a tax upon one's strength; it drives one often to prayer. Somebody must do the hard work. Somebody must attend the small church. Somebody must solve its problems. It is a good deal easier, in some respects more pleasant, to be connected with and contribute toward the support and work of an established church. But the work if hard is blessed.

No one can doubt that our denomination is aroused as never before to the need of wise and united action in solving the common problems of a given locality.

Dr. Edward Everett Hale has been moved to reply publicly to an appeal in behalf of funds for the American Bible Society. He indicates an unwillingness to respond because the American Bible Society prints and circulates the Authorized rather than the Revised Version of the Scriptures. Without discussing the relative merits of the two versions, it would be well to bear in mind that in about half the work of the American Bible Society neither version is used, the Scriptures being in foreign languages. This is a magnificent part of the society's work for the world. It may also be suggested that the present revision is not in the form in which the American revisers would like to have it. Now that the years are passed during which it was agreed between the revisers in Great Britain and America that they would issue no other edition than that which was put forth from the Jerusalem Chamber, it may be that there will be a revision which it would be eminently proper for the society to issue as its standard. It would be unwise for it to change its standard text every few years, and with this possibility of a text in due time in which the suggestions of the American revisers shall be incorporated, there was what seems to many a sufficient reason why the society should not be in haste to adopt the work of the revisers as put forth in 1880.

A large audience gathered in Calcutta the night before Christmas to hear Rev. Dr. John Henry Barrows's first lecture on the Universalism of Christianity, given on the Haskell foundation. Dr. Barrows began by asking for a candid hearing to his answers to the self-imposed inquiry, Is Christianity Fitted to Become the World Religion? He said he did not come to seek controversy, he specially requested that those who came to learn and perhaps to criticise might hear all the addresses before they criticised. His first lecture was one in which he differentiated between Christianity and all other religions in its world-embracing and missionary aspects. Dr. Barrows estimated that between four and five hundred of the fourteen hundred millions of people on the face of the globe are professing Christians, and he doubts whether there is any other religion which has half this number. As for Mohammedanism, while he is prepared to admit that it has noble representatives here and there, and while it is pushing its missionary conquests in Africa with marvelous success, he feels certain that it is linked with forms of despotic government which modern civilization is sweeping away. Both it and Buddhism are being penetrated with, and in some respects modified by, the Christian gospel, while none of their attempts to carry on missionary work among Christians have reached historic importance.

EXPERT TESTIMONY.

Within recent years the practice of introducing so called experts to testify in court about matters relating to their particular branches of knowledge has become much more common than formerly. But its prevalence has proved to be attended by an evil so serious as to weaken its value, if not even to render it ridiculous, not to add dangerous. We refer, of course, to the ease with which specialists can be induced to give the most flatly contradictory evidence. The records of important trials during the last ten years abound in illustrations of this fact. They are notorious. They cause much unfavorable comment. They are not peculiar to American courts.

It is needless to assume that the experts who thus contradict one another are insincere. Honest men differ, sometimes radically, about simple matters, and more frequently about subjects which are too intricate for untrained comprehension. The charge that any sort of testimony can be obtained for a sufficient fee may have some foundation, but most professional men, at any rate, are above conciously selling their opinions thus unscrupulously. Yet the conviction of the untrustworthiness of such evidence is due partly to the suspicion of its insincerity. It is due, also, to its patent inconsistency. When two medical men, for example, alike of high repute for training, experience and the same sort of special knowledge, contradict each other squarely on the witness stand in regard to medical facts or possibilities, a loss of confidence in the value of such testimony follows inevitably. It is generally believed that one, if not also the other, has allowed his feelings or wishes to modify his judgment. Such testimony, therefore, is falling rapidly into disrepute.

Yet it has great value. If confidence in it could be preserved, it soon would regain its former authority. We believe that much good would result from a change in the current method of introducing it. At present both prosecution and defense are allowed to present expert witnesses, all of whom receive suggestions beforehand from counsel as to the nature of the testimony which they are expected to give. Thus they often become more or less consciously identified with the interests of one or the other side, and, being only human, their sympathies then seem to affect their opinions. But the chief value of their testimony lies in its impartiality. Would not this be better preserved if they were to be summoned to testify by the State instead of by the parties involved? Even when the State itself is concerned, this might be managed so that the State's attorneys should possess no practical advantage. The fees of such witnesses might be paid by the State, or—probably a wiser course—charged to the side demanding such testimony, or divided, if each side should call for it. The less that either party to a case has to do with procuring such expert witnesses, the larger is the assurance that their evidence will be impartial and trustworthy.

COLLEGES FOR THE PEOPLE.

Republics must always hold education in honor, for where the responsibilities of government rest on all the people, all must have some knowledge of wise ways of governing. Our fathers, in founding this nation, set a high value on popular education and made generous sacrifices to provide it for those who could not themselves pay for it. Their descendants have followed their example. Into new regions and into sections where poorer classes abound we have sent money and teachers, believing that this is true patriotism as well as philanthropy.

Education does not belong exclusively to any class. All the people believe in it. They tax themselves willingly for it. They set apart land to be perpetually used to promote it. They believe also in higher education. Not common schools only, but colleges and universities are their pride. Hitherto they have cherished these institutions because they have been convinced that they are for the common good. Many towns and cities have provided high and classical schools in which boys may prepare, without any expense even for books, to enter college. In recent years girls have been allowed to share the same privileges. In several States young men and women may gain university training at public expense so far as tuition is concerned.

Hitherto none of our colleges have been claimed by any one class. None of them have offered special advantages to the rich. Their special privileges have been extended to the poor. They have estimated students, not by their ancestry or the wealth of their families, but by their possibilities of intellect and character. Any one acquainted with any of our colleges knows that the larger proportion of those connected with them have to live with close economy. More sons of rich men, probably, go to Harvard than to any other college. But President Eliot, speaking the other night on the relations of working men to the college, said that there are ten times as many sons of poor men as of rich in Harvard, and no other institution distributes so large funds to help poor students.

The working men of America have no greater safeguard for their interests than the educated men who have come from their ranks. No class work harder than these. The memory of their early days remains with them, and the necessity of work in which they were trained abides with them as a habit of life. A large proportion of college graduates have come from farms and shops and factories, where their fathers remained till the end. A still larger proportion, whose fathers were professional men, look back to the farm and the factory in the second generation.

It would be most unfortunate, then, if among working classes, so-called, there should arise a hostility toward higher institutions of learning. It would indicate an ominous decline of the country in power and progress. The movement to tax Yale, Brown, Williams and other colleges indicates that such hostility may be springing up. Such a demonstration in favor of socialism cannot become popular if the people think soberly what it means.

The colleges also can be true to their mission only as they make it evident that they exist for all the people. The fostering of a class spirit in them, bringing rich men's sons into social organizations by themselves, is a menace to society. The building of costly dormitories, with high prices for rooms, and providing other luxuries for the rich and temptations to the poor students to live beyond their means, make against the best things for which the college exists. The tendency in this direction is not only a serious damage to education itself, but depreciates its value in the eyes of those who have not been able to get it for themselves, but are struggling to provide it for their children. A greater responsibility than ever rests on those who manage these institutions. The people love and honor our colleges because they look on them as guardians of their best interests. They want their most promising sons and daughters to be educated in them, that they may better serve these interests. There could hardly be a greater evil than for the people or the colleges to try to build up a wall of separation between them.

THE MANHATTAN ASSOCIATION AND DR. ABBOTT.

Dr. Abbott's Sunday evening lectures in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, on The Old Testament as Literature, as they have progressed, have attracted increasing attention, and increasing disapproval has been expressed by many ministers. When they began several Presbyterian and Baptist pastors in that city commenced series of sermons opposing Dr. Abbott's views. Congregational ministers, so far as reported, made no public mention of the matter. Yet it appears that they, too, have been increasingly disturbed over Dr. Abbott's treatment of the Bible. In his last week's lecture the audience broke out in laughter over his rendering, in his own language, of the account of Jonah being swallowed by a fish and, while in the fish's belly, composing a prayer in sentences selected from the Psalms. Dr. Abbott disclaimed any intention of ridiculing the sacred Scriptures, but said that the amusement he had awakened showed the incongruity of the story, which he regards as wholly fiction and written for the purpose of satire.

The Manhattan Association met in Brooklyn on the following Wednesday, Jan. 27, and, after animated discussion, passed the following resolution by a vote of twenty to six:

> In view of recent and current public utterances from a prominent Congregational pulpit of this city concerning the Bible which are being widely disseminated by the press, we, the members of the Manhattan Association of Congregational Ministers, fearing that by our silence such utterances may be accepted by uninformed people as receiving our indorsement as Congregational pastors and ministers, do declare our emphatic dissent from such handling of Holy Scripture and sincerely deplore the probable results of such teachings.

The resolution was introduced by Dr. McLeod and was earnestly supported by Drs. Behrends, Meredith, Lyman and others. Dr. Stimson introduced an amendment in language which he deemed more courteous, though he said he was not opposed to the spirit of the resolution. The amendment was defeated. Most of the Brooklyn ministers are members of the association. They voted solidly for the resolution. Dr. Abbott is not a member.

The discussion of the resolution by the association is fully reported in the Brooklyn Eagle, which also gives interviews on the subject with Dr. Behrends and Dr. Meredith. We infer from these reports that the specific topics treated by Dr. Abbott were not discussed. But while those who supported the resolution did not mention the particular views from which they dissented, they emphatically expressed their dissatisfaction with Dr. Abbott's method of treating the Scriptures. They believe that his proposition to approach the Bible as he approaches any other book is not a wise way to instruct a popular audience in Christian truth. They believe that it lessens reverence for the Bible and weakens its authority. They object to the presentation of theories as positively settled on which Biblical scholars are divided. Finding that Dr. Abbott's statements are discussed in their congregations, and thinking that their silence might be interpreted as agreement with him, they felt it necessary to disclaim such agreement, or any responsibility for his utterances.

We believe the action of the association was timely and wise. Dr. Abbott is the only Congregational pastor in Brooklyn who is preaching on the higher criticism of the Bible. But he is not the spokesman of the Brooklyn ministers, and since they were of one mind on this point they could not, in justice to themselves, do less than to say so to the public. It is more dignified and effective to say this in a simple resolution than in many pulpit discourses. The effect of it will be reassuring to many who have been startled by Dr. Abbott's attempt to remodel the Bible, and many more who would have gone far beyond him will be recalled by seeing that he stands alone in this effort, and that men as able and scholarly as he is dissent decidedly from positions which he has declared settled.

But the matter, of course, cannot rest here. The Brooklyn pastors, having declared themselves not in accord with Dr. Abbott's handling of the Scriptures, will be expected by their congregations to set forth their own position concerning the Bible and to teach them the better method of studying it. Their hearers are reading the reports of Dr. Abbott's lectures. Many of the young people, Dr. Behrends said, are flocking to Plymouth Church on Sunday evenings. Wrong views must be met by right views, and those which are in question must be settled as far as possible. This is to be done, not in the spirit of controversy, but by positive statements and scholarly demonstration. A most important task is thus laid on the pastors of Brooklyn, and there are none in the denomination abler or better equipped to undertake it. Dr. Meredith has already expressed his intention to treat the matter in his own pulpit. The ultimate result, we believe, will be a greatly increased popular interest in the study of the Bible, which, guided by wise and consecrated teachers, will lead to clearer and more reverent recognition of the character and will of God revealed therein.

CHRIST'S UNIQUE POSITION IN THE WORLD.

In what consists the uniqueness of the history of Jesus Christ? Not wholly in the fact that in him God was revealed to men. This revelation was supreme in him, but in a degree it also has been made in every truly good man or woman, and it often has been recognized. Nor wholly in the fact that he died for our race. Hundreds, probably thousands, of others have given their lives freely for their fellowmen. Nor wholly in the fact of his resurrection from the dead. In a sense Lazarus also may be said to have been resurrected. In what, then, does it consist?

In the fact that in each of these respects his relation to us far transcends in importance that of even those who have approached most nearly to him in holy excellence and influence. He was a symmetrical, flawless revelation of the divine character. Nobody else ever has come near to being this. He surrendered his life to save men from sin and its consequences. No one else, no matter how pure and inclusive his purpose, ever has done, or could have done, this. His resurrection, too, was peculiar to himself. Lazarus returned from the grave through Christ's help only, but Christ, when he came back through the gates of death into life, came by his own power, and as "the firstfruits of them that slept," not simply or chiefly in the way of a phenomenon but to proclaim a grand and sacred truth of general application.

Furthermore, his career upon earth was unique because of its sinlessness. Although "tempted in all points like as we are," he uniformly and consistently overcame temptation and set the example of a perfectly holy life. He could have yielded. He was as truly open to temptation as we are, excepting so far as his unfaltering goodness saved him from that weakness in resisting evil which the more or less dominant habit of wrongdoing causes in even the best of us. And his unique holiness in the flesh reminds us that he differs from and surpasses all others in that through him alone we can be forgiven and redeemed. Other holy men can, and do, help us toward holiness. But they are dependent upon him. Apart from him no one can be saved. Their aid, no matter how valuable, can be spared because his remains available. His cannot be dispensed with, no matter what be offered as its substitute. This, however, is not the same as saying that all who never heard of him are to perish. Doubtless all such who have "lived up to their light" spiritually will find themselves at last included in his redemption.

He is unique, too, in that he is the only sufficient source of spiritual grace and strength to all men. The most richly endowed and cultured and most widely influential saints possess but a limited range of helpful power, and that imperfect. They cannot redeem themselves. Much less can they redeem the world, although they do much to promote its redemption. But all men everywhere may find in the Holy Spirit whom Jesus Christ freely sends the ready, appropriate, sufficient and unfailing aid which their souls demand.

CURRENT HISTORY.

The Arbitration Treaty in the Senate.

The Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate on Saturday, by a vote of six to four, decided to report favorably on the treaty, providing certain amendments of it can be made. The four senators voting against reporting favorably were Morgan, Mills and Daniels of the South and Cameron of Pennsylvania, all enemies of the Administration for various personal and political reasons, and indisposed to put social welfare above personal spite. May they have their just reward! This report, when presented to the Senate on Monday, was considered in executive session, and, if reports are to be believed, met with approval.

The committee's report in favor of eliminating the clause of Article X. of the treaty, which gives King Oscar of Sweden and Norway the right to name the umpire in disputes over territorial claims, and recommending that that detail be settled by the six judges of tribunal, will not, if indorsed by the Senate, lead Great Britain to rescind its acceptance of the treaty. But as much cannot be said so confidently if the Senate accepts the committee's recommendation that Article I. of the treaty be amended by the insertion of the following clause:

> No question which affects the foreign or domestic policy of either of the contracting parties or the relations of either with any other state or power by treaty or otherwise shall be subject to arbitration under this treaty except by special agreement.

The Administration is said to oppose any such amendment, deeming it certain to cause Great Britain to halt, and altogether unnecessary as an effort to protect the Monroe Doctrine. If, in the course of debate on the treaty, which should be open, the Administration's representatives can make its case clear, the people will be against any action which will defeat or emasculate the treaty. Better take the treaty, with temporary defects and national reverses, than incur the shame of refusing to sign a compact which the ablest and best men of all lands describe as "the event of the century."

One obstacle to the ratification of the arbitration treaty which, if not removed, might have lost it some votes in the Senate, is probably out of the way. Great Britain and the United States have signed a convention for a commission of four scientists to define so much of the boundary line between Alaska and the British possessions as is marked by the 141st meridian.

The People and the Treaty.

Such resolutions as were passed last week by the National Board of Trade, the legislature of South Carolina, the House of Representatives of the General Court of Massachusetts, the directors of The American Peace Society and the great mass meeting held in Washington, D. C., indicate clearly that the people have little patience with unnecessary delay in so grave a matter and will hold all who cause such delay or who attempt to defeat the treaty to a rigid accountability. When a diplomat like ex-Secretary of State Foster and a jurist like Justice Brewer of the Supreme Court conceive it to be their duty to ignore conventionalities, take the platform at a mass meeting, and urge speedy ratification of the treaty the tension of the public may be imagined. Much weight also belongs to the letter sent forth by the National Arbitration Committee, Hon. William E. Dodge, chairman, and Prof. J. B. Moore of Columbia University, secretary. To this appeal for ratification are appended such names as Maj. Gen. N. A. Miles, Charles W. Eliot, Lyman J. Gage—secretary of treasury to be—and Carl Schurz, and we wish we had space to print in full their historical résumé of the case and their cogent reasons for favorable action.

Congressional Legislation.

The Senate, with little opposition, because so few expect any practical outcome from it, has passed the bill authorizing the President, after March 4, to call an international conference to secure by international agreement "a fixity of relative value between gold and silver as money," to appoint five commissioners to such a conference, the sum of $100,000 being set apart for their compensation and defraying our share of the expense of such a conference.

The House has agreed to the conference report on the Immigration Restriction Bill, party and sectional lines being ignored, the issue being drawn sharply between the views of representatives of urban and rural communities. The bill, as it comes from the conference committee, has some absurd, almost cruel provisions, but its main provisions are not essentially changed, and if passed by the Senate and approved by the President it will at once make smaller the meshes of the sieve through which we sift our future citizens born abroad.

The House has debated, but not passed as yet, the Indian Appropriation Bill. The effort to cripple the Dawes Commission has failed and there is no indication either in the bill itself or in any amendments offered of any disposition of our Roman Catholic brethren to combat longer the wise decision of the Government to cease gradually, but certainly, supporting sectarian schools. This decision imposes grave responsibilities upon the Government, but it also shuts off the chance of greater abuses. Alaska, so dependent now upon mission schools, should quickly be supplied with better Government schools, if we are to do our duty there. It is rather late in the day for legislators to deny the wisdom of the new policy of our nation, which is based on the conviction that it is cheaper to educate and civilize—not to put it on any higher plane—the Indian than it is to fight him, but Representatives Murphy of Arizona and Cannon of Illinois do not seem to be aware of it; hence they found few who agreed with them in their reactionary views, voiced last week.

A Model Appointment.

A sense of duty compelled us to frankly deplore Mr. McKinley's choice of Senator Sherman as Secretary of State. With alacrity then we hasten to congratulate him and the country on his selection of Lyman J. Gage of Illinois as Secretary of the Treasury. A man of highest personal character, with most thorough knowledge of the theory of finance and art of banking, great executive ability, broadest social sympathies and pledged belief in and advocacy of civil service and currency reform, his entrance upon public life will do more to encourage capital to flow forth, to enhearten idealists and dishearten politicians of the baser sort than anything that has been said or done since election day. He will bring fresh, untainted blood into our body politic, which we sorely need. May he, as a "new man," owing no debts to any boss, and free to display his conceded powers on a large scale, do for us in his realm what Richard Olney, a man of the same type and equally untrammeled, has done for us at home and abroad since Mr. Cleveland summoned him to public life. The country is full of men of highest executive ability and character, capable of dealing with large questions in a large way, but they are serving personal or corporate ends, and not until more of them are drafted into public service, or spurred to volunteer, tempted by greater prizes than they now win, shall we rise above the era of mediocrity in administration.

The Physician as a Citizen.

President Cleveland rightly conceives it to be his high duty, as he is about to retire from office, to urge their civic obligations upon all influential men whom he addresses. At the Princeton sesqui-centennial he appealed to educators and scholars. Last week at the semi-centennial of the New York Academy of Medicine he asked his hearers whether their duty was done when they established a professional code of ethics condemning charlatanism, whether their obligations ceased when they refused to engage in malpractice. "The old village physician," he said, "was not only our physician, but he was a man of influence in neighborhood affairs. . . . If he was ever late in visiting a patient it was because he lingered at the post office to discuss the political situation." In order, then, that the physician of today may be as useful as his predecessors, the medical fraternity should be represented in municipal and State legislatures, aiding in abolishing abuses which professional investigations have unearthed, advocating reformatory measures which professional experience has shown to be necessary. Is it replied by any that such participation in civic affairs involves personal inconvenience or loss, to these the President replies:

> Our government was founded in the faith and anticipation that those who loved it most and were best able to hold it steady would be at its helm. Without this it will surely go astray. Never did patient need your medical treatment more than the body politic now needs the watchful care of your patriotic and disinterested citizenship. No object of personal ambition and no activity of professional life should be permitted to withhold from our government the tithe of devotion and service due from its thoughtful, intelligent and educated citizens.

A Plea for a Leader and a Policy.

Parties in Great Britain as well as in this country are in a state of flux, and there, as here, a great opportunity awaits the party and the leader that will clearly define its or his attitude toward specific social evils. As an indication of the situation in Great Britain, consider a recent appeal sent to the Liberal party's whip by such Anglican prelates as Canon Scott Holland of St. Paul's, Dean Stubbs of Ely, Canon Gore of Westminster, and thirteen other less known but equally zealous students of social and political conditions. As Liberals they affirm that "the old policy of Liberalism is practically fulfilled. The questions before us are now primarily social. . . . The temperance question, deeply as we feel its importance, is part of wider social proposals. Effectively to control drink, powers must be given which will control much else as well. . . . We are quite willing to accept disestablishment when it is the nation's will, . . . but we do not see that it would in any way relieve the social pressure on labor. We are convinced that without a definite policy to relieve this pressure the Liberal party will die. . . . In a word, it is a social policy that we want, and a leader who believes in it."

Commenting upon this appeal, Rev. Dr. J. Guinness Rogers, the old Liberal warhorse, rather curtly says: "When church reformers propose schemes that will deal effectually with the evils complained of they may be perfectly certain of co-operation from wise Liberals." It will be interesting to see whether Liberal leaders, less antipathetic to everything Anglican than Dr. Rogers is, will give this appeal a more respectful hearing. It certainly would seem politic to give, at least, respectful attention to men so influential in Anglican circles as those who have signed this appeal—men, too, whose sympathy for the masses has given them such present and potential influence with the Radicals and the leaders of the labor unions.

Recent correspondence between the Anglican Bishop of Chester and the Catholic Cardinal Vaughan indicates that affairs in the Tory party are by no means serene. The Bishop of Chester has ventured to say that the record of Conservatism and of Unionism respecting state aid for Anglican and Roman Catholic schools "is not so unblemished that we [Anglicans] can afford to take the mercies of the present government as the best mercies obtainable," and Cardinal Vaughan plainly says that if "it becomes evident that the government policy is a hand-to-mouth policy of sops and doles . . . it would become our highest prudence . . . to work for a political break-up."

British Rule in India and South Africa.

The latest reports from India do not indicate that the situation there is improving. It is conceded now that the government, assisted by private individuals, must practically support a population of from two and a half to three and a half millions from now until next September. The aid coming from Russia will not amount to very much, supplies sent from this country and Canada will be but a drop in the bucket, and the Mansion House fund in Great Britain is not increasing as rapidly as might have been expected or as is necessary. Charges of the gravest character against those who have administered the reserve fund, which British officials in India have been supposed to be accumulating for just such a crisis as this, are finding expression not only in the Indian press but in leading London journals, and a resolution proposing an investigation was introduced in the British Parliament last week but was suppressed, one scandal at a time, apparently, being the motto of the Ministry.

Cecil Rhodes and the British South Africa

Company officials are to be examined before a special committee of the House of Commons. This much is settled by the events of last week. A section of the Tory party endeavored to prevent such investigation, but Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, in an impressive and able speech, insisted that the investigation must proceed, and he incidentally made such references to the situation in South Africa as startled those who had settled down to the conviction that all danger of a collision between the Dutch and the British had ceased. Few expect that the investigation will go so far as to convict Cecil Rhodes or his wealthy associates of complicity in the Jameson raid. Much depends, however, upon his bearing before the tribunal and his own testimony, and all realize that there are elements of uncertainty and danger in the situation. If he has, as it is reported that he has, brought with him conclusive evidence of an alliance between President Kruger of the Transvaal and Germany and a Dutch conspiracy against British interests in South Africa, then British ire may be aroused in such a way as to obscure the ethical bearings of any conspiracy of his against the Transvaal Republic.

Will Russia's Plans Be Balked?

By far the best news from the Continent this week is the report that Germany, dissatisfied with the results of her attempt to win profit by playing Russia's game, has decided to join with Austria, Italy and Great Britain in bringing about reforms in Turkey, even if coercion has to be used. Reports from Russia concerning the health of the czar vary in their estimate of the seriousness of his condition, but there is reason to believe that he is far from well, overburdened with cares of state, and discouraged by the dissensions of the bureaucracy. The selection of Count Muravieff as Prince Lobanoff's successor as Russian minister of foreign affairs pleases France, displeases Germany and insures, probably, a faithful adherence to Lobanoff's plans for Russia's future.

It is interesting to know that the men at Rome charged with the responsibility of conserving the interests of the Roman Catholic Church are beginning to ponder over the menace to the Roman Church which Russia's supremacy in European Turkey and Asia may create. We are told on high authority that two schools of thought exist. There are those who believe that Russian ascendancy means naught but evil and must be prevented, if possible, by all resources of diplomacy open to the papacy. On the other hand, there are those who believe "that what now constitutes the religious and civil originality of Russia is its traditional character, its atavism, and when this immense ocean shall overflow and its waters mingle with those of the west it will lose its essential properties." They believe that the wider the area and greater the complexity of the Russian empire the more susceptible it is to disintegration and ruin from within. Pope Leo and the leading French Catholic ecclesiastics are said to hold the latter view, else France would not so willingly have agreed to aid in playing Russia's game.

NOTES.

Rev. Dr. A. H. Bradford attended a town meeting in Montclair last week and fought for the interests of the people and against a traction monopoly, which seeks to gain a perpetual franchise to use the streets of the town.

The dinner given last week to Senator-elect Platt of New York by his lieutenants was notable for the letters of declination received from distinguished Republican leaders. Mr. Depew was the only man of note present.——The new Populist senators from South Carolina, Earle, Kansas, Harris, Washington, Turner, are men of high character and more ability and experience than their predecessors. Mr. Dubois's failure to gain renomination in Idaho removes a clever man, recalcitrant partisan. His successor, Mr. Heitfelt, is a German farmer, with no experience and little education. Senator-elect Spooner of Wisconsin is a very able man, and made his mark when in the Senate before.

IN BRIEF.

Next week we shall publish a special article by Rev. I. O. Rankin on Melanchthon, together with a picture of the great German scholar. The article will furnish valuable material for any who are expecting to commemorate on Feb. 16 the 400th birthday of Melanchthon. Our issue of Feb. 18 will treat at length of present conditions in Mt. Holyoke College and the movement which is to crystallize on Sunday, Feb. 28, in special offerings for the college.

Some of our readers who ask for more local church news indirectly suggest that they are more interested to have others hear about them than to hear about others.

Not those who find fault with what is, but those who suggest something better in place of it and show how the better things may be gained, are the greatest benefactors.

Sam. Jones wants $2,000 and expenses for his month's preaching in Boston. So says his manager, Dr. Brady. Now, you Christians that wanted him, "quit your meanness" and pay up.

The Andover Alumni in Boston and vicinity are to lunch together at Young's Hotel Feb. 8, at 1 P. M. We don't remember such an occasion since those secret and solemn conclaves some ten or more years ago.

How small the world is now. Fifty years ago communication between Burmah and America was by letter, and it took four months for one to traverse sea and land. Recently the foreign secretary of the Baptist Missionary Union, at his desk in Boston, received a cable message sent from Rangoon only two hours prior.

"It's an ill wind that blows no man good." John Wanamaker will build a new church edifice for the Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, in which he teaches a Bible class, as a token of his gratitude for the escape of his great emporium from destruction in last week's great fire, whereby others lost property valued at $1,000,000.

The Herald and Presbyter, that stanch defender of Presbyterianism, which loves to point out the weaknesses of Congregationalism, says it is refreshing to see the London Presbytery exercising its prerogative in refusing to release Dr. Pentecost in order that he might accept a call to Yonkers, N. Y. So it is. But he is coming nevertheless.

Three pews in St. Paul's Protestant Episcopal Church, Boston, were put up at auction one day last week, and bargained for in a place where stocks, bonds and such things are constantly made merchandise of. The most ardent advocate of the pew system will scarcely contend that such a spectacle is calculated to win the masses to the church.

The second secretary of the Japanese legation at St. Petersburg recently received leave of absence to travel in Europe and America. On Jan. 14 he arrived in New York city. A Bible which he found in his room at the hotel won his attention; he has been converted, baptized, and is now on his way to Japan to use his influence there in ushering in Christ's kingdom.

A portrait of Rev. Dr. Alexander McLaren, painted by the president of the Royal Scottish Academy, has been hung in the municipal art gallery of Manchester, Eng. Imagine the corporation of the city of New York consenting to have a portrait of Dr. John Hall or Dr. Charles Parkhurst hung on the walls of a municipal art gallery as a permanent testimony of their worth as citizens!

"Faithful are the wounds of a friend." But such wounds are not given to friends in the presence of, and for the amusement of, their enemies. Wholesale accusations made in public meetings against ministers and churches may "wake them up," but are not often followed by spiritual refreshing. We remember John B. Gough's illustration of stimulation without benefit. It was sitting down on a hornet's nest.

The Westminster Shorter Catechism is still the food of many Presbyterian children, at least in the South. The Christian Observer of Louisville prints the names of several hundred children in Presbyterian homes in the South who have committed the catechism to memory during the past year. To all such it gives diplomas and the honor of seeing their names in print. Colored children are printed in a separate list.

Most kind and appreciative are the numerous letters we are receiving from the hosts who entertained the Pilgrims in England last summer, in acknowledgment of The Congregationalist's Book of the Pilgrimage. The sentiments they express are in part summed up in this sentence written by one of them, a mayor of a cathedral city: "It is such opportunities as that you afforded us which do much to cement the feeling of good will between those two great nations, whose friendship is the forerunner of the peace of the world."

Francis A. Walker, William E. Russell, Frederick T. Greenhalge and Phillips Brooks were all comparatively young men when they were suddenly called hence. Why General Walker died before his time may be inferred from a pathetic letter written Dec. 22 to Albert Shaw, editor of the Review of Reviews, published by the latter in the February number, and used as the text for a striking sermon on the evil which good men and worthy societies do in pestering eminent men with correspondence and invitations to speak. It is, as Mr. Shaw says, "a species of assassination."

President Buckham of Vermont University announced in substance at the beginning of this year that hereafter those members of the Senior Class who have a good record thus far will be free from all surveillance as to their attendance on college exercises. But if they don't attend these exercises they will be put again under surveillance. That is, they need not know that they are being looked after unless they make it evident that they ought to be notified of it. The progress of college government in this direction shows that the sense of personal responsibility among students is gaining ground. It is one of the choicest fruits of education.

Bishops Coleman and Perry of the Protestant Episcopal Church assisted in a ritualistic ceremony in Philadelphia last week, in which a portrait of Charles I., king of England, was "enshrined" and made one of the idols before which the neo-pagans will bow down. Bishop Coleman offered the following prayer:

> Bless, we beseech thee, our work in setting up to thy glory in this thy house a likeness of thy servant and martyr, Charles; and grant that all they that visit this temple may be moved by the sight thereof to a faithful copying of his constancy even unto death.

So long as this spirit is abroad it behooves the descendants of the Puritans to be very much in evidence.

A good story, illustrating the fact that now, as in olden times, there are persons whose shifting from one religion to another is not a matter of intellectual conviction chiefly, was told by Dr. E. L. Clark at the public meeting of the City Missionary Society in the Old South Church last Sunday evening. Recently a man called on him and sought an interview on the ground that he was a converted Jew. It soon appeared that this Christianized descendant of Abraham had tea to sell. Dr. Clark saw no reason why he should withdraw trade from his regular grocer, and, though his caller indulged freely in persuasions and exhortations, the Back Bay pastor was not to be inveigled into a purchase. All the vender of teas could do was to retire from the study, firing this parting shot as he lifted his hands in solemn protestation: "You a Christian minister, I a converted Jew! You'll not buy my tea. My God! I will turn Jew again."

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM THE INTERIOR.

A Rare Book.

This book came into the possession of Dr. D. K. Pearsons last week. It contains about 700 names, opposite to which are amounts of money varying from fifty cents to $20,000, representing gifts for the endowment of Colorado College. By far the larger part of the names are of persons living in Colorado, although the East, especially New England, is by no means unrepresented. The names are type-written and are in a thin book plainly bound and entitled The Pearsons Fund of Colorado College, secured between Jan. 1, 1893, and Dec. 31, 1896. Underneath these words are the conditions on which Dr. Pearsons's gift was to be obtained. "The whole sum to be carefully invested in interest-bearing securities, the income only being used to help defray the current expenses of the institution." The book is dated Jan. 1, 1897. The aggregate of gifts, whose value is attested by the signatures of three of the most responsible men in Colorado, is a little short of $155,000. In addition to these subscriptions there are promises for several thousand dollars more, which the critics of the fund threw out as of doubtful value, although admitting that there is a reasonable hope of their collection. To Dr. Pearsons the book is of almost priceless value. It is evidence that another institution is on its feet and that the money he and others have put into it will continue to do good for years to come. After reading over the names the book contains and the testimony of the men whose names accompanied it, Dr. Pearsons sent his check for $50,000 with delight which imparts itself to those who go into his office to talk with him about other plans for our institutions of learning. Within two weeks he has made two institutions happy—the one at Colorado Springs and Pomona College. To the latter he gave $20,000 outright to enable it to meet the conditions upon which large gifts promised by others were secured. Now he is chiefly anxious that Mount Holyoke secure its endowment and that on Feb. 28 the New England churches contribute enough to erect a suitable administration building in memory of Mary Lyon.

The Historical Society.

Tuesday evening, Jan. 26, the Historical Society received from their friends and descendants portraits of three of its ex-presidents, viz., Edwin B. Sheldon, E. B. Washburne and J. Y. Scammon. Each of these men left his impress upon the business, the literary and the social life of the city. Each portrait does justice to its subject and is an ornament to the walls of the building. The society now possesses portraits of all its ex-presidents. That of Mr. Washburne is a copy of one made by Mr. Healy in Paris and is said to be almost perfect. In its new building the Historical Society is now making rapid strides forward, and will soon be reckoned among the most important institutions of the city.

Lyman J. Gage for the Cabinet.

Apart from any ambition which Chicago or Illinois may cherish for a representative in the Cabinet, people in the city and throughout the State feel that no better man than Mr. Gage, none more ideally fitted for the position of Secretary of the Treasury, could be found were the entire country to be searched over. From his boyhood he has been familiar with banking institutions. At present the head of the First National Bank of Chicago, one of the largest moneyed institutions in the country, and one of the strongest, it is eminently proper that his great financial ability should be made use of by the nation. In character, ability, social prestige and patriotism Mr. Gage is often spoken of as the first citizen of Chicago. It is not often that such men as he consent to enter political life. He is fond of historical studies, well posted in political economy and is the one man among capitalists whom labor likes to have as an arbitrator.

Municipal Voters' League.

The action of the Common Council in granting franchises to the General Electric Street Car Company, without duly protecting the rights of the city, is calling forth protests on every side. While it is certain that the ordinance in its present form will receive the mayor's veto, it is evident that it can be passed over his veto. A strong minority in the council has made a gallant fight against it and if this minority can be re-enforced at the coming election by the choice of men who will really protect the rights of the people, we may confidently look for speedy reform in the conduct of our municipal affairs. The Municipal Voters' League, at considerable expense and with great care, has examined the record of every member of the council desiring re-election, has printed it and sent a copy of the pamphlet containing it to every voter in the city. It has not hesitated to say, This man's record is bad. He has voted against the interests of the city for corrupt measures. He has enriched himself at the public expense. He should not be re-elected. The prospects are that in the coming campaign no backward steps will be taken.

Help for the Poor.

The excessive and prolonged cold has been extremely hard for those who live from hand to mouth, and are just able to obtain food and shelter in moderate weather. With the thermometer below zero for five days in succession, some of the time twenty degrees below, intense suffering could not be avoided. At the suggestion of the mayor and the chief of the police the entire police force of the city has been instructed to ascertain every case of need and meet it at once. A call for money, clothing and provisions was issued, and already more than $75,000 have been sent in. At least $100,000 will be required and will surely be furnished. This is known as the Mayor's Relief Fund. At every police station persons have been given needed shelter; hundreds in the aggregate have found a night's lodging in the rooms of the Volunteers and of the Salvation Army, and to those who were destitute of food and fuel both have been sent. The plan of utilizing the police to discover and meet immediate necessities seems to have met the emergencies which the severe cold has brought upon us. Social settlements have also been centers of relief, and the churches, as usual, have contributed generously. Supplies of clothing, for which there has been a loud call, have been furnished in large quantities.

Ministers' Meeting.

Less than half the ordinary number were present at the meeting Monday. The cold seems to have been as effective in keeping ministers from gathering together on Monday as it had proved itself to be in keeping churches thin on Sunday. Still the subject, The Preaching Which the Times Need, was treated by Rev. Mr. Fifield of the Warren Avenue Church and Rev. Dr. Fox of the California Avenue Church with thoroughness and ability. Both of these brethren have shown exceptional skill in reaching the masses and in building up their churches. Both insisted that preaching should be interesting, that it should be simple, in the language of common life, that it present the truth as it is found in the gospels, that it be preached in faith and in reliance upon the Holy Spirit. While differing somewhat in detail as to methods of presenting the truth, each speaker was an illustration of the different ways in which it can be effectively and convincingly set forth.

DEACON DUDLEY'S SUNDAYS IN BOSTON.

III.

BY ALDEN ENDECOTT.

"Why, Jacob, there's a Friends' Church in Boston—out to Roxbury," exclaimed the deacon's wife, looking up from the Saturday Transcript. "I've always wanted to go to a Quaker meeting. Why can't we go there tomorrow morning?"

Mrs. Dudley was beginning to catch the fever of exploration and investigation.

The deacon roused himself from a brown study and looked across the table doubtfully. "Well, I'd just about got my mind made up to go to the Church of the Advent. A man I ran across this morning told me I oughtn't to leave Boston without attending a service there."

"I haven't any patience with those Second Adventists," scornfully remarked the wife.

"O, that's not it. It's an Episcopal church, very high you know, has a boy choir and so on," said the deacon, with an air of superior knowledge. "I suppose," he continued, meditatively, loath to give up his plan but generously willing to compromise, "we might go to the Friends' meeting in the morning and to the Advent in the evening." And so matters were satisfactorily arranged.

As the worthy couple left the Warren Street car on Sunday morning and walked up Townsend Street towards a pretty little church, they speculated as to whether they would be allowed to sit together. "I am afraid you will have to go on one side with the men and I on the other with the women," said Mrs. Dudley, her courage already beginning to fail. But at the door all shyness disappeared as they were met by a courteous young man and ushered to a seat.

They looked about them approvingly, at the neat little meeting house simply finished in light wood, the walls plainly frescoed, the seats uncushioned, the floor uncovered, save for strips of soft blue carpeting up and down the aisles. Yet the modest room had a cheery, cozy air, and reminded the strangers of their own country church. They missed the organ and choir gallery, but discovered in one corner a small parlor organ, which they decided afterwards was intended for the C. E. Society. On the platform stood several chairs in a row behind the pulpit. The center seat was occupied by an elderly man, who proved to be a visiting preacher, the others at his right and left were filled by three sweet faced women and two grave men. The deacon studied their countenances and wondered if they were the elders.

His wife, meantime, was deeply interested in the people who were quietly gathering and arranging themselves in family groups. Perhaps there were seventy-five persons all told—young men and maidens, old men and children, with pleasant, contented expressions on their faces. Mrs. Dudley surreptitiously glanced around at the women's dress. Not an old-fashioned "Quaker bonnet" was to be found, and she noted with mild surprise that the latest style in sleeves was not unknown to Friends.

By 10.30 every one was seated. For fifteen minutes not a sound could be heard but the ticking of the clock and an occasional cough. With closed eyes and an expression of calm serenity the congregation worshiped and waited. Even the little children were perfectly quiet. A boy of eight or nine years in the pew opposite the Dudleys sat with downcast eyes like his father and mother.

Suddenly a sweet soprano singer started a gospel hymn, "The half was never told," and several fresh young voices took up the refrain. Almost immediately one of the women on the platform knelt and offered a simple, fervent prayer. The man next to the preacher followed with a petition for the presence of the Spirit and a lad in the congregation, who could not have been more than fourteen or fifteen years old, lifted up his voice and prayed with an unusual command of Scriptural language. Five minutes perhaps went by in silence. Then the woman who had offered prayer, her strong face lighted up with resolve, came forward and opened the great Bible, saying, with an almost apologetic air, "We Friends profess to believe in receiving a message from the Spirit. I feel moved to read these words thus early in the meeting." In an impressive tone, and sometimes with tears in her eyes, she read the seventeenth chapter of John, commenting upon it verse by verse.

The deacon began to wonder if the service was all going to be like a prayer meeting, when the tall, white-haired man in the seat of honor came forward, and taking as his text Eph. 3: 14–19, talked simply and earnestly about the indwelling Christ and a life and spirit in harmony with God. Deacon Dudley nodded appreciatively at the words: "What the Christian Church needs is this dwelling in Christ; what the individual needs is this indwelling Christ." After the sermon a saintly looking old man on the floor rose to say a few words in the same line. A simple prayer from a young man, another spontaneous hymn and suddenly the Friends on the platform shook hands with each other. This seemed to be the signal for breaking up the meeting without further ceremony.

"I haven't had such a restful two hours since I came to Boston," said Mrs. Dudley as they left the church, after receiving some cordial words of welcome from their neighbors.

"Nor I," asserted her husband. "Do you know, Hannah, it reminded me of the little company of disciples in the upper room watching and waiting for the gift of the Spirit."

Seven o'clock found our friends walking towards Brimmer Street, shivering as an icy blast from the Charles River pierced them through and through. They could not have chosen a more complete contrast to the morning worship than the service at the imposing Church of the Advent.

Dazzled at first by the blaze of light they sank bewildered into the front seat to which they had been led by a youth in long black robes. They soon found themselves facing what seemed like a separate chapel, railed off from the body of the church, but connected with it by wide-open gates. At the distant end of this inner sanctuary—chancel they overheard some one call it—was a great white altar with a crucifix and figures of saints in niches. In front on either side stood enormous candles and candelabra with scores of smaller lights. Golden lamps, shedding a colored light, hung from the ceiling.

With a sort of fascination the Dudleys watched two young men, gorgeously arrayed in scarlet robes and white surplices, move quietly about lighting the candles. Every time they had occasion to leave the inclosure, or to pass the crucifix at the altar, they bowed before it. Seeing this and noticing that several of the worshipers bowed low on entering the pews and crossed themselves when rising from their knees, Mrs. Dudley nudged her husband and asked in dismay if he had not brought her to a Roman Catholic church. But the deacon was too amazed at the proceedings to reply and the attention of both was diverted by sounds of distant singing, which grew louder and louder, until a remarkable procession burst upon their wondering view.

First came a handsome youth in scarlet, bearing a pole, at the top of which glistened a crucifix. He was followed by the choir of boys and men, in black and white robes, singing lustily; then three or four priests, clad like the boys except for the rich old lace which trimmed their surplices; some scarlet robed attendants; and lastly, with an air of indescribable dignity and authority, walked a person upon whom all eyes were fastened. He wore a costume of black satin and purple silk, with white muslin sleeves. A huge chain and cross hung about his neck, and his fingers were adorned with immense rings. These dignitaries in their places within the chancel, the chanting began.

At first the Dudleys tried to keep track of the service, but finally they gave up in despair and sat resignedly in their seats while the people around them knelt or stood. The General Confession and Absolution, the Psalms, even the Apostles' Creed and the Lord's Prayer were sung by choir, priests and congregation. While the idea of singing prayers shocked the visitors, they couldn't but enjoy the music. When one of the priests came forward to the reading-desk the deacon fully expected to hear him chant the Scripture lessons, but he read them with dignity and expression.

Between the two lessons occurred the most unique part of the ceremony. Arrayed in a sumptuous robe of white and gold brocade, one of the priests advanced to the altar swinging a brass vessel which emitted smoke together with a peculiar odor. This was almost too much for Deacon Dudley, but a violent sneeze as the fumes of the incense reached his nostrils somewhat relieved his pent-up feelings, and he sat up straight in his seat mumbling, under his breath, something about "popery"! Two or three prayers were offered by the same splendid personage and then the bishop was escorted to the pulpit and preached a simple sermon in a rich, persuasive, musical voice. Corresponding ceremonies attended the collection and dedication of the contributions, and with the same pomp the procession filed out, the great doors of the chancel swung to and the large congregation dispersed.

As the Dudleys sat in their own room talking over the experiences of the day the Deacon remarked: "I don't wonder the Pilgrims and the Quakers came to America to worship God in their own way if the English Church was like that."

"The bishop preached a good gospel sermon anyway, and I suppose we are not all made alike," replied his wife, charitably. "But the Quaker service set me to reading Whittier's poem, The Meeting, this afternoon, and I couldn't help thinking of his idea of true worship when they were going through so many forms and ceremonies this evening. Just let me read you this bit. He says:

'That worship's deeper meaning lies
In mercy and not sacrifice,
Not proud humilities of sense
And posturing of penitence,
But love's unforced obedience.
That Book and Church and Day are given
For man, not God—for earth, not heaven—
The blessed means to holiest ends,
Not masters, but benignant friends.'"

"LESS CRITICISM AND MORE MONEY": NOT SO!*

BY REV. HENRY A. STIMSON, D. D.

Dr. Roberts, the stated clerk of the General Assembly, may state an important truth when he writes, as he has done lately, that the Presbyterian mission boards need "less criticism and more money." I am not competent to pass judgment upon the situation in our sister denomination. We all appear to be in the same boat as to the scarcity of funds. Dr. Josiah Strong of the Evangelical Alliance reports recently that twelve Protestant societies are carrying a total indebtedness of $1,013,632, and that this great debt would have been larger by $743,020 but for unsparing retrenchment, the total present shortage in missionary funds being thus upwards of one and three-quarter millions of dollars. The denominations represented in this statement are the Presbyterian, Baptist, Methodist, Reformed and Congregational, and the individual deficits of the various boards range from $7,500 to $300,000.

There doubtless are some common and

*Third article in a series of which the two preceding appeared, respectively, Dec. 31, 1896, and Jan. 28.

notable causes for this widespread evil. The times are hard, there are many demands for money, and in the changing conditions both of the world and of religious thought the missionary appeal may not be as strong as it once was. Our concern is primarily with the situation as it is with ourselves.

We need more money badly enough. Though they may figure their statements down a little, the Home Missionary Society requires about $100,000 to set it straight with the world, saying nothing of restoring its sadly retrenched undertakings, and other societies are largely falling short of their appropriations, but I do not believe Dr. Roberts's pithy apothegm is for us the way of light.

We Congregationalists do not fear criticism. We have no one to exercise lordship over us, and no ecclesiastical tribunals; the rumor of differences of judgment does not awaken with us the thought of an appeal to the superior authority. We have had experience of criticism of our missionary societies, painful, and in some ways very costly, but such experiences have been infrequent and happily soon over with. Our difficulty lies quite in another direction. Apathy is a more serious evil than any criticism. We are far too easy-going and irresponsible; good stirring criticism, aboveboard and straight-aimed, is often necessary to wake us up. We get into ruts; we think things are going on as they have "from the foundation of the world"; we make our annual contribution when the time comes around, that is, if we happen to be in church that Sunday, and we leave the rest to somebody else. We follow our habits; some of us go to the annual meetings and try to keep a little informed, but most of us do not. Consequently our missionary societies get separated from the churches; the new generation knows little about them, and sometimes the managers who are left so much to themselves get to feel as if the work belonged to them. They grow overburdened or supersensitive or heavy-handed or discouraged, and, alas! not infrequently our best executive officers break down in health, to our irreparable loss.

Just what we need is criticism, if by that we mean searching and interested inquiry, such as arises when men are keenly interested in a common cause. Our missionary work is not done in a corner. Our great Congregational societies are among the oldest, as they are among the most distinguished in the land. Collectively they gather and expend so much money, employ so many men and cover so wide an area that they are in the front rank with those of the two or three largest denominations. Their work has from the first been our glory; they were never more efficient and never doing a larger work than now. Why should they fear criticism? They are great public trusts; they can be effectively administered only as they have, as we can rejoice to know they almost invariably have had, the absolute confidence of the people.

A comparison is sometimes made with business corporations. The difference is radical in two directions. A business corporation has majority and minority stockholders; they are not always in evidence, but at any moment they may be, and then the majority not only controls, but it may ignore, or even injure, and sometimes destroy the minority. In a religious or benevolent society no such distinction is possible; the management must always represent the entire constituency; there are no opposing interests. Also in a business corporation the business is given over to the directors to take the capital and plant and run the concern for an ultimate dividend which is to satisfy the stockholders. In a religious or benevolent society the constituency is itself at work under the guidance of the executive officers. The success of the enterprise is in maintaining a co-operating interest on the part of all, as by their gifts and their sympathies and their prayers they are brought into touch with the objects of their benevolence and care.

With this fundamental distinction kept in mind it is easy to see that our missionary societies require a different organization and a very different management from a merely business corporation. The temper of the official boards as a whole and of each individual officer must be very different. They have an important executive function toward the work, but they have also a no less important representative relation to the constituency. Contributions are a sensitive measure of this, but they are by no means the only one. Distrust sometimes arises from ignorance, from personal prejudice, from disapproval of a general plan or from the failure of some particular undertaking; therefore openness, the utmost accessibility, the freest and fullest discussion of plans and methods are essential; while personal charm, graciousness of manner, patience, fullness of knowledge and the most obvious freedom from self-seeking are indispensable. These, we may congratulate ourselves, we have almost invariably had in our representatives.

We can set ourselves, therefore, to the freest discussion without fear. Whatever will banish distrust or remove doubts wherever they exist, whatever will promote efficiency or convince of wise economy and judicious administration, that we want to know and do.

I know of no notable grievance, and am just now on no executive board, nor have I any wisdom to put forth, but our societies all need help, and need it badly. It can only come from the people, and must come through an awakening of interest. The people are not ungenerous, nor are they helplessly poor; the past year has been one of boundless benefactions in many directions. Contributions are diverted to local objects whose appeal is constant and whose work lies before the eye. Missionary work is more remote; the hardship of its curtailment is not so apparent and the efficiency of administration is not always known. Moreover, there is a strange unrest in the churches coupled with a strange irresponsibility. It can only be accounted for by the absorption of the minds of Christian men in their business difficulties. Otherwise it is impossible to understand the way in which ministers are suffered to be displaced, ostensibly for their "health," in reality because of the impatience of some of their people. Our churches are permanently injured, and the critical need of our great missionary societies is allowed to stand unheeded. Let us have speech—open, truthful, free—if that is what is needed. Let us know and discuss the situation in all its details until we know what ought to be done and how to do it. Above all let us deprecate the idea that there is anything to conceal or that anybody's criticism is to be dreaded.

THE REVIVAL IN SARDIS.

BY REV. WILLIAM BREWSTER OLESON.

It was the noon hour at the conference in Peacedale. Deacon Hart—some people often spoke of him as Deacon Great Heart—had just joined a group of delegates who were talking about the dearth of revivals and why it was that outside the church there was so little interest in religion, and inside the church so little concern for the conversion of men.

"Well, Deacon," said they, as he joined them, "we hear you've been having a regular old fashioned revival over at Sardis."

The broad, happy face of the Deacon lighted up afresh as he answered: "Yes, praise the Lord, we've had a great blessing. We waited years for the Lord to come, but when we just stopped waiting and every one of us set to work, we found that the Lord was there all the time waiting for us."

"Tell us about it. What methods did you use? How did you go to work?" were the eager questions as they gathered about him.

"Well, you see," said the Deacon, settling himself on the church steps, "it was just this way. We didn't have no revivalist, 'cause some o' the members said if we'd any money to give away we'd better give it to the Parson instead of to a stranger. Besides, you know, they all loved the Parson and they said, 'He loves us, and he knows all about us, and no man from outside can come here to Sardis and talk to us heart to heart the way Parson does.' And so we didn't have no revivalist.

"And it appears to me we didn't have no methods, neither. The Parson, he always kept telling us, 'It don't matter much about methods. The Lord wants men and women and when they're ready to do what's got to be done, the Lord will provide the methods.' The Parson kept at us till we all begun to feel that something ought to be done. And then 'twant long before we begun to feel that we ought to be doing it ourselves.

"Come to look back on't, it does seem cur'ous how we all acted so sort o' blind-like. There we was all waiting for the Lord to come and all praying that he would come. And every time our reg'lar prayer meeting was through we shook hands all round and said we'd had a blessed meeting, and it did seem as though the Lord was going to come to Sardis, and then we all went home and things run on just the same till next week's meeting, and then the Parson would ask us, 'What are we going to do about these people round us that ain't Christians?'

"And then we'd pray and exhort each other to be up and doing, and then the meeting would close and we'd shake hands and say the Lord was good and we hoped he would come to Sardis, and then we'd go home again, and all the time there didn't seem to be no sinners in Sardis that wanted to be saved, and somehow we began to get discouraged like 'cause the Lord didn't come.

"Well, one night, right in the meeting, when everybody was waiting and listening to the ticking o' the clock, Parson says right up quick like, 'Deacon Hart, do you know anybody in this town that needs to be saved?'

"You see I'd already prayed and made some remarks, and the Parson's question come so sort o' sudden like that I was took all aback, and I stammered out, 'I—

I—suppose there are. Why, of course there are. Lots of 'em.'

"'Deacon Hart,' says he, 'will you name one person that needs to be saved?'

"Well, now, do you believe it? I was dumb as a post. There were lots of people I thought about. But somehow I couldn't seem to bring myself to name a single one. There was Joe Smith. I knew he needed to be saved. His wife joined 'fore she was married, but Joe, he always said, 'I don't mind coming to church once in a while, 'cause it can't do no harm if it don't do no good.' And he would say that every time he was spoke to on religion, and you couldn't get no further with him. So when I thought of Joe I said to myself, 'It's no use to name him 'cause 'tain't likely Joe wants to be saved.'

"There was old Bill Whitman, a quarrelsome, mean sort o' chap. I knew he needed to be saved if anybody did. No one could remember ever seeing him to church. But when I thought of him I thought, 'Why, Bill Whitman! why, it's no use to think of him as being saved.' There was Charlie Sprague, bright, but wild and full of ridicule for religion, and how could I bring myself to think of him as a hopeful subject for our prayers that he might be saved? Then there was George Slocum, a respectable citizen, with his mind full of politics, but with no use for religion.

"And so I thought of Frank Skillings who was breaking his mother's heart by his love of drink, and of Aleck Danvers whose wife with tears had told me only the day before that he seemed to get farther and farther away till it almost seemed as if she must go with him and give up being a Christian, and of James Brown who was disgracing the church every day with his backsliding. And so on, pretty much all over town, I thought of men that needed to be saved, but I didn't have no faith about any of them.

"I knew the Parson was waiting to say, as soon as I named anybody, 'Deacon Hart, will you lead us in prayer for him?' and so, sort o' helpless like, I just said, 'There's men enough as needs to be saved, but I don't see no encouragement to pray for 'em.' Now I guess everybody there thought just the way I did, but, you see, nobody had ever said it out loud, and so when I said, 'I don't see no encouragement to pray for 'em,' everybody looked up quick, just as if their own consciences had spoke, and they was ashamed to be caught distrusting God's power to save.

"Widow Brown was the first to speak. ''Pears to me we've all been doubting the Lord, and that's why sinners ain't converted. We're just like the disciples when they asked the Lord, "Why couldn't we cast them out?" and the Lord told them, "Because of your little faith. This kind can come forth by nothing but by prayer." If we believed as much in the Lord's readiness and power to save old Bill Whitman or Charlie Sprague, as we believe in his power to save us, religion would mean a good deal more in this town than it does now. And I believe,' she continued, with her eyes full of tears, 'that the Lord is right here in this meeting tonight to rebuke us, same as he did the disciples, when he said, "O ye of little faith."'

"Then John Coburn got up, and everybody was surprised as they saw him through their tears, 'cause he never somehow had anything to say in meetings 'cept to pray, and he said, ''Tain't no use for us to be awkward in religion 'cause the disciples were. They was all helpless and discouraged like same as we, and they made an awful poor showing of religion 'fore them Pharisees and that poor, unbelieving father who wanted his boy cured. But when they see Jesus was among them then they knew it was all right, as it will be here in Sardis when we make our religion a real thing among scoffers and unbelievers. Don't you remember the Lord turned his sad face to those faithless disciples and told them, "Bring that poor boy hither to me?"

"'And don't we all know that that's what we've got to do here in Sardis—bring Bill Whitman, and Charlie Sprague, and all the rest of 'em, to the Lord in prayer, with the same faith that the disciples had when they brought that boy to be cured? They knew the Lord could cure him, and I believe the Lord can save Bill Whitman, and wants to, too.'

"'Yes, and my boy Charlie,' sobbed Mother Sprague. 'And my husband,' said another. 'And mine,' 'and mine,' said several women with eager, trembling voices.

"Well, there the Lord was in that meeting. Our hearts all sort o' melted in common sympathy, and we all see each other heart to heart, and the Lord helped us mightily to pray, and when the Parson raised his hands for the benediction, and in broken voice asked that the Lord would go with us as he sent us out into the world, we somehow all felt as the Lord had come to Sardis, and souls was going to be saved.

"We didn't have no methods to speak of, but every one of us went first to God in prayer, and then from prayer to men and women about us, and it wan't long 'fore we began to rejoice in the most remarkable conversions. Old Bill Whitman come into the meeting one night and said as how he had always hated religion and Christians. No man had ever seemed to care for his soul, and he'd made up his mind that he was going to die game, and never let anybody know that he ever thought about God and the hereafter and his own wickedness. 'But blessed be the Lord,' he said, 'there was an angel from heaven come to me one day when I was sawin' wood, and talked with me so tender like, and come again, and again, and prayed with me, and here I am, old Bill Whitman, saved by the grace of God! And the angel that the Lord sent was that woman over there in the corner, God bless her!'

"I can't tell you about the rest, 'cause there ain't time. We had a great refreshing, and there wasn't a home in Sardis that didn't have reason to praise God and rejoice with the angels in heaven over a sinner repenting and turning unto God. It does seem as if the Lord had come to Sardis to stay, blessed be his name forever."

There was not a dry eye as that group of honest men looked into the Deacon's glowing face and grasped him by the hand.

"Why can't we have just such a blessed revival over in our town?" said one. "And in our town, too," said another. "Yes, and in ours," said a third.

And as they passed into the church, for the afternoon session of prayer was just beginning, I said to myself: "Yes, sure enough, why can't we have just such a revival in Princeton or in Holden or in Boylston?"

And I found myself saying in answer: "We can if we will. The Lord wants it. Our neighbors need it. It will come if we do what we ought to do, tenderly, persistently, believingly pray and labor, man with man, heart to heart, as guided and counseled by the Holy Spirit of God."

ANOTHER TRIBUTE TO DR. QUINT.

Among all the published expressions of affection regarding the late Dr. Quint there has been too little said in reference to his career as chaplain during the War. We are glad, therefore, to make room for this tribute from a well-known Boston lawyer who belonged to the Second Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, being one of the few survivors of those who joined it at Brook Farm, May, 1861, and who were constantly with it until its muster out in July, 1865.

Few military organizations have been blessed as that regiment was in the character and ability of its original officers. High in the list of brave, able and patriotic officers stood our chaplain, Dr. Quint. Probably more than half of the regiment had been born and bred in Puritan orthodoxy; the minority was heterogeneous, but whatever the prejudices or faith of the members of that regiment may have been they were not offended by too much, if any, theology, strictly speaking, from the chaplain. Humanity was his military theology, and he was the friend of all. He demanded no creed save that of manhood and soldierly bearing from any. In camp he was ever watchful of the sanitary condition and of the afflicted in tent and hospital, and on the field he often aided at the post of danger in the care of the wounded.

It was remarked that no regiment had its mail matter cared for as the Second did, although that might have been said of it in other particulars. Chaplain Quint was entitled to the credit of this. It was left to his management, and I remember that, in order to show his faith in the men, he used to leave the stamps and change upon his camp chest when he was away from his tent so that the soldiers might find stamps and make their own change in paying for them. Once this confidence was violated, and then the militant qualities of our chaplain were paramount until the offender was punished.

He taught the soldiers that, while between them and their officers there was a necessary barrier forbidding familiarity, he was always approachable, and that he wished to see them when in trouble, or when any advice was required or consolation desired.

In a word, he impressed all, of whatever nationality or religion, as being, above all, a man, a Christian man in its broadest sense. If any one should care to go back to the files of The Congregationalist of those years, he will find some of the best letters that were written from the field from the hand of Dr. Quint.

I am very sure that most of those who were promoted later from the ranks to positions of greater or less importance, while always finding ourselves imbued with the sense and spirit of the stern discipline which we ourselves had undergone, in the enforcement of it found ourselves more or less unconsciously leavened and chastened by the influence and teachings of our chaplain.

It was my own fortune to enter Dartmouth College soon after returning from the field, where I found the name and influence of Dr. Quint—a graduate there and one of its trustees—as strong and healthy as it had been in the field. It became at once with me a bond of love and confidence which has never been broken, and thus I may say that from May, 1861, when as a boy I entered the Second Regiment, until now that name and manly influence have in a sense always been with me as a benediction, and so I believe say all of us who knew him so well.

Supreme Problems and Their Christian Solution.*

By Prof. W. Douglas Mackenzie.

"Beloved, now are we children of God, and it is not yet made manifest what we shall be. We know that, if he shall be manifested, we shall be like him; for we shall see him even as he is. And every one that hath this hope set on him purifieth himself, even as he is pure."—I John 3: 2, 3.

There are three great questions which human nature has, from the earliest times, asked concerning itself. The histories of all philosophies and all religions are the records of the various answers which have been attempted by the various generations and races of men. These three fundamental questions are, "Whence am I? Whither am I going? What ought I to do?" They are not the questions which you will hear business men discussing in the mart, nor will you hear them often repeated from mouth to mouth in the easy chat of the home. They are not questions which casual conversation in the cars deals with. But every man knows that they underlie all man's life, and that when the great testing hour comes and man stands face to face with the fundamental realities of his experience these are the questions which come up from his heart like the cries of a wronged spirit. When the mother bends over the child snatched by death from her, when the man of affairs is bowed over his desk under the blow of a terrible misfortune, when the youth finds himself fronting the problem of his career, these questions become at once the matters of supreme interest for all right-minded and serious souls. "Whence am I? Whither am I going? What ought I to do?"

These questions are not entirely independent of one another. The first is, of course, the starting point. Men feel that if and when they find an answer to that the answers to the others will almost inevitably follow. If, they say to themselves, we can only discover what that power is from which we have come and on which we depend, if only we can come to know its nature and its character, we shall begin to see light shining upon our future and upon the path of duty. All depends upon that. If from darkness we come, unto darkness we return; if from light and beauty we derive our being, surely light and beauty must characterize our destiny.

Further, they feel that if they know the character of that power by which they live and anything of that end towards which they travel, they will begin to understand what they ought to do. It is true there are, in our day, some people calling themselves secularists, who strive to concentrate attention upon this seculum or age. "Leave," they say, "these impossible questions concerning origins and destinies, and give your whole mind to present duty. Look around you upon the immediate tasks of life. Live for them. All else is but abstraction. Here in concrete duties you have the meaning of life, and in their fulfillment its joy." But human nature as a whole rises superior to this naïve suggestion. Human nature knows that its kind of life will be entirely different, according as it finds or finds not the answer to those two first questions. It knows that these will make the greatest conceivable difference to character and to conduct. Duty itself cannot mean the same for a being who has reached the true answer to each of the first questions as it will mean to a being who refuses even to ask them. And human nature refuses to ignore the enormous difference of experience involved in that alternative. Hence, in our day, we find a secularist unable to win the ordinary man to his specious method of dealing with these great questions.

On the other hand, the Christian Church owes its unparalleled influence over men to the fact that it is able to give clear and unmistakable satisfaction to human nature in presence of these problems. Indeed, if the church has not answered these questions, then we must look and yearn for some fresh revelation. God has not yet bestowed his greatest boon, God has not yet met our deepest needs, unless his latest gift is the solution of these oldest problems of intelligent human beings. Hence it is of great importance that on an occasion like this the Church of Christ represented here should afresh ask itself what it stands for and how it can present before the world those answers which the world has ever longed for to these three great questions. Let us at this time take each of them in turn and ask ourselves, What is the characteristic Christian solution of these problems? I select this passage, because here, from the rich thought and heart of the apostle John, we have the statement of that which from the beginning the Christian Church has been able to say about these matters.

I. WHENCE AM I?

The first question of human nature is, Whence am I? Would that I could sketch to you something of the answers given by the religions and the philosophies of antiquity. Would that by illustration I could describe to you the dimness of vision which they had, the waywardness of the mind of man as reflected in them, the disappointing answers that come from some and the answers more bright and hopeful that shine out from the thought and faith of others, but all dim and all uncertain. Time allows me only to concentrate attention over against the waywardness, the dimness and the disappointment of these others upon the clearness, the warmth and the finality of the Christian answer. The new spirit is expressed in that very word "beloved." For the Christian Church has not reached its answer through the cold speculations of the schools; it has attained this consciousness in the actual events of life; its answer is warm with the blood of living experience. Hence, speaking out of this region, the answer begins with the word "beloved." The apostle opens his arms and takes men to his heart when he answers their question, Whence am I? In the region of life and love, of actual experience, the solution has been found. Men discovered who they were in an act of God, not in an effort of their own minds. "Beloved," he says, "now are we children of God." In our day the Church of Christ is trying hard to learn the significance of that word "beloved," and why it is necessary when the gospel of salvation is preached to do so in an atmosphere of love. When the world hears the church saying to all its own, "beloved," it will begin to understand better what is meant by "children of God."

"Now are we children of God." This is the answer of experience. Sublime it is, but no soaring wing of any thinker ever reached that high mountain top from which this vision is made possible. It was first an event in the lives of individual men—an event marked by the use of that word "now." "Now are we"—a time came when our eyes were opened, when something occurred, when something was done which so changed our whole life and relations that we woke up henceforth to say, "now are we children of God."

The apostle John never could think of that divine act in his own life apart from the memory of one Person whom he had loved, and loved now with an eternal love. His mind went back across many years to the time which he spent in Galilee and Judæa walking with Jesus of Nazareth. The fourth gospel, which is most certainly the outcome of John's experience, whether in its present form it be the actual work of his pen or not, unfolds to us the steps by which John reached that experience out of which he was able to say, "Now are we children of God." He remembers how they lived with Jesus, how they saw him with their eyes and scrutinized him closely and handled him with their hands as his ministry went on, how their very wonder made their scrutiny more keen, how the gradual dawning of new and wondrous spiritual facts upon their minds startled them to use tests concerning him which they did not use concerning others. He remembers how the inner life and character of Jesus became unfolded until it shone as a very glory, "And we beheld his glory, glory as One only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth." He remembers how, when they watched him and discussed with one another who he was and what these scenes meant, they gradually reached the conviction, spoken first in awed whispers to one another out of hearts half afraid to use the word, and how at last, emboldened by faith itself, they said, He is the Christ, the Son of the living God.

Then there came a still more wonderful experience; for as they lived with Jesus, trembling at the conviction that he could wear no other name than that, there gradually dawned upon them this fact, namely, that as they lived with him, believed in him, walked with him, saw and inwardly responded to the image of the Father which he kept before their eyes, they too had the rights of children of God; for this gospel tells us, As many as received him to them he gave the right to become children of God. Then there came the catastrophe of the crucifixion, when all their hopes seemed swept into confusion, when their profoundest faith in Jesus was completely overthrown, when for those long hours between the burial and the resurrection morning they sat together and looked into that which seemed the awful error and crime of their lives—that they should have believed him to be the Son of God and themselves sons of God.

Then came the resurrection morning, when once more, and more gloriously than ever, the same Jesus stood revealed beyond all doubt and cavil as the very Son of the Eternal, and when his very smile woke up in their hearts again the conviction, henceforth undying, that, through him, "Now are we children of God." John has lived many years since that. He is writing to men most of whom were never near Jerusalem, but his whole experience in the long interval has served as a continual revelation of the new power resident in this faith in the living Christ. In Ephesus, as in Jerusalem, amongst the outcasts of heathen cities as well as amongst the quiet and orderly peasants of Galilee, the vision of Jesus awakens in men's hearts this faith, this experience, the conviction of this act of God which constitutes them his children. It is with the fullest confidence that John opens his heart to his friends of many tribes and nations, sure that their experience corresponds to his assertion when he says, Beloved, now are we children of God.

II. WHITHER ARE WE GOING?

The apostles were not unconscious of the apparent contrast between the sublime claims of their Christian faith and the outward condition of their earthly lot. It might well be said, How can men like these claim to be children of God? No more august relationship could exist. No title more glorious could be claimed by any philosopher, any poet, however daring the flight of his imagination. This is the highest destiny which a human soul dreamed of, to be the child of God. How can men like these Jews from poverty-stricken Palestine or dull peasants from Phrygia or low-born slaves in Corinth and Ephesus or the moral outcasts, the human refuse, of these cities, how can such with any realization of their words say to each other, "Now are we children of God?" With a smile the great apostle bows before the fact: "It is not yet manifest what we shall be," he says. The contrast between divine sonship and this hard human lot, these broken hearts, these often fallen and sinful lives, can never be resolved by looking at them simply as they are. The contradiction is undeniable, but (and here is the glory and joy of the apostolic experience and the experience of the whole living church) a day comes when the contradiction shall cease.

*A sermon preached at the installation of Rev. D. N. Beach over the Plymouth Church, Minneapolis.

"When he shall be manifested"—who is the one to whom in this verse, and in the verses around it, he refers merely by the pronouns "he" and "him"? He gives no name. He deems it sufficient for his readers that he should just speak of this person as "he" and "him," for there are conditions of mutual sympathy amongst men when the indefinite thrills with definiteness. You are all more or less familiar, my friends, with a habit of speech that obtains amongst the humbler ranks of life both in Germany and in Britain and also, I understand, in this country. You know that plain folk commonly speak of their husbands and wives as "he" or "she." You go into the home of some man bereaved and desolate, you hear him speak of one who had been the angel of his house; he describes to you something of her ways, her opinions, her reputation amongst the neighbors, what she did for himself, how she died, and he never once names her. "When she was with me," is all that he can say. And you may go forth from that quiet and sad home, knowing a great deal about the woman who had been its life, but not having heard her name. Or, as you go out and along the village street, you may see a group of women in easy, familiar gossip. Passing you hear one say, "when he came home last night," and neither you nor any one else would dream of asking who "he" is. All the women know that that woman can only speak of one human being with the indefiniteness which is so clear. This conversational habit arises from the beautiful, glorious exclusiveness of that wondrous relationship where one belongs to another completely and for life, where love includes so much of each that it excludes from its peculiar sanctity all others.

So did John speak of Jesus Christ and so did his churches understand him. "When he shall be manifested!" The apostle John does not think of Jesus as removed to some distant sphere, as dwelling on some throne in a far-off region of the universe. He has never, since those days when he saw the risen Lord appear and disappear, been able to think of him as other than close to every heart that loves him. It only needs the moving of the veil, an apocalypse, and these eyes shall see him. His face gazes into mine. He watches my looks, hears my words, sees me and the depths of my heart. I look up and see him not now. But when the hand of God shall touch the veil of sense then my eyes shall see him as he is.

"And when he shall be manifested, we shall see him." This is the goal of human history. Thither, towards the judgment seat of Christ, all races and generations are moving. We feel that if the race is one its great hour of destiny must be one, the great standard of its judgment must be one.

The race is not a unity, history is not history, if the various parts of mankind are moving forwards to diverse consummations, to be tested by diverse standards, to be allotted to altogether diverse destinies on grounds which are not solely moral and religious. The unity of history lies in its end, in the outcome of it all, in that final revelation of its meaning which shall make plain that man is one. Therefore the Christian moves forward with the confidence and the joy of one who knows what the result will be. He fears naught, for in the day when he sees "that One" he shall be like him. He can turn around upon all inquirers, he can turn around upon his own heart when it asks, "Whither am I going?" He can point to that throne of Christ, to that unveiled face of the Saviour judge, saying: "Thither to the hour of that vision am I going. There my own life shall reach its consummation. I shall know then for what I was intended, and in the experience of that hour I shall read the meaning and see the justification of all the way by which I have been led"

III. WHAT OUGHT I TO DO?

If, now, the Christian man knows whence he is and whither he is going, it cannot be difficult for him to decide what the supreme task of his life is. Here again what we desire is some one ideal of duty that shall give unity and consistency to the whole life. We do not desire merely one more department added to the already numerous and harassing departments of life. We do not merely desire one more "ought" added to the innumerable duties which already make our hearts so weary. We long for some one view of duty which shall give its own meaning to all else, which shall make them lighter to bear and us more blessed in the bearing of them. The apostle John gives in this passage one glorious description of this sense of obligation which guides the Christian life. "Every one," he says, "that hath this hope set on him purifieth himself, even as he is pure." "Hope" he speaks of, assuming that it is not a mere sentiment, but a living force. The man who hopes to see Christ and to be like him, the man in whose heart that hope has become supreme, who believes that to be the greatest destiny to which he can look forward, who believes that to be the destiny to which God has appointed him, will be controlled, mastered, inspired by that hope. He that hath this hope set on Christ will never be mistaken by the world for a man of the world. His hope will mark him out; his smile, his words, his acts, in their strength and tenderness, in their purity and humility, will show that the quality of his life is determined by that hope which alone gives Christlikeness to a human character.

"Purifieth himself even as he is pure." Here is the hard task. There is always a point at which duty becomes a yoke, until the day of perfectness dawns. For mortals incomplete in faith and love and self-sacrifice, obedience to spiritual law must always be something of a burden. To get rid of sin, which is the negative side of purifying one's self, always costs much. No man can cut off from himself sins that he loved without feeling that something in him bleeds. But this work must be done if we are to be like him and see him as he is. This is what "I ought to do."

This is the work of the church. The world always either scorns or hates the church. The world scorns the church when the church refuses to purify itself. The world hates the church when the church begins to purify itself. Therefore the church must cease to consider the world, except in so far as the world may, perchance, be purified by its life and cease to be the world. The church can only conquer the world when it has learned, with its eyes upon that throne, to be fully busied and absolutely faithful in purifying itself. But when, mastered and inspired by its wondrous heaven-born hope, the church awakes to the law imposed upon it and purifies itself, then will its work indeed be other than too often it has been, than too often it is today. The world may not understand it, may hate it, but it will not be able to deny its claim to be led and ruled, as well as saved, by Jesus Christ.

Life becomes graver, though not less happy; and the gravity of what lies before us does not allow us to drift any more like an oarless boat upon mid-ocean.—Stopford A. Brooke.

MATTERS OF NOTE HERE IN BOSTON.

Mr. Moody has entered upon the second month of his Boston work, and intends to conduct his campaign on substantially the same lines as those which he has been pursuing. He is still directing his efforts mainly to arousing Christians and during the coming week he will be re-enforced in this undertaking by Rev. F. B. Meyer of London, who is expected to speak at Tremont Temple twice on Friday and Saturday and once there on Sunday and once at Clarendon Street Baptist Church. There is no falling off in the audiences or in their responsiveness.

The subject on Monday and Tuesday of this week was the Second Coming. Upon the conclusion of his services in this city Mr. Moody will go to Cincinnati. He continues to spend his Sundays in New York.

Sam Jones's campaign closed last Sunday, his audience at the People's Temple eclipsing in size even the great ones which his oratory and peculiar methods have been drawing through the month of January. After lecturing last Monday evening to persons who paid fifty cents apiece to hear his final words, he started for the South, leaving behind a warm word for Boston's system of charitable institutions, which he seems to have investigated with considerable care.

Mr. Murphy is resuming, this week, noonday meetings in Faneuil Hall in addition to the evening gatherings at Berkeley Temple. The tide is rising all the while, great audiences being the rule and many persons signing the pledge every night. He estimates that during the last four weeks not less than 7,000 persons have thus declared themselves.

The Episcopal Church Army, headed by that veteran rescue mission worker, Colonel Hadley of New York, has opened a campaign, and, while some sharp criticism was forthcoming when the subject was discussed by the Episcopal Club last week, the organization seems to be commending itself to prominent rectors like Dr. Edward Abbott and to persons of social and educational prominence like the group which gathered at the Colonial Club in Cambridge last Sunday afternoon to learn from Mr. Hadley what the army proposes to do. Prominent Episcopal churches hereabouts are open to it, from which centers of operation it will work for the present.

A new line of criticism of current evangelistic movements was entered upon last Sunday by Rev. J. M. Foster of the Second Reformed Presbyterian Church. He is grieved because evangelistic work "defers the day of triumph that will come in the exclusive use of the Psalms of God." Apparently Gospel Hymns are not agreeable to a denomination which stands for the principle of Psalm singing and Psalm singing only in the Church of God. Mr. Foster also made a thrust at Mr. Moody because he preaches in Tremont Temple, since Dr. Lorimer, the pastor, Mr. Foster affirms, is a Thirty-third Degree Mason and a Knight Templar besides.

There were a few persons last Sunday who put the day of rest and worship to no better use than to assemble in Paine Hall and celebrate the 150th anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine. There was the customary talk about the decay of evangelical religion and the wretchedness of any such superstition as it represents. One speaker, however, was frank enough to say that free thinking in Boston was sadly in need of a revival. "We are not doing anything in a constructive way." That was the most solemn truth uttered either morning or afternoon, with the possible exception of the following, which was not on the program. A richly-dressed woman in the audience, who had listened to half a dozen speeches of the type referred to rose and said, "Mr. President, when I give up my religion and my children it will be for something very much better than you have offered today." We judge from published reports that her words threw a sudden coldness over the meeting.

The Home

THE WORLD.

The world is good in its own poor way,
There is rest by night and high spirits by day,
Yet the world is not happy as the world might be—
Why is it? Why is it? O, answer me.

The cross shines fair and the church bells ring,
And the earth is peopled with holy things;
Yet the world is not happy as the world might be—
Why is it? Why is it? O, answer me.

What lackest thou, world? For God made thee of old.
Why, thy faith hath gone out and thy love grown cold;
Thou are not happy as thou mightest be
For the want of Christ's simplicity.

It is love that thou lackest, thou poor old world.
Who shall make thy love hot for thee, frozen old world?
Thou art not happy as thou mightest be,
For the love of dear Jesus is little in thee.

Poor world, if thou cravest a better day,
Remember that Jesus must have his own way;
I know thou art not as thou mightest be,
But the love of God would do all for thee.

GOING TO CHURCH.

BY KATE UPSON CLARK.

It is, perhaps, a healthful rebound from rigid Puritan methods which has determined certain of our more progressive orthodox church members to attack "formalism." "We are not saved by going through certain ceremonies," these conscientious critics are in the habit of remarking haughtily. Our religion is not merely . . . to go

To church one day in seven.

If we are to base our religion upon attending stated forms of worship we might as well turn Roman Catholics or High Churchmen at once. The true evangelical doctrine is that out of the heart are the issues of life, not out of obedience to empty forms."

There is something rather captivating to superficial thinkers in this species of argument. One of that class, though she happens to be a graduate of a leading college and the writer of several books, remarked seriously one day: "I found that I was getting into a mere rut of going to church, that I was going from habit, without giving the subject of whether I should go or not any proper thought. Of course I stopped it at once. I shall not go again until the fresh, spontaneous impulse comes to me to go. Otherwise I cannot believe that I shall be benefited by what has come to be a mere mechanical observance."

This casuistry struck the listeners dumb, but there are a number of cardinal truths which ought to have been at once launched at the speaker and which would have punctured her wind-bags of logic. She should have remembered that the human being of the highest order is the one governed most absolutely by lofty, fixed principles. An old definition of a principle, given by Mr. J. W. Dickinson, one of the profoundest of instructors, was, "The way in which anything acts." Men of character act in a certain way, which can be calculated upon by those who know them. They are not standing and watching themselves for "fresh, spontaneous impulses." They, like all who have arrived at an age of discretion, have come to certain definite conclusions in regard to the conduct of their lives, and they are plodding along in the path of duty, necessarily a strait and monotonous one, considering themselves fortunate if they have established a habit of doing the right thing at the right time, even if the process partake somewhat of the nature of routine. They do not wait to see whether at any particular time they feel like doing right. They know they ought to do right and it is their set purpose, not requiring twenty different decisions each day, to do right. They rejoice, instead of being shocked, if they find that duty is gaining, and that, even though the "fresh, spontaneous impulse" may be lacking, their feet turn of their own accord in the proper direction. They go to their daily business, whether they have any special desire to do so or not. If they have taken the vows of God upon them they seek his house at the set time, in rain or shine, and without waiting for the craving of the natural heart, which in all of us fallible mortals is usually found to hanker after what it ought not to have rather than for immortal blessings. Duty is not generally what the children call "clear fun," but the conscientious man and woman perform it just the same, without waiting to feel happy in the prospect. They do not examine their own hearts with a microscope from time to time to see whether those organs are burning with a desire to do right, and resolved not to do right unless they are. All this silly subjective sophistry about "fresh spontaneous impulses" sinks into insignificance under the pure, shining light of conscience.

The matter of attending church regularly has suffered more than perhaps any other Christian function from the faulty syllogisms of the would-be "disciples of true culture." It is easy to call church-going "formalism," and to deceive one's self with flimsy excuses. One man imagines that he finds in the woods better facilities for worship than in the stuffy atmosphere of his church. Another pleads that his duty to his family demands that after the exacting work of the week he should sleep the larger part of Sunday, and keep perfectly quiet during the rest of the time. He therefore finds lounging at home far more restful than sitting up straight in his pew at church. Another is fond of reading and considers that he gets more good from perusing standard books at home—he never reads anything but the best literature, he observes virtuously—than from listening to the ordinary Sunday sermon. There is no use in rehearsing the pretexts used by non-church-goers to defend their practices. We all know that they may be plausible and even strictly true, and yet that the duty of church-going outweighs them all.

In the first place, do we want the churches kept up? Do we want them to be strong and healthy, or sickly and weak? We either want them to live, or we do not. If we do not, it is our business to separate ourselves from them at once, and to go to work for whatever other agency seems more likely, in our judgment, to elevate the race; for every decent man and woman desires above all else the regeneration and purification of humanity—in other words, the progress of civilization. Those who do not are anarchists and knaves. If we do long for the prosperity of the churches, it is the hight of meanness for us to lay the burden of their support upon others.

"But," you say, "I pay my proportion of the minister's salary. I don't shirk that part of the business."

This may be true, but as in charitable work, the money is the smaller half of the duty. The really effective support of the church comes from the personal presence of its members at its meetings. Nothing else can make up for the absence of that. Well-filled pews, crowded prayer-meetings, steady, unfaltering devotion to the services of the church—in these lies its prosperity, and nowhere else.

It may be physically impossible that you should attend every service of your church. In that case, select certain ones which are within your reach, and let only an extraordinary obstacle keep you from them. Don't wait for a "fresh, spontaneous impulse" to make you go, any more than you would wait for a fresh, spontaneous impulse to weed your garden when you know that it ought to be done.

If professing Christians would only take this view of the matter, attending with their families from principle, and with perfect regularity, as many services of the church as possible, there would be few vacant pews. It is the vacant pews of church members which rob the pastor of his courage and eat away the life of the church. Well-filled pews assure him of success even before he lifts his hand. They mean success in the auxiliary meetings. They mean success all along the line. We must have nothing to do with the shallow excuses which would not be tolerated if applied to any other matter of principle. And as for the cry of "formalism," it must be remembered that more or less of that maligned article is necessary to the conduct of life. Success without a certain amount of routine was never heard of. Most of all it is worth remembering, though the quaint remark has been often quoted before, that, as a good old deacon once said, "We go to church not to be edified, but to worship God."

WEARIED HOSPITALITY.

BY AGNES B. ORMSBEE.

"O, dear!" exclaimed a young matron "I went to the Jones's to dinner last night to meet Miss Smith-Scott, who is going to vouch for me at the Liberal Culture Club and we had a dinner of eight courses. I was very nice, and the dishes were just a dainty and toothsome as could be, and the table looked beautifully. Mrs. Jones has such lovely china and silver. I suppose perhaps it was a simple company dinner to her, but really it just about spoiled my evening, for I don't see how I ever can return the attention. Yet Mrs. Jones and I were intimate friends in college, and I am much attached to both herself and her husband." Here the speaker paused for breath, and then continued: "I have had so little experience in housekeeping—you know I taught for five years after I left college—and I really do not know how to manage anything so elaborate, though I flatter myself that I know how to keep a comfortable, orderly home in accordance with our means. But even if I was experienced enough to prepare such a dinner and direct my servants, I have not the extensive array of table service which it would require. Yet I do want to entertain my friends and like to have visitors."

This is not a fancy sketch, but a true tale, with its genuine protest from a sensible, cultivated woman, who found herself placed, as many of us are, with friends whose style of living was more lavish than her own. It is such circumstances as this which frequently weary the spirit of hospitality and discourage many warm-hearted home-makers. It is doubtful if it was a simple dinner to the Mrs. Jones of our story. Even though she had an abundance of table service, it probably cost her much study and labor, for only a few homes of even well-to-do people are so luxuriously appointed that the mistress is freed from any work with her own hands. But all the work and worry which such a dinner entails Mrs. Jones gladly laid as a due sacrifice on the altar of hospitality, and felt happy that she had spared no pains to give her guests of her best.

But it is just here that a delicate point of hospitality comes in. Does it demand so severe a sacrifice? Hospitality means a welcome to our home, be it for long or short a time, and in welcoming our friends we virtually say we are glad they are come hither and will seek to make them happy. But if in entertaining them we make the contrast so vivid, so unflattering between our friends' home life and ours we do not make them happy. They are made discouraged, uncomfortable or even a little envious as the different dispositions may be. Of course it is not possible to bring our surroundings entirely down to the level of friends less blessed with worldly goods than we, but in offering them a welcome we can curtail a little of our splendor and soften the inevitable contrast, for true hospitality does not forget consideration for the guest. If your guests are women who do their own housework, as many refined women are obliged to, do not give a luncheon with the most elaborate dishes to show off your new cook's skill. If you are entertaining a family dinner party, do not forget that your guest's one maid-of-all-work is a sharp contrast in efficiency to your well-trained cook and waitress with a capable nurse beside to relieve you of anxious thoughts concerning the dear inmates of the nursery.

"I am going to reform this winter," said a spirited woman to a group of friends. "I wore myself out last winter trying to entertain my friends in the proper style. My cook and nurse have their hands full, and it makes me blush to think how I crowded them last year, hurrying them through this and that to get up as fine dinners and lunches as I could devise. I never should have lost my excellent Bridget if I had not been so foolish. But I learned my lesson. After she left I had to take hold and help my new cook out, and many is the night that I have sat at the head of the table trembling with fatigue. Now I am going to give my friends such entertainment as I can without wearing myself out and causing my servants to go on a strike."

"Are you really going to invite any one to truly simple dinners? Have you the courage to ask, well, the Lowells, for instance, to one of your meals with a soup, a roast and vegetables and a dessert?" queried a doubting voice.

"Indeed I am," replied the first speaker, energetically. "John Lowell has been in to our informal Sunday night suppers many times, and I noticed that after the first time he did not need a bit of urging to stay. Yes, I am going to ask my friends whenever I wish to see them, and then I shall give them nicely cooked and well-served food, such as I intend to have daily for ourselves. I am to wear my most becoming gown and be so rested that I can be agreeable without effort. These are the dinners and luncheons that I shall invite my friends to, and I shall make them happy. Then if there is any special or distinguished guest that we wish to honor, why, I shall have managed so well that I can send for the caterer with a clear conscience."

NOTES.

For the first time in its history Massachusetts reports a smaller proportion of deaths from consumption among women than among men. Dr. S. W. Abbott, secretary of the State Board of Health, attributes this favorable showing to the use of the bicycle.

An effort is being made in New York city to secure a curfew law, which provides that all children under sixteen years old shall be indoors by eight o'clock in winter and nine in summer. Such an ordinance has been in operation in one or more Western cities for some months and already the beneficial results are apparent.

The London Chef insists that only a few people know how to eat properly, and mentions Thomas Carlyle as one who ruined his stomach by gulping down his food in great gulps. If this be so, then we have the secret of his dyspepsia. Had he followed Gladstone's habit of giving every mouthful thirty-two bites before swallowing it, he might have been a gentleman instead of a crabbed and sour creature.

The power of a mother's influence is illustrated in these remarks, overheard recently: A bright boy of twelve years was talking with some ladies about his mother. Said he, "I don't think my father made any mistake when he picked out his wife." In another home three grown sons still remain with their parents. The older, now thirty-one, when joked about his single blessedness, says, "I've never yet seen any one I like as well as my mother. When I do I shall marry."

Why do women suffer more from headache than men? No doubt there are various causes, but one reason, suggested by the Herald of Health, is that women usually spend more time within doors and in an air less pure. On this account too little oxygen is taken into the system to properly oxidize the food eaten, and this generates a poison which acts upon the nerve centers. The first thing to be done is to get rid of this poison by drinking copiously of hot water and by inhaling long draughts of pure air. Medicine may give temporary relief but does not remove the cause.

Is woman growing physically weaker? This question, propounded recently by the Boston Globe, is answered by several eminent physicians and educators of both sexes, and the consensus of opinion is decidedly against the notion that woman is deteriorating physically. A more rational dress, bicycling and out-of-door life generally, in addition to more hygienic food, are the main reasons for this judgment. Dr. Baker-Flint says: "Outside of the so-called society woman, women are physically much stronger under modern civilization. I find no such wrecks among any classes of women as among those who are slaves to fashion, society and fads."

But while admitting that the tendency is toward improvement in the physical development of women, Dr. A. H. Tuttle affirms that we have not so many good mothers now as formerly. "With advance in civilization there is an advance in crime. Child-bearing is incompatible with comfort in a small flat or a boarding house, and therefore the abortionist does a fine business in spite of the law. . . . Meddlesome midwifery causes many troubles for the modern woman, but the patient has the advantage that she can be usually completely repaired by modern surgical science." If this statement be true, it would be well for the forthcoming Congress of Mothers, to be held in Washington this month, to discuss a condition the gravity of which can hardly be overestimated.

Closet and Altar

No man need be without comfort while the gates of prayer are open to him.

God within us! Not only ever with us unseen, not only watching us in our secret moments and reading the very thoughts of our hearts, not only covering us with the shadow of his wings and lighting us with the light of his countenance, but within us—our bodies his temples, our hearts his home. O, if we could but grasp the thought we should live lives nobler and more beautiful!—F. W. Farrar.

As you tarry before God let it be in a deep, quiet faith in him, the Invisible One, who is so near, so holy, so mighty, so loving. In a deep, restful faith, too, that all the blessings and powers of the heavenly life are around you and in you. Just yield yourself in the faith of a perfect trust to the ever-blessed Holy Trinity to work out all God's purpose in you. Begin each day thus in fellowship with God, and God will be all in all to you.—Andrew Murray.

To rest from weary work one day in seven;
One day to turn our backs upon the world,
Its soil wash from us, and strive on to heaven,
Whereto we daily climb, but quick are hurled
Down to the deep of human pride and sin,
Help me, ye powers celestial, to come nigh;
Ah, let me catch one little glimpse within
The heavenly city, lest my spirit die.
—R. W. Gilder.

Make time for serious thoughts. Let no day pass without some memory of solemn things. Each morning as you rise remind yourselves that "God spake these words and said." Each evening as you lie down to rest let God's angels close the door of your heart on thoughts of purity and peace. The soul that has never lived face to face with eternity is a vulgar soul. The life that has never learnt the high law of holiness is a ruined and a wasted life.—F. W. Farrar.

The cry of life can be satisfied by a Life alone. In the religion of Christ, and there only, are met all those demands to which thought severed from Christ is driven—for an Object of Worship which shall transcend knowledge, for an Ideal thoroughly subject to knowledge, for a living Power so working in the soul with secret might that this Ideal may inspire us, not with despair, but with courage. Thus is force revealed as loving, humanity as holy and the moral law as divine. This is the assurance, wondrous, yet by the very witness of denial less wondrous than essential, brought to the world by Jesus Christ.—Vida D. Scudder.

Our Heavenly Father, before entering upon the duties of the day we would look into thy face and feel again our hand in thine. Help us to detect thy presence in every incident of this day. Give us grace according to our need. Thou hast made us and knowest what we can bear. There is no temptation thou hast not measured. There is no trial the heat of which thou hast not tested before permitting us to enter. The heavy part of our cross is on thy shoulders. Nor is there any joy or pleasure which is not sweeter because thou hast chosen it. So whatever experience is before us let it link us closer to thee. Thus may we grow into thy image day by day, O blessed Saviour. Amen.

Mothers in Council.

CHILDREN PRAYING FOR PARENTS.

Dr. Joseph Parker of London asks why children should not sometimes go by themselves to pray for their fathers and mothers, and offers this simple form of prayer to be thus used. He had in mind those whose ages range from five to fourteen and suggests that it be read as often as once a week by one of the children, when gathered in a room by themselves. Surely nothing would touch parents more than a consciousness that intercession is being made by childish lips in their behalf:

Dear Father in heaven, we ask thee to bless our father and mother, and to make them good, and strong, and wise, and happy. We thank God for our dear home, but our home would not be home if it were not for our father and mother. We want them to live a long, long time, and to be very joyful. Dear Saviour, help us children to be good, then father and mother will be happy. We want to love Jesus and to do what he tells us. When it is hard to do right we pray that Jesus will help us. We know he will because he said so. Bless father, bless mother, bless us all, and may we always live in a happy home. We say all this in the name of Jesus Christ, the Son of God. Amen.

"TELL US 'BOUT DE HOUSE."

It is only a seven by eleven unframed lithograph, cut from an old calendar and preserved for its simple beauty of design, and it hangs on the dining-room wall under another picture. It has not even a touch of color, usually attractive to a child, yet for ten months it was a daily source of pleasure to our three-year-old twin girlies. Nearly every night as soon as supper was over a little voice would say coaxingly, "Aunt Alice, tell us 'bout de house."

It began one night, when, to help fill in the restless hour between supper and bedtime, auntie talked to them about the picture, showing them its beauties and making the little farmhouse the home of imaginary people; for it is a bit of country landscape with a small house in the foreground and connected with the back of the house a long, low stable. There are also fields, trees, a short stretch of stone wall, a bit of rail fence and a small piece of winding road. Auntie did not tell all her story at once, but added a new bit occasionally. The twinnies listened delightedly and in a short time could tell about Johnnie, Bessie, their papa and mamma and answer any question about the imaginary family that was asked them. How most children do enjoy telling what they have learned! These small maids would point out the bars let down for Johnnie to drive the cows, Daisy and Buttercup, across the road to the pasture beyond for their day's feeding. They could tell some of the things Bessie, who was just their age, did while Johnnie was away at school. But the latter part of the day was their special delight, when Johnnie returned and drove home the cows, when the papa came home from his work and unharnessed and fed old Dobbin and milked Daisy and Buttercup while Johnnie fed the hens. Dorothy suggested once in a while, with a grewsome shrug of her little shoulders, that "praps" there were snakes under the barn, and Catherine thought there must be "wats," so we added a cat to the family.

Then the children would point out the very window of the room where Bessie was put to bed by her mamma, after her bread and milk supper and a few minutes' play with her dolly. They remembered, too, that Bessie was not afraid and did not have any light, only in the next room, which fact they gave with some hesitation, for they are both timid in the dark. They also pointed out the window of the upper room where Johnnie slept "all alone" (brave Johnnie). And they did not forget mamma's evening sewing and papa's newspaper, read aloud that mamma might share its contents. All this required use of the imagination, but was it not a right use?

Children are naturally imaginative, and suffer, we know not how much, through their misconceptions and their timidity. Why should not they be made happy also through that same power of imagination? These little ones understood that the picture and people were only make believe, although once, when auntie told them the front door was on the other side of the house, one of them turned the picture over, finding only plain cardboard. But this was easily explained.

Pictures generally have a charm for children, but a picture with a story in it, a pleasant child story that they can remember and repeat, has a wonderful interest, and many a helpful lesson that will always be remembered may be taught the little ones in this way.

Aunt Alice.

A LITTLE GIRL'S ROOM.

One of the sweetest memories to many a woman is of the room that was hers when a girl. Here was the one spot in the house that was hers to arrange as she pleased. It was the place that had shared all her joys and griefs. Here, by her own little bed, she poured out her sorrow over her broken doll, and in the same spot she hid her radiant face the night of her betrothal. How the books in the little book-case still appeal to her! Each one is a friend, which greets her with a smile whenever she enters the room. The pictured Madonna on the wall opposite her bed has looked calmly down at her as she opened her eyes each morning, until the peace and love there portrayed have in some measure entered her own soul.

It is the association, aside from the beauty or harmony of the room, that has made it a treasured memory to the woman, who has now become mistress of an entire house. The charm of a well-decorated and appropriately arranged room adds much, however, to the character as well as to the enjoyment of its owner. Especially is this true in the case of little children. They can, as a rule, be taught to love the beautiful wherever found, whether it be in a flower, in the clouds, in some thought, or in their own homes. Therefore make their rooms pretty. They need not be expensive, but let them exhibit a taste and love for the beautiful.

A gentleman and his wife, looking at a house with the view of making it their home, were much pleased to find a small room, just across the hall from their own sleeping-room, which seemed particularly adapted to three-year old "rosebud." The closet had low shelves and hooks that even the little hands could reach. How to make this room pretty for the little daughter then became the question. By doing all the work themselves, with some assistance from uncles and aunts, the parents succeeded in making one of the daintiest rooms I have ever seen. One roll of paper, with large, graceful sprays of pink chrysanthemums, was bought and put round the room as a deep border. Great care was taken to obtain a pattern with particularly graceful sprays, as some of them were to be cut out. This was slow work, but uncles and aunts all helped. Plain paper the same style and shade as the border served as a background, on which the sprays were laid and arranged. Some of the sprays were a yard or more in length, others were less than a foot long, while two single buds were used. They were all put on drooping down from the border, and care was taken to have them join some branch in the border and droop in the proper direction from that. Where there was a jog in the room, formed by the chimney, the spray was brought down from the center of the chimney round the corner and on to the side. A molding in imitation of old ivory made the room ready for the pictures. A chrome on silk, of pink roses, with white and silver frame, and a handsome etching were hung in the two largest spaces, one at the head and one at the side of the bed. On the chimney was a particularly pretty picture of a children's party, with a frame of the same molding as that used on the walls. A picture in colors of a little Chinese girl had a tiny gilt frame. These last two frames the father made. There was one other picture, which had its value in having once hung in "mamma's room."

The carpet was in soft shades, and was some that was left over from the parlor carpet. A narrow white and brass bedstead was the only furniture bought for the room. Turned over the spread on the bed was a sheet with open-work embroidery, that grandma had worked years before. Draped over the headboard was a pink scarf, which had been on mamma's tea-gown before baby fingers had spilled milk on it. The draping covered the spot, however. On the chimney was a small mantel, with a pink scarf caught up at each corner. A pink and white clock ticked out the minutes on the center of the shelf, while papa's face looked down at his little girlie from one end and a pink shell occupied the other end. A home-made dressing-table, covered with dotted muslin, stood across one corner of the room, with the mirror arranged just high enough for "rosebud" to see into. On the dressing-table was a tiny cushion in pink and white, a brush and comb tray painted with pink clovers, on which rested a brush and comb in old ivory tints, a pin tray and a picture of mamma. Two little rocking-chairs completed the room, but additions can always be made, and perhaps, if we could see the room some time in the future, we might find curtains at the windows to match the dressing-case, a pretty book and bric-a-brac case, and even a white fur rug in front of the bed.

Did three-year-old "rosebud" appreciate it? Perhaps not as much as those who had arranged the room, but her appreciation may have been of a higher type than theirs. At any rate, for weeks after she took possession of the new room, two or three times a day she left the rest of the family to "go and see my room." There she would sit and look all around, then contentedly join the others. Before she was five years old she each day dusted the room and made the bed herself, and loved that room better than any other in which to sit and read.

Ruth Mowry Brown.

There is a hint worth considering, for parents as well as teachers, in the grieved remark of a little girl, who said, recently: "I know my school teacher's sympathy has all gone out for the Armenians, because she has none left for her pupils."

Dear little cooks, with faces clean and bright,
What makes your loaves of bread all so fresh and light?
"We use Cleveland's Baking Powder."
Wise little cooks, now tell me, please,
the way
To always have good luck on every baking day?
"Why, use Cleveland's Baking Powder."

The Conversation Corner.

OUR last letter from Pomiuk, in the Corner of Dec. 24, said that he was about to sail away from the Indian Harbor hospital in Northern Labrador to Battle Harbor hospital near the Straits of Belle Isle. We have now a letter from Dr. Grenfell, dated Nov. 13:

S. S. DONALD, BATTLE HARBOR, LABRADOR.

My Dear Mr. Martin: One more line to you before the season closes. The chance arrival of the S. S. Kite, famous for her Peary relief voyages and now bound southward from the Arctic ice, where she has been whaling, affords me one more opportunity of writing you. To begin with, Gabriel reached Battle all right and has now been here nearly three weeks, which I have spent in cruising around the big bays with Dr. Willway, who again is going to remain the winter. The "Corner Cot," therefore, is now transferred to Battle Harbor hospital, and I shall not take him North again. He sees more people here and will be very happy. All who see him agree he is the merriest little fellow they know. You can hear him laughing all over the hospital. He will have as companions two little friends (incurable also). One is Tommy, a little lad of nine, with diseased spine and paralyzed legs. The other is Elsie, a little girl of six, with hopeless disease of the hip. We have also taken Maggie Shugloe, who was at Chicago with her parents and her brother. Both parents are dead, her little brother is in the orphanage at St. John's and we have taken Maggie as servant for the winter. She is bright and tidy and Gabriel will have an Eskimo to talk to.

I have taken quite a good photograph of the "Corner Cot" for you. We had to put up the names over the cots in cardboard, painted with black letters. The sister is sitting beside him. Gabriel was almost as difficult to keep quiet under such trying circumstances as my old dog is when I try to photograph him. It was like smothering a volcano. Yesterday he was practicing on our "bugle," which gave Tommy a headache. "I never saw such a boy," said Gabriel, disappointed at his want of musical appreciation!

We have just had a steam launch given to us, for the use of Battle Harbor next year. We shall be thus enabled greatly to extend the sphere of our medical work. I want to tell you how much God has blessed us of late. We have had the infinite joy of seeing his Spirit working in men's hearts and decisions made to "serve the Lord Christ."

And now the snow is on the ground, the ponds are frozen, and a bleak, cold wind is driving the freezing spray through and through us. The hospital is in its winter garb. Sister Carwardine and Dr. Apsland leave in the whaler Kite tomorrow, and we leave also in the Sir Donald for Red Bay to deposit Dr. Willway for the first part of the winter. Tonight is our farewell gathering and the committing of our friends to God's care for the long, dreary winter. We leave the hospital with Sister Williams, a Newfoundland maid and a young man whose father and mother are dead and whose brother I took to England four years ago. We leave our little cripples with them, in our loving Master's hand. He loved the children, the poor, the sick, the sinful, and he is the same today and forever. Ever yours in his service, W. T. GRENFELL.

It was very kind in Dr. Grenfell to take for us a photograph of our Corner Cot, with Pomiuk in it, trying to keep still long enough to be taken! You see on the wall the flag—a red cross on white cloth—which, tied to his crutch, he waved from the hospital window to welcome Dr. Grenfell last summer. The text-roll behind him—although it may not show plainly in the cut—is about David playing the harp before Saul. That is very appropriate for our little musician, whose harp is at the foot of the bed and whose special nurse is "Sister Cecilia," for St. Cecilia, you know, was the patron saint of music and is represented not only as distributing clothes among the poor, but as listening to the music of an angel. The ancient paintings would be fulfilled beautifully in her listening to Gabriel playing on his concertina and singing,

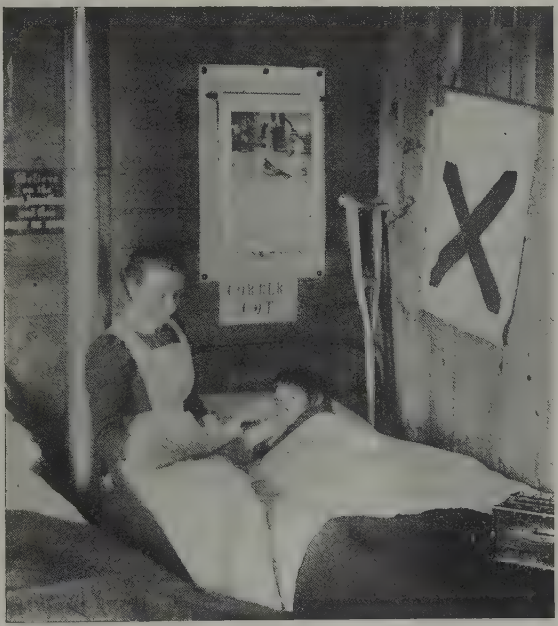
Takpanêle, takpanêle,
Mern-go-tor-vi-kan-gi-lak!

Up in heaven, up in heaven,
There will be no sorrow there!

I suppose we shall not hear from the Corner Cot and its occupant again until next summer, but we shall hear from Dr. Grenfell, for, instead of sailing immediately for England as he expected, he is now in Canada and writes that he will come from Halifax to Boston by sea—"so as to see that coast"!—about Feb. 20, and spend a few days in the vicinity of Boston. If any of you have the opportunity of hearing his lectures and seeing his wonderful pictures of fisher-life in the North Sea and in Labrador, do not miss it.

ST. CLOUD, MINN.

Dear Mr. Martin: . . . When I was home on Christmas I picked up a Congregationalist and saw the picture of Pomiuk, from which, and from the name, I decided him to be the little Eskimo I became so interested in at the World's Fair. Glad to hear of our little friend once more. I hope he can be kept in his Corner Cot. Is there anything I can do to help? I have not read The Congregationalist much, so do not understand the aim of the "Corner." BIRD C.



How shall we explain our "aim," Corners? To ask questions and answer them; to get good and do good; to help others, especially children, whether in America, or Turkey, or Japan, or Labrador. Can you "do anything to help"? Certainly! We have paid the "Deep Sea Mission" for our Corner Cot for two years—$50 the year. We children now propose to bring together our mites, so as to keep our sign over the Cot and our boy in it another year.

HALLOWELL, ME.

Dear Sir: Last Sabbath the story of Pomiuk was told to the children in our Sunday school, and after it the pennies which they had brought as a Christmas gift to the Lord Jesus were gathered, amounting to ——, which I inclose in a check for the Corner Cot. It would have pleased you to see their eager interest, and I am sure they will not soon forget the one to whom was sent "Jesus' Birthday Gift." MISS G.

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK.

About Deaf Children. A very interesting article in the Century magazine (for January) says that there are more than 2,500 deaf children in this country who are taught to communicate, not by sign language as formerly, but by means of speech as the children of our public schools are taught. "Deaf and dumb" people are dumb because they are deaf. Their vocal organs (generally) are all right, but never having heard any one speak they do not know how to speak themselves. Gradually, under the instruction of skillful and patient teachers, they learn by seeing diagrams of the vocal organs, by touching the throat of the teacher and by watching her lips, to speak and to hear.

The writer tells of the eagerness of his "deaf and dumb" scholars when returning from the summer vacation to tell their adventures. One boy stepped in a bees' nest, and the bees stung him and hurt him very much. He fell into a brook and got wet all over, "but my shoes did not get wet." The teacher asked why they did not get wet. He replied, "Because they were on the grass!" It is a slow process for children to learn the exact meaning of words. A boy wrote one cold March morning: "The wind is very blew, and I am a little shiver." Another wrote: "The man chopped the ground with his dig, and the dog hurrahed with his wag." Mr. Arthur Gilman of Cambridge has an article in the same magazine about the remarkable progress Helen Keller is making in fitting for Radcliffe College. She writes her essays with almost perfect punctuation as well as diction on the typewriter, and her examination paper in Latin was marked "A."

A Slow Conveyance in England. I have just seen quoted from an English book the story of a traveler who lost his dog at Dover and went on (by rail) without him. When he reached his home in London he found the dog awaiting him on the doorstep. He had run all the way—about eighty miles—and beaten the train. Was this story a myth, designed to reflect on the "slow coaches" of the Dover railway?

What the Children Say. One of our little members has reached the stage of letter writing—by dictation. This is one of her epistles: "I have been very sick and am writing to you this afternoon, because I do not wish to be nerverking round. I think it will be very pleasantful to you to hear of it. If I hinder your time, I hope you will not recognize it."

How Puss Helped the School-Girl. She was accustomed to aid her memory by associating some familiar thing with the Latin word she wanted. With opus, she associated O-puss—a natural association, with the abominable pronunciation of Latin now in vogue. When in the class the girl was asked to give the Latin for the noun work, she instantly and boldly replied, "O-cat!" (This is a true story—the girl is a Cornerer!)

A Young Evolutionist. This is a true story too—I heard it yesterday, and I know the little boy! His mother told him of the monkey in the Zoo in Boston who was punished for biting a brother monkey by having his teeth filed. In reply to the boy's question if it did not hurt the monkey, his mother said that the dentist had filed her teeth, in order to fill them with gold. "Was that when you were a monkey, mamma?" the young evolutionist asked at once!

PROGRESS OF THE KINGDOM.

HIGHER EDUCATION IN OKLAHOMA.

In Oklahoma, our latest frontier, we have an excellent example of the way in which the Congregational Education Society starts a pioneer educational institution and of the struggles and hardships which the young people, as well as their parents and teachers, must undergo in the early years of a young Western college. Kingfisher College, Kingfisher, was founded in 1895 by the Congregational churches of Oklahoma Territory, led by their home missionary superintendent, Rev. J. H. Parker. Situated midway between Kansas and Texas north and south, Indian Territory and New Mexico east and west, it is the only institution standing for Christian education in this territory of 200,000 souls. The nearest high-grade school of any description is more than 100 miles eastward. Others are to be found at distances of 135 miles northward and 200 miles southward.

The hardships and privations of six years of pioneer life, with failure of crops for two years, have developed careworn men and sad-eyed women, who live in sod houses and do not know what it is to be out of debt. But one of the sorest trials to these intelligent American farmers is the lack of educational advantages for their young people. One mother declared, "If our farm were worth $100,000 it would not pay us for the sacrifice we have made of our children." For three years they had almost no schools. Even now many of the country districts have been too poor to pay for more than a three months' term in a year, and scores of children cannot take advantage of this opportunity because too poor to buy books. The young people in the towns have passed through the town schools and are reaching out for higher learning. They are not only eager to make up for lost time but to brave poverty and to work their way through college by any honest means however humble. Two college boys are working for Superintendent Parker; three others haul wood ten miles to furnish the institution with fuel; seven students do their own cooking; one girl works in the home of the president and others are employed in families in the town as well as in the college boarding house. Fifty acres of the college farm are to be planted in cotton and President House writes that "the boys and girls can 'pick their way' through the school if they have the pluck." Those who teach in the district schools must take their pay in "warrants" which, while money is so scarce, can only be cashed at fifty per cent. discount.

Though incorporated as a college, and though some students are taking freshman studies, the head of the institution writes that it only claims standing as an academy and is so recognized by the C. E. S. Rev. J. F. House, the cultivated, ambitious young president, has made a study of methods and courses in the East, and is determined to have a high standard and thorough work. To meet the varied needs there are normal and business courses, as well as a regular college preparatory course, which was taken by sixty students last year.

Beginning in the unfinished basement of the Congregational church, the school soon outgrew those quarters and was obliged to provide accommodation for boarding students. It now occupies a building which costs sixteen dollars a month. Of this amount Mr. House pays from his own pocket six dollars, the students three and the college seven dollars. Provisions are cheap. All expenses are kept remarkably low, enabling a student to go through the year for $100. The current expenses for this year, including salaries of president and two teachers, will be only $2,200. Soon Kingfisher College will have a home of its own. The corner stone of the new building was laid last spring by the Territorial Association; and the Oklahoma churches, as well as the town of Kingfisher, are making strenuous efforts to carry the enterprise through. Nor are the leading individual workers behind in generosity and sacrifice. President House has pledged one-fifth of his salary for five years. The campus, said to be worth over $18,000, is encumbered with a mortgage of $2,500, for the interest of which Superintendent Parker has become responsible. When the new building is done the school will need everything in the way of furnishings, scientific apparatus, library, etc When does such an institution need help more than at the beginning? A few hundred dollars now will tell more than thousands later on.

OUR OWN WORK.

Help for India. In view of the Indian famine, the American Board issues an earnest appeal in behalf of its Christian agents, partly or wholly supported by the native church. With the increase of food prices the people find it difficult to support themselves and utterly impossible to maintain their preachers and teachers. Some of these men are receiving only half their usual allowance while food costs double or treble its ordinary price. One way to render aid in the present emergency would be to increase these allowances for our missions. Instead of this the state of the treasury has compelled a reduction of from thirty to forty-five per cent. in the department of native agency. Not unreasonably, the Board asks that if the churches cannot do more they will at least furnish the funds for meeting the regular estimates from the missions. The directors of the London Missionary Society have already decided to place at the disposal of their missionaries in India an increased grant for their native agents from the general funds of the society on the ground that it is responsible for the maintenance of its workers and must therefore make an effort to relieve them.

THE WORLD AROUND.

Work Among Foreign Students. The international committee of the Y. M. C. Associations looks back upon 1896 as the most successful year in its foreign work. The committee has now nine foreign representatives, one in China, one in Ceylon, four in India, two in Japan, one in Brazil. Ceylon is a new field occupied for the first time during the past twelve months. The year has been marked by the large sums of money, amounting to nearly $100,000, contributed toward building enterprises. No less than $45,000 have been pledged for the purchase of the Students' Association building in Calcutta; $30,000 have been pledged by Mr. John Wanamaker for a building in Madras, and several additional thousands have been given by American friends towards its equipment. Other generous contributions have been made for buildings in Tientsin and Rio de Janeiro. In addition to these gifts $20,000 have been contributed in America toward the support of the general work. But the most remarkable feature of the year has been the work done by Mr. Mott, college secretary of the committee, in India, China, Australia and Japan. Reports of the twelve conferences conducted by him in Asia record the attendance of over 2,000 students, representing more than 200 colleges, as well as nearly 1,000 missionaries and over 1,000 Asiatic Christians. Conversions at these conferences are numbered by hundreds, and another direct result of the spiritual impetus received was the volunteering of over 200 students to devote their lives to Christian work among their own people. In China, especially, the student conferences have exerted a powerful awakening and uplifting influence.

Lesson for Feb. 14. Acts 5: 12–42.

THE PRISON OPENED.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D. D.

The growth of the early church was rapid, but some time—two or three years at least—must have elapsed since its formation before the events of this lesson occurred. The disciples of Christ had become a recognized sect. The gospel they preached had become known by a distinct name. They had filled Jerusalem with their teaching. The spirit and usages of the church developed through influences both within and without, as they now do; and one great advantage of studying this history is to learn the effect of similar influences on the church today. It is still changing and developing under the working of the Holy Spirit. In this lesson are described:

I. The prosperity of the church. It was gaining in popular favor, especially among the common people. The reasons for this were:

1. Signs and wonders [vs. 12–16]. Some of these have already been mentioned. The strange sound which called together the people on the day of Pentecost, the halo on the heads of the disciples, the praising of God in many tongues, were some of these signs. So also were the healing of the lame man and the tragic deaths of Ananias and Sapphira. The power of the apostles had become so generally recognized that people brought sick friends from the city and surrounding towns and laid them on mats in the streets through which Peter passed, believing that his shadow would heal them.

These ways of attracting attention were sensational, but they were approved by God. It is the part of wisdom to set people to talking about religion and to get them to listen to the gospel, and unusual ways of doing this which are successful, if they are not irreverent or unmanly, are to be commended as good business enterprise for God.

2. The unity of the disciples. They worked together. They were often seen together. They held meetings in Solomon's porch, a part of the temple where citizens were wont to congregate. Their harmony and earnestness were contagious, and, while men who remained selfish and self-seeking did not dare to join them, believers in Christ increased rapidly, and multitudes of both sexes came into the company of the disciples. Many are ready to believe on the Lord when they see that his followers have a fellowship which attracts good men.

3. Beneficence. The church was already a blessing to the city and beyond it to the country around. It gave health to the sick and peace to families which had been made miserable by those vexed with unclean spirits. The church must have something valuable to give to the people if it is to win their allegiance to Christ. They learn first that it blessed to receive; then they may discover that it is still more blessed to give.

II. The enemies of the church. These were rival institutions. In these the church in all ages finds its chief foes. Not usually individuals as such, but organizations which bid for popular favor fight the church. Free thinkers, theosophists, spiritualists, secularists, who want support for their institutions, decry the Christian Church. Leaders of labor organizations are insistent that it is not the friend of working men.

The reasons for this hostility were substantially the same in Jerusalem as they now are in Boston. The officers of the Jewish Church were mostly Sadducees. They did not believe in the future life, nor in any life apart from the body. But they believed in their institution, drew their support from it and maintained their social position through it. The leaders of the new sect were undermining the Jewish Church, and "the sect of the Sadducees" determined to overthrow them.

They had once already expressed their hostility by throwing the apostles into prison [Acts 4: 3]. Now they tried the same thing again, with no better success.

III. The deliverer of the church. I am not sure that, if this event had happened night before last, the daily paper would have described the escape of the apostles by saying, "An angel of the Lord by night opened the prison doors and brought them out." But I am sure that the apostles and their friends would have said that the Lord delivered them. Faith in God's providential care of his own believing children and in his intervention at critical times to insure the success of his church is absolutely necessary to its life.

The angel's message to the apostles is substantially that which comes from God to the whole Christian Church today: "Go ye, . . . speak . . . to the people all the words of this life." We have had committed to us a gospel of salvation. The words which Jesus used in describing himself, "I am the Way and the Truth and the Life," have been capitalized and stand for the chief gifts and the chief business of life, which we are called to make known to men.

IV. The apologist for the church. If Gamaliel had been a Sadducee he would have stirred the prosecutors of the apostles to madness. But he was a Pharisee, and this sect was at this time as much for the new sect as for that of the Sadducees. This is not saying much for either. He argued from history that when men follow delusions they are at last destroyed by them, while, if men really have a divine message, it will prevail. His conclusion was that they would better let the apostles alone. Time would tell whether they were right or wrong, and meanwhile the Jews could go on as before. This was by no means the best advice that could have been given. The apostles were witnesses to alleged facts, which they claimed had occurred in that very place only a few years before. It would have been easy to prove or disprove these facts, and it was the business of the Sanhedrim, as representatives of the Jewish faith, to do this. If either they or Gamaliel had been really seekers after truth they would not have agreed to wait for other men to find it, but would have found it for themselves.

But the advice led to a compromise. The Jewish authorities did not kill the disciples, but only beat them. The counselor who is indifferent to the truth never inspires men, but he does sometimes check their evil propensities.

V. The work of the church. It was:

1. Teaching the truth. "We have a command higher than yours," Peter said to the Sanhedrim. The apostles had made great advances in knowledge in a few months. Jesus had told them explicitly that they must obey the Sanhedrim, though they ought not to follow the example of the men who composed it. "All things, therefore, whatsoever they bid you," Jesus had said, "these do and observe." How could Peter so soon declare that he was obeying a higher law than theirs? Only because of the conviction that he was led by the Holy Spirit. Even a command of Jesus was to be interpreted according to the circumstances in which a disciple was placed and in the light given to him by the Holy Spirit. The truth the church is to teach is the same now as it was then. It is the resurrection of Jesus, who is the living Saviour, exalted to give repentance and remission of sins to all who believe on him, and all such have received the Holy Spirit who witnesses to these truths.

2. Doing good. The chief evidence of the truth which the church preaches is the compassion of all disciples of Christ for men in need. They will defend the oppressed, feed the poor, heal the sick and deliver men from all evils by bringing them into fellowship with God.

3. Suffering for truth's sake. The beating given to the apostles they welcomed as they would have welcomed a gift, "rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer dishonor for the name." Christians must expect to be misunderstood, spoken against, persecuted. The laboring man wants more from his employer than the church claims for him. The employer wants to give his employé less than the church says he ought to give. Society wants to indulge in pleasures which the church believes will destroy spiritual life. The ascetic abuses the church for not denouncing all men who will not imitate him. Only the indwelling Holy Spirit can keep men calm under such conditions and inspire them to continue "to teach and to preach Jesus as the Christ."

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN.

Topic, Feb. 14–20. What Our Denomination Is Doing. Zech. 4: 1–14.

This topic points to the joint activities of the 5,500 Congregational churches in the United States. It ought to mean something to us that our denomination raises over $2,000,000 a year solely for benevolent purposes, to say nothing of between six and seven millions spent for sustaining the preaching of the gospel in the home churches. The larger share of this $2,000,000 goes toward the carrying on of the work of our six benevolent societies, which are sending missionaries all over this country and throughout the earth are founding Sunday schools and churches, sustaining educational institutions, reaching after the despised races and in various other ways building up the kingdom of heaven. The investment which our denomination has made in years past for Christian work in the form of printing presses, buildings, special funds and endowments probably amounts to many millions of dollars, and these investments are yielding abundant fruit.

Think of the aid Congregationalists bring to modern movements like the Y. M. C. A., the Y. W. C. A., the Christian Endeavor cause, the W. C. T. U., the Evangelical Alliance, prison and other reforms and countless agencies established for the betterment of mankind. We ought not to forget, too, the prominence of Congregationalists in such newer undertakings as institutional churches and college settlements. No branch of the Church of Christ has been more alert through its representatives in these directions, and a large proportion of the men and women now laboring along these special lines are Congregationalists in whom we may take an honest pride. The successive editions of The Congregationalist Handbook are worth consulting in this connection, as well as Dr. Dunning's book, Congregationalists in America.

Congregationalists are contributing much annually to the intelligence, culture and unification of this nation. Outnumbered by seven other branches of the Christian Church, they are nevertheless in proportion to their numbers as forceful and resourceful a body of Christians as can be found in this country. And as respects world-wide movements, representatives of our denomination are taking no slight part in the play and interplay of forces that are slowly making over the nations of the world and changing the front of history. Witness the services of men like Dr. Farnsworth and of women like Dr. Grace Kimball in Armenia. Think, too, of the influence which our representatives in Japan and India are exerting, not merely in the formation of individual character, but in shaping the form which the national life is to assume in the future.

We speak of these things not to boast of them, nor to exalt ourselves above other Christians, nor to imply that we are doing as much as we ought to do, but we call them to mind in order to do justice to whatever faithful work is going on in the name of our denomination today in any quarter of the world and to derive from the bird's-eye view a stimulus to better service.

BOOK REVIEWS.

THE LIFE OF A. J. C. HARE.

A more pitiful childhood than that of the distinguished author of this autobiography it would be difficult to imagine. Many of the very poor experience a bodily distress of which he had no knowledge, but we doubt if there ever were a more unloved and unhappy childhood than his. Given away by his parents at a very early age, with apparently no regrets or compunctions on their part, he grew up practically a stranger to them and to his brothers and sisters, and only in mature life did he come into agreeable relations with his sister, and he never grew to have any strong affection for his mother. To his adopted mother he was intensely devoted, and not without reason, yet her mistaken views of education and the influence of other members of the family upon her subjected him to a bitter and persistent cruelty which was enough to crush all the manhood out of most boys. It is a wonder that his life has been as useful and happy as it has.

It is a question whether any good is accomplished by such outspokenness as his in portraying bitter early experiences, and the same doubt arises as one reads the account of the persecutions to which he was subjected in connection with his sister's death and the disposition of her property. The machinations of the Roman Catholic Church, to which several of his family belonged, being perverts from the English Church, are set forth relentlessly. Washing family dirty linen in public, however, generally is a mistake. Moreover, many trivial letters or descriptive passages should have been omitted. Nevertheless, the frankness of the author, which must have cost him something, may have value in hindering in the cases of others the evils experienced by him, and there is a certain charm in the absolute artlessness and freedom of the narrative. Mr. Hare unbosoms himself almost without reserve, thereby revealing more of his own nature and character than could be shown in any other way.

The story of his literary history is most entertaining, and the charm of the work lies pre-eminently in its pictures of the many interesting and often famous men or women whom he has known. Few modern Englishmen have come into so close a touch with so many scores of striking and even distinguished individuals, and his short but graphic pictures of them are most fascinating. Although the narrative is sad and sometimes depressing, it is full of a humanity which every reader must appreciate, and in certain respects the work takes rank among the most engrossing of recent years. [Dodd, Mead & Co. $7.50.]

HISTORY OF THE LAST QUARTER OF A CENTURY IN THE UNITED STATES.

These two sumptuous volumes cover the ground from 1870 to 1895 and are the work of Pres. E. B. Andrews of Brown University. Most of our readers will recognize the substance of them as having appeared recently in Scribner's Magazine, but the original matter has been so carefully revised and enlarged as to constitute practically a new work. The author has not attempted to write a detailed history and this fact needs to be constantly borne in mind. His purpose is simply to describe the salient features of our recent career, those events and facts which have been conspicuous and which, although perhaps they have had no more to do with guiding our destiny than some less prominent, nevertheless are naturally the subjects of first and chief comment.

This purpose almost necessarily renders the work very sketchy. Condensation has been studied so carefully that a sense of incompleteness often is left upon the reader's mind. Why, he asks, was it worth while to touch upon this or that matter at all if only to give so superficial a treatment? This, however, is largely the author's misfortune rather than his fault. But the most abrupt transitions from topic to topic occur, whether logical or chronological order have been followed, and he skips from one to the other too freely. Breaks in the narrative caused by the passage from one item to another, perhaps of an entirely different nature, often are unpleasant.

Moreover, the author's judgment does not always commend itself. His estimates of public characters are fair in the main and he has successfully avoided partisanship and favoritism, yet now and then judicious and well-informed readers will be a little surprised at the opinions which he utters. Nevertheless the work leaves, on the whole, a good impression. The publishers have issued it in a very handsome form and with abundant illustrations. [Charles Scribner's Sons. $6.00.]

RELIGIOUS.

The Shadow Christ [Century Co. $1.25], by Rev. Gerald Stanley Lee, is the work of a poet rather than a theologian. Some of its particularly theological utterances are likely to be disputed, but its general theological trend seems intended to be orthodox. The style is exceedingly strained at times, and the meaning too often is not apparent. A lack of simplicity is conspicuous in respect to both thought and expression. Nevertheless the book is sure to make a considerable impression. There are in it unquestionable intellectual freshness and power as well as sincere spirituality. It is the work of a thinker, daring yet reverent, visionary rather than logical, and not always master of his own mental processes, but rarely failing to interest and uplift the reader even while he puzzles him, and uncommonly suggestive of high and holy purpose. Epigrammatic sentences, some possessing a beauty equal to their terseness, abound. The book should not be read rapidly, but with attendant meditation. Its purpose is to point out how Christ and his work were foreshadowed by certain Old Testament characters, notably Isaiah, and how apt and beautiful the relation is between them and their gropings after him and his fulfillment of their sacred labors and their dreams. The impression made by the book will depend much upon the quality or mood of the reader's mind, but unquestionably, in spite of its faults—some of which are those often found accompanying great merits—it will receive a friendly welcome and will prove a stimulus to every one who reads it with spiritual sympathy.

The Illustrated Bible Treasury [Thomas Nelson & Sons. $2.00], edited by William Wright, D. D., embodies the work of many expert scholars of different sorts and has some special features. The purpose of those in charge of it has been to Orientalize the Bible, so to speak—to "get behind the veil of Western words and ideas, and to enable the reader to study the book amid the surroundings and in the very atmosphere in which it was composed." It is a practical hand-book of the highest value for Biblical study, and contains analyses of the successive books and articles on the canons, monumental testimony, etc., papers on history and chronology, geography and topography, Bible science, antiquities, Jewish worship and sects, etc. A combined concordance, subject index and index of proper names, in which three styles of type indicate clearly the three classes of contents, is a novel and successful feature. References to both the Authorized and the Revised Versions are included. A Biblical atlas and a relief map of Palestine are appended, and the volume is illustrated abundantly and with pictures of a remarkably excellent quality. The only defect in the book is that which is inevitable in a book of its convenient size and remarkable comprehensiveness, the diminutiveness of much of the type. Old or weak eyes will find the ordinary text impossible to read except with the aid of glasses.

The Historic Episcopate [Eaton & Mains. $1.00], by Prof. R. J. Cooke, D. D., is a study of the Anglican claims and of Methodist orders. It is on the whole the most clear and convincing demolition of the claims of the Anglican Church to apostolic succession through the Roman Church, from which the English Church was cut off by Henry VIII., which we have seen in small compass, and its claim in behalf of the Methodist orders is well established. The criticism which Anglican readers will make upon it, and justly, is that it almost wholly overlooks the fact that the Anglican Church now places but little or no importance upon the line of descent through the Roman Catholic Church down to the time of Henry, but traces its succession back through the Anglo-Saxon Church, to which alternative Dr. Cooke has devoted but a few lines and those not conclusive. Whether the Anglican Church be right or wrong in this claim, and we do not believe it right, Dr. Cooke has almost entirely failed to give the claim the attention which it deserves. His book, therefore, may fairly be asserted by the Anglicans, his chief opponents, to be beside the real issue rather than face to face with it. But what it does it does well.

The Origin and Annals of "The Old South" First Presbyterian Church and Parish in Newburyport, Mass., 1746–1896 [Damrell & Upham. $2.00] is a tasteful volume, edited by Rev. H. C. Hovey, D. D., and possessing great interest. It describes the celebration of the 150th anniversary of the foundation of the church, observed last April. Dr. Hovey's historical address embodies gracefully the substance of the story of the generations and the addresses by Dr. Vermilge and others supplement its statements happily. This church is that so specially associated with the memory of Whitefield and under the pulpit of which he is buried. Congregationalists as well as Presbyterians may well take pride in its honorable and useful career and will enjoy the reading of these graphic pages. Many portraits and other illustrations adorn the volume which is an excellent piece of work. But Dr. Hovey unintentionally has done grave injustice on page 22 by confusing the Pilgrims with the Puritans. The former are not open to his charges, which lie only against the Puritans of the Bay Colony.

POETRY.

The Book of the Native [Lamson, Wolffe & Co. $1.00], by C. G. D. Roberts, strikes one by the individuality of its contents. They possess a certain manner which sets them apart from the verse of most other composers. There is in them an almost undefinable something, a certain unconventionality of both conception and expression, which yet hardly can be said to disregard the customary methods altogether and must impress the reader. Some of the poems are decidedly elevated in conception, some are simple, and others are suggestions rather than developments. All are musical and the book leaves a more than commonly pleasant impression upon the reader's mind. ——The Substance of His House [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.00] is by P. H. Frye. The book takes its title from the opening poem, one of its more elaborate contents. We cannot help wondering whether, if this poem, for instance, were written in the form of prose, many readers ever would suspect that it had been composed as a poem. The shorter productions, especially the sonnets, are more poetical but the author seldom rises to a high level. His verse is largely reflective and sentimental.

Mr. C. W. Moulton has compiled a volume of poems of love and beauty called In My Lady's Name [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50]. It is a pretty volume, the productions of a very long list of writers, ancient and modern, having been gleaned for their love songs. The result is a collection somewhat miscellaneous in respect to quality, but greatly diversified and including most of the finest examples of poetry of this sort in English literature, as well as some others which, less known hitherto, perhaps are destined to become equally popular. The book will take a good place among volumes of its class.——It was a pleasant thought to gather representative poems by students and graduates of Wellesley College. Such a collection has been made and published by Cordelia C. Nevers, of the Class of '96, under the title Wellesley Lyrics [$1.00]. Mrs. Palmer, the ex president, has furnished the introduction. The poetry is better in average quality than would be expected from college students. Of course the contents vary a great deal, but there are good examples of high conception and skillful execution. Fun and pathos are not lacking, and the graduates, students and friends of the college will give the book the hearty appreciation which it deserves.

Poems, Pastoral and Psalm [Eaton & Mains. 50 cents] is a collection of verse by Rev. Benjamin Copeland. It is principally religious, uniformly elevated in sentiment, shows some real power of metrical composition, and is likely to interest Christian readers. The distinctively religious verses are the best.——Nine Love Songs and a Carol [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1 25], by Kate Douglas Wiggin, is a pretty book of songs and music which our musical readers will be glad to welcome.

EDUCATIONAL.

The Forms of Discourse [Ginn & Co. $1.25], by W. B. Cairns, undertakes to discuss style for the benefit of high school and college pupils. We are not so sure as the author that the study of style should come first in a course of English. It depends upon the pupil. To put too much emphasis, early, upon the study of style is to risk destroying naturalness and even originality. Ordinarily, one who is at the age of those addressed by the author of this volume is far too apt to be influenced by some favorite writer. The ideal style for any student is that which is most natural for him after he has learned to correct his faults and has improved it as much as possible without destroying its individuality. But in this book there is a great deal which is of large and lasting value and we have no hesitation in commending it as one of the best practical hand-books we have seen.——The English Language and Its Grammar [Silver, Burdett & Co. 68 cents], by Irene M. Mead, is well considered and more comprehensive and in general more satisfactory in making its points intelligible than such books are apt to be. It is well adapted for actual and successful use. Whether the study of English grammar is on the increase or not, and a multitude of pupils are not taught it, there ought to be and there must be room for a book which is as broad and scholarly in its treatment of its subject as this.——Extracts from the third, fourth and fifth books of Spenser's Faery Queene have been edited by Mary E. Litchfield and published under the title Britomart [Ginn & Co. 70 cents], who is one of the most fascinating of the poet's heroines. Apart from the charm of the narrative there is a sort of fascination in the English of Spenser's time which is here reproduced, and the reader will learn as much from the book as he enjoys.

Tennyson's Princess [D. C. Heath & Co. 90 cents] has been edited afresh with an introduction and somewhat elaborate notes by A. J. George. It is published in a tasteful and convenient edition.——A number of new readers are at hand. One is The Story of the Romans [American Book Co. 60 cents] by H. A. Guerber. It is one of the Eclectic School Reading series and gives pictures from Roman life which are graphic and impart historical information, while they serve as text-books for their special purpose as well.——Carlyle's Essay on Robert Burns [American Book Co. 20 cents] forms one of the Eclectic English Classics. The positiveness which Carlyle always exhibited is perhaps gentler in expression in this essay than was common with him.——Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield has been edited by J. J. Riggs, Shakespeare's As You Like It by Katherine Lee Bates, Dryden's Palamon and Arcite by W. F. Gregory, and De Quincy's Revolt of the Tartars by Prof. F. T. Baker [Leach, Shewell & Sanborn. 50, 35, 35 and 35 cents] for the Student Series of English Classics, each illustrating well the scholarship and attractiveness characteristic of this popular series. ——Short Stories of Our Shy Neighbors [American Book Co. 50 cents], by Mrs. M. A. B. Kelley, is another reader for young children. It tells pleasantly about birds, beasts and insects; and the Children's Third Reader [Ginn & Co. 60 cents], by Ellen M. Cyr, is intended for the same class of pupils but is more general in its range and more freely illustrated.

Examples of text-books for work in foreign languages recently received are Racine's Iphigenie [American Book Co. 60 cents], by B. D. Woodward, in which selections from the comments of great critics and a bibliography are among the special features; Petite Histoire de Napoleon le Grand [Maynard, Merrill & Co. 25 cents], by A. H. Solial, which gives an outline of the first Napoleon's career with notes and a vocabulary; Andre Theuriet's Bigarreau [D. C. Heath & Co. 25 cents] and Molière's Les Femmes Savantes [D. C. Heath & Co. 30 cents] by Prof. Alcèe Forthier, two additional volumes of Hunt's Modern Language series. All are well suited to the convenience of the older boys and girls at work. In the series first named also belongs Prof. L. A. Rhoades's edition of Goethe's Iphigenie auf Tauris [70 cents] in which the modern conception of Goethe's work controls the treatment of the play. The usual collateral aids are supplied. Theodor Storm's Immensee [American Book Co. 25 cents] also has been edited for school use by F. A. Dauer and is highly serviceable. Here, too, must be mentioned Prof. I. Kellar's First Year in German [American Book Co. $1.00], which not only takes up the subject in the usual way but contains some special features, such as occasional additional exercises printed in Roman type. It is simple in plan and a thoroughly practicable book.

MAGAZINES.

The January Fortnightly Review [$4.50] has just come to hand. The Position of Mr. Rhodes, by an unknown author who calls himself Imperialist, is a timely and interesting paper in view of the return of Mr. Rhodes to England, where he must undergo trial for his connection with the Jameson raid; Mr. H. D. Traill discusses the New Realism, the Bishop of Ripon treats of the Effect of Voluntary Schools, Mr. J. L. Whittle points out Mr. McKinley's Opportunity, and the leading paper of the number is an indignant exposure, by Sir E. J. Reed, of the shameful persecution of Dr. Cornelius Herz by the French republic. The Fortnightly never fails to be thoroughly remunerative to an intelligent reader.——Accompanying it we have received the Nineteenth Century [$4.50], in which our recent presidential election is the subject of a paper by the Rt. Hon. Leonard Courtney, M. P.; Dr. J. Guinness Rogers discusses the Liberal Leadership, laid down last spring by Lord Rosebery and assigned, since this article was published, to the Earl of Kimberly; Lady Priestley writes about Nurses à la Mode; and Prof. St. George Mivart on the Burial Service. Other strong papers are The Educational Peace of Scotland, by Thomas Shaw, Q. C., M. P.; The March of the Advertiser, by Editor H. J. Palmer of the Yorkshire Post; and French Naval Policy in Peace and War, by Maj. Charles à Court; and Mr. M. H. Spielmann furnishes an article on Mr. G. F. Watts, R. A., his art and his mission.

The Quarterly Journal of Economics has papers by Alfred Marshall on The Old Generation of Economists and the New, in which is pointed out the fact that the recent work of economists has been to pass through controversy to method, accompanied by the extinction of controversy; to establish a harmony between the study of facts and ideas, to enforce a catholic spirit of interpretation and to strive to complete the main lines of qualitative analysis. Andrew McF. Davis furnishes a second paper on Currency Discussion in the United States in the Eighteenth Century, C. W. Mixter writes about John Rae, a forerunner of Böhm-Bawerk, and W. B. Shaw treats of Social and Economic Legislation of the States in 1896. Recent Books on Local Taxation are discussed by E. R. A. Seligman under Notes and Memoranda. In its own department of knowledge this journal is invaluable.——In The American Journal of Sociology [$2.00] F. W. Blackmar writes about the Smoky Pilgrims, a family group not unlike the famous Jukes family, Paul Monroe proposes an American System of Labor Pensions and Insurance, O. Thon describes the Present Status of Sociology in Germany, E. Muensterberg sets forth the Principle of Public Charity and Private Philanthropy in Germany, and there are other suggestive papers.

The Chap-Book [H. S. Stone & Co. $2.00] in its new form is a handsome publication. The essential features of the familiar form as far as type and illustrative work are concerned are reproduced, and the chief perceptible differences are the larger pages and the greater amount of distinctively literary material which the additional space permits. In its new dress it is likely to increase largely its already great popularity. ——The English edition of the Bookman [Hodder & Straughton] is as diversified and edifying as ever. The difference between this and its English namesake is so marked that American readers who have become accustomed to the former will hardly feel like dropping it, no matter how much they may prize the production of the home market.——The opening number of Art [Art Publishing Co. $1.00] is very attractive. This new competitor for favor makes practical usefulness its principal aim. Its three leading departments are The Classroom, The Workshop and The Home. It is meant largely for beginners. It is well edited and handsomely illustrated. It contains thirty pages exclusive of advertisements.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Dr. Russell Sturgis has rendered a valuable service to good architecture in his volume, European Architecture [Macmillan Co. $4.00]. It is a historical study, chronological in plan and pointing out clearly the inherent and essential characteristics of each architectural school and style. It supplies careful analyses and detailed comparisons. It deals sufficiently also with the closely kindred themes of sculpture and color decoration. The work is enriched by excellent illustrations upon almost every page and it furnishes a comprehensive, lucid and scholarly treatment of its theme from the point of view of an acknowledged modern expert. It may be found somewhat too technical at times for readers who have not some familiarity with architecture, yet not only professional students but a large number of others are quite competent to appreciate and enjoy it. A good example of the writer's discrimination is his account of Sir Christopher Wren's work. The publishers have issued the volume very handsomely, and we believe an edition in a less beautiful binding can be had at a somewhat lower price.

National Epics [A. C. McClurg & Co. $1.50], by Kate M. Rabb, is offered as an introduction to the study of the epic. The great poems of this class which have become famous in connection with different nations, including the Greek Iliad and Odyssey, the Roman Æneid, the Saxon Beowulf, the German Niebelungen Lied, the French Song of Roland, the Italian Divinia Commedia, the English Paradise Lost and others, are considered, the editor supplying practical information in regard to each, together with an outline of its story and sufficient extracts from it to furnish a good idea of its character. Such a volume does an important work in popularizing knowledge of a class of poetry which, because of its peculiar character, thousands of readers pass by as too elaborate for such study as they are able to give. It will not only supply the needs of students of literature, but deserves to have a much wider circle of readers. The epic poem perhaps makes profounder impressions upon its readers than either the lyric or the dramatic, especially when read in early life, but in this hasty age of ours epic poetry receives less attention than formerly, and in calling attention to it and in supplying modern readers with an opportunity of tasting it, so to speak, intelligently the volume does good service and will inspire many readers to consult the originals for themselves.

The Story of the Nations series runs on like Tennyson's Brook. The nations were disposed of long ago and now various provinces and districts are being attended to. The Story of the Balkans [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1 50] is as well written and valuable as the reputation of the series leads one to expect. It is by William Miller and in view of the concentration of public interest to so large an extent upon that and adjacent regions, because of the differences between the allied Powers and Turkey, it is peculiarly timely.——The Story of Canada [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50] just now is at the end of the procession of the same series. The author is Dr. J. J. Bourinot. The story of Canada has been not only picturesque but dramatic and romantic, and the author has performed his task with self-control and conspicuous ability, yet not without something of the enthusiasm which is natural. The different elements which make up the Canadian population and which have had so important a share in determining its political institutions and career are well portrayed, and the solid substance of the book, as well as its abundant pictures, render it an excellent addition to this valuable series.

Messrs. A. W. Elson & Co. have brought out a fine picture of the famous United States frigate Constitution—"Old Ironsides"—now just a hundred years old. It is a photogravure on India paper, 16 1-2 x 21 inches, mounted on heavy plate paper, 28 x 38 inches. A remarque edition, limited to the first hundred impressions and bearing an etched portrait of Commodore Hull, from Jarvis's painting in the New York City Hall, also is issued. It is a fine picture of a historic ship. It costs fifteen dollars.

NOTES.

—— McClure's Magazine has postponed for some time the serial life of Christ which it has announced for this year.

—— Mrs. Hugh Fraser, author of Palladia, a striking novel which we recently noticed, is said to be a sister of Mr. F. Marion Crawford.

—— Cosmopolis, an English magazine, already is issued in three languages and a fourth edition, in Russian, is arranged for to begin speedily.

—— The late George Du Maurier had absolutely no perception of dress and fashion and his family used to exercise regular oversight upon his drawings lest they should be incorrect in such respects.

—— Because of the prohibition by the Turkish Government of the sale within its territory of books or their translations which have helped to enlighten the Armenians, the Armenian printing house of the Mekhitarist Fathers, on the Island of San Lazzaro, at Venice has had to be shut up.

—— The great Oxford English Dictionary is in type at last to the middle of the letter F. About two and a half years were spent upon the letter D alone. At that rate of progress, by the time that the last letters of the alphabet have been "set up," the language will have so altered that it will be necessary to begin again with A and spend six months or a year more in revising each letter. It is eighteen years already since the first proof sheets were sent to press.

—— Mr. Barrie is criticised severely by some for writing Margaret Ogilvy, on the ground that nobody ought to discuss with the public the character and even the peculiarities of his own mother. But when the motive of such a book is so plainly reverent admiration and love and when the highest honor is rendered to her throughout, we see no ground for this objection. Mrs. Barrie herself probably would have been more than gratified by her son's book.

Rev. Alexander McKenzie, D. D., President; George Gould, Treasurer.

PASSING COMMENT ON THIS WEEK'S NEWS.

General discussion following a few opening speakers on a specific subject is a feature at midweek meetings which has lately met with considerable encouragement in a number of cases through larger attendance and more animated participation. Another successful plan arranges that a single subject, like, for example, a certain book or character of the Bible, be continued for a month. The failure to enliven the church prayer meeting lies not so much, perhaps, in the subject or program of the meeting as in the preparation of the attendants. Could those who regularly attend always go in the spirit and with the readiness of the leader of the meeting, it does not seem as if others who deny themselves the privileges of drawing warmth from this inner circle of the church could longer stand aloof.

First conversion, then a reformed and purified life—this, the natural and gospel evolution, has been the order in a Kansas community. Can sociologists and temperance workers formulate a more certain solution of the temperance problem?

Now that the proportion of non-church-goers in one of our Connecticut strongholds has been carefully estimated and brought to the attention of the ministers, it is to be hoped that no efforts will be spared to effect a better showing.

All honor to the women's societies which are so potent a factor in meeting parish expenses, especially the one in California whose vigorous sweeping demolished a church debt.

After-meetings abound and certainly have their place But why not try some fore-meetings, such as are found so efficacious in that Tacoma church?

It would be well if such a firm foundation for citizenship could be laid in every new community as has been done in the far northeast of New England.

A Bay State church sends forth its bi-weekly leaven in the form of a neat little sheet whose name is appropriate to its object.

Now is a good time to organize pastors' classes. The one described in our Oregon news may prove suggestive.

Of Special Note.

Two committees in a New England church indispensable to the highest success.

Congregationalism advocated by a Presbyterian minister in Missouri.

Gospel truth drawn from best books in Michigan pulpits.

Revival work crystallized into a church in the same State.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.

Bangor.

Professor Beckwith read a paper on Bangor Seminary Theology recently at the Cumberland Ministers' Association.——The Seniors have two lectures a week in church polity under Professor Beckwith.——Professor Sewall has begun lectures on English Literature with the Juniors.——Professor Denio tendered a reception to the Middle Class last Friday evening.

Andover.

On the Day of Prayer for Colleges President Harris preached at Bowdoin College and Professor Moore preached at Phillips, Andover Academy.——Feb. 23, Professor and Mrs. Churchill entertained the Junior and Middle Classes.——G. S. Ball was Senior Class preacher last Friday.——In accordance with a petition signed by most of the students last year, Dr. Torrey gives a course on the History of Christian Missions during the second semester.——H. H. Loud represented the Amherst men on the Day of Prayer for Colleges at Amherst College.

Hartford.

The Day of Prayer for Colleges was observed here by special class prayer meetings and a general seminary prayer meeting. Lectures and recitations were omitted.

Yale.

The divinity school was the only department of the university which observed the college Day of Prayer. A service at 11 A. M. was conducted by Dr. B. W. Bacon, and another at 7 P. M. was led by Austin Rice, a Senior.——Special lectures last week were: A Personal Theology, Prof. W. N. Clarke of Colgate, and The Scientific Study of Primitive Religions, Their Origin and Sources, Prof. D. G. Brinton of the University of Pennsylvania.——The Biblical Club had papers on Haggatic Stories, by H. W. Dunning, and the Books of Tobit and Judith, by E. L. Heermance and Q. Blakely.——The Semitic Club was addressed on the Talmud by Professor Porter and H. W. Dunning.——The Philosophical Club was addressed by Prof. J. H. Hyslop of Columbia on Mr. Spencer's Formula of Evolution.——Reality, Genuineness, Honesty, was the subject of an address before the school by C. S. Macfarland of the Senior Class.——The Leonard Bacon Club debated, Resolved, That the United States Should Recognize the Independence of Cuba.

Oberlin.

Sec. W. H. Warren of the Michigan H. M. S. addressed the students last week.——Classroom exercises were suspended on the Day of Prayer, and on other days of the week some of the lectures gave way to special religious services.——Four new men are enrolled in the English course this semester.——Professor Gates will conduct a Bible class for the consecutive study of the Acts, the class to be composed largely of Sunday school teachers.

CONFERENCES AND ASSOCIATIONS.

Me.—Cumberland Conference held a spirited meeting of three sessions in Portland, Jan. 27. The topics were: The Forgiveness of Our Enemies—What Is Christ's Law? What Is the Dominant Motive in Missionary Effort Today? How Is Christ My Personal Saviour? Truths Our Churches Need to Emphasize: 1. Confession of Jesus Christ; 2. The Means of Grace Most Helpful Today; 3. The Power of Christian Example.

CLUBS.

Vt.—The club of western Vermont held its ninth annual meeting at Rutland, Jan. 26. The general subject was The Devotional Life. The sub-topics were: The Devotional Life of the Individual, by Rev. G. W. Phillips, D.D.; The Public Devotional Services of the Church, by Pres. M. H. Buckham, D.D.; The Solitude of Jesus, by Rev. C. H. Smith; The Private Devotions of Bishop Lancelot Andrews, by Rev. G. L. Richardson, rector of St. Peter's Church, Bennington; The Devotional Use of the Sacred Scriptures, by Rev. C. R. Seymour. Mr. W. J. Van Patten is the incoming president.

N. Y.—The January meeting of the Brooklyn Club was observed as ladies' night. Commander Ballington Booth spoke upon The Volunteers and the Unchurched, and Mrs. Booth on The Work for Prisoners. A collection of $100 was taken after the remarks of Mrs. Booth.

Ind.—The Indianapolis Club held a meeting Jan. 26. Fifty persons were at the banquet, some of whom were from neighboring cities. The leading address was on The Renaissance of the Puritan Spirit, by A. J. Beveridge, Esq., an Indianapolis lawyer. Rev. J. C. Smith of the Presbyterian Tabernacle spoke on The Puritan Spirit in Its Relation to the Best Universal Life of the Nations; Rev. A. H. Ball, D. D., and Prof. J. W. Comfort spoke on The Puritan Spirit Up to Date; Rev. F. E. Dewhurst pleaded for Recreation and the Side of Life which the Puritans Neglected; Rev. N. A. Hyde, D. D., spoke upon The Practical Outcome of the Puritan Spirit.

Minn.—The Minnesota Club met at the Nicollet House, Minneapolis, Jan. 25. Labor Commissioner G. L. Powers of Minnesota spoke upon Sentiment versus Sentimentality in Local and Economic Affairs. His leading thought was that in assisting the poor help given without judgment is sentimentality. Many modern schemes for saving individuals through legislation are as valueless as the attempt of Tetzel to save man by the sale of pardons. Exception was taken to the speaker's position as not sufficiently recognizing the influence of environment on the individual, and a lively discussion followed.

Wn.—The Spokane Club held its annual meeting with Second Church, Jan. 21. Rev. J. D. Jones gave an address on The Elements of Weakness and Strength in Congregationalism. Rev. F. McConoughy spoke on Congregationalism as a Factor in Church Unity, Rev. T. G. Lewis on Eells Academy, and Pres. S. B. L. Penrose on Is College Education Advisable?

NEW ENGLAND.

Boston.

Last Monday night at the Superintendents' Union Mr. M. C. Hazard opened the discussion of The Year's Study before an average number of superintendents. His remarks were a suggestive forecast in outline of the lessons for 1897, and contained a brief descriptive analysis of the book of Acts. The speaker offered the timely suggestion that teachers take the opportunity offered by this year's course to instill into the minds of the youth the significance of the parallel between the principles of the early apostolic church and the Congregational churches of today.

Eliot gave a reception to its junior pastor, Rev. Dr. B. F. Hamilton, and his wife, Jan. 27, and thereby brought to a successful close the exercises commemorating the 25th anniversary of his settlement. The senior pastor, Dr. A. C. Thompson, presided and introduced the speakers. At 84 years of age he appears more vigorous than when his associate was installed. He warmly commended Dr. Hamilton for having never raised a question concerning the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, or introduced any suggestion favoring the higher criticism of the Bible. He emphatically intimated that that pulpit, measured by ancient standards of orthodoxy, must remain unchallenged. Rev. D. W. Waldron offered prayer, and congratulatory addresses were made by Messrs. P. B. Davis, A. E. Dunning, W. R. Campbell, Arthur Little and Smith

Baker. Dr. Hamilton closed the formal exercises with some earnest words of appreciation of his people and his ministerial associates. Many former members of the church were present and a large number of pastors of Boston and vicinity. Our notice last week of Dr. Hamilton's anniversary sermon erred in two particulars. The number received into the church during the 25 years was 495, and there are 40 ministers now in the same pastorates in which they were when Dr. Hamilton was installed.

Central. The edifice is open daily, except Saturday, for visitors from 2 to 4 P.M. Those who can appreciate art as an interpreter of religion may there sit amid beautiful surroundings and listen to a silent sermon. A leaflet explaining the significance of the lovely memorial windows may be had. The following is a specimen:

> The Emmaus window, in the north aisle, by the main entrance, teaches a lesson of hospitality. The two disciples constrain Christ to come in. A sunset glow is on the hills. The flame of the lamp is moved by the draft of evening wind. The table is waiting. None are weary in that companionship, but one of the travelers no more needs the protection of sandals. This window, also, by its position and subject, lights up the table with the story of the reward which came to hospitality. "He was made known in the breaking of bread."

Old South. The 80th anniversary of the City Missionary Society was held with this church last Sunday evening. President Stearns called the session to order. Supt. D. W. Waldron read a comprehensive report, tracing the society's history from the beginning. The details of the report showed nearly 60,000 calls made on over 20,000 families, 600 Bibles given away, and $30,000 annually received. Brief addresses were made by Rev. Drs. S. E. Herrick, E. L. Clark, G. A. Gordon and W. H. Davis.

Shawmut. Dr. W. E. Barton's Bible class had an attendance of 125 last Sunday, the subject, The Book of Revelation, proving unexpectedly attractive. Dr. Barton is preaching most of the evenings of this week at the union services of six South End churches, held at Warren Avenue Baptist Church.

DORCHESTER.—Second. At the annual meeting reports showed a total membership of 659, and 55 additions during the year. The amount raised for strictly charitable objects and chiefly through the weekly offering system was $12,207, divided among 60 different objects. The amount given to foreign missions was over $3,000. The Sunday school numbers 871 Reports from the various societies showed unusual activity and success. A delightful spirit of unity and love exists between the people and the pastor, Rev. Arthur Little, D. D.

Massachusetts.

CHELSEA.—Central. The monthly Visitor is full of good news at the opening of the new year. It contains a stimulating sermon appropriate to the season and preached by the pastor, Rev. C. E. Jefferson, as a review of 1896. The net gain in membership last year was 25, the accessions numbering more than twice that number. All debts were paid last year, and a mortgage 25 years' old, amounting to $5,500, was paid. A balance of $800 is the nucleus of a repair fund. Moreover, the benevolences, $1,800, were larger than those of the year before. The church has three bands which are workers indeed—the deacons, the visitors and the S. S. teachers, aggregating 108 persons. These, with the help of others, made 7,000 calls last year. The S. S. enrollment is 1,096. The annual meeting is now held in two sessions, a week apart, one for reports, financial considerations and elections of the church, the other for reports of all the departments of the church.

EVERETT.—Mystic Side. The best thing in the church lately has been a return to the old-fashioned idea of a prayer meeting, in which all talk is forbidden and the entire time is devoted to prayer. A few hymns are sung, but they are hymns of prayer. Great freedom is allowed, but the chief idea is for every soul to get near to God. Requests for prayer are invited and tenderly presented. Special meetings of this kind have been well attended and brought showers of blessing, tenderness and quickening power to the church. Rev. Albert Watson is pastor.

SOMERVILLE.—Franklin Street has called Rev. E. L. House of Attleboro, after having been without a settled pastor three years and without an acting pastor eight months. Mr. House has preached for this congregation twice. This church is one of the oldest in the city and includes in its membership many well-known and influential persons.

WEST NEWTON.—At the annual meeting of the church the benevolent contributions of the year were reported as $5,031 and the home expenditures as $6,581. Twenty-three new members were received last year, nine on confession.

MEDFORD.—Rev. John Barstow of the Mystic Church and Rev. Isaac Pierson of Union, with several other clergymen and leading citizens, last week called on the mayor to secure his aid in enforcing the law for the suppression of vice and of gambling. They were assured by the mayor of his hearty sympathy and his purpose to see that the law is enforced.

SALEM.—Crombie Street. Rev. J. W. Buckham is preaching a valuable series of sermons on Evenings with Christ.——South, at its annual social and business meeting, had an enthusiastic gathering. Reports showed a vigorous condition

DANVERS.—Maple Street suffers a serious loss, and with it the town and churches of Essex South Conference, in the recent death of Deacon J. S. Learoyd, for years the enthusiastic and successful superintendent of the Sunday school, and a man of exalted Christian purpose and character. Pronounced convictions, clear, able reasoning powers and wide information combined to make him an interesting speaker.

NEWBURYPORT.—Prospect Street. Evangelist C. L. Jackson, assisted by a singer, has just closed a week of special meetings. About 100 persons expressed a desire to begin a Christian life, and it is believed that of this number more than one-half are hopefully converted. Mr. Jackson won the respect of the unconverted as well as the love of the Christians who heard him. Rev. M. O. Patton is pastor.——So much earnestness was manifested during the Week of Prayer that union meetings have been continued by almost all the churches, and good results are apparent.——Belleville's religious life was never warmer and the people are willing to work. Four week-night services a week have been sustained throughout the month of January, the pastor, Rev. A. W. Hitchcock, being assisted by friends from the down-town churches and by Rev. Messrs. G. L. Todd, F. R. Shipman and L. H. Thayer, each coming for an evening's address. The whole church and Sunday school is awaking to new life in a steady, deep and hearty movement of growth spiritually.

AMESBURY.—Main Street has had its 65th annual meeting. Benevolences amounted to $1,007. The membership is 338, the accessions last year numbering 15. The various departments reported a satisfactory showing.

LOWELL.—Eliot. The pastor's son, Harvey B. Greene, has been chosen deacon. Miss M. E. Corr of New York has been secured as church missionary and superintendent of the juvenile department. She is a graduate of the Chicago Bible Training School, and has acted as pastoral assistant to Dr. H. A. Stimson in New York.——Highland. The month of January is observed as "a season of special prayer and effort for the promotion of the Redeemer's kingdom." Prayer meetings are held daily.——Kirk Street. The year's report shows a net increase of 45 in membership.——First Trinitarian completes the year without indebtedness and is thoroughly organized for service. The S. S. membership is 605. The Y. P. S. C. E. has 69 members.

WARREN.—A series of lectures on Phases of the Work of the Kingdom is being given Sunday evenings by various speakers. The congregations are double those of last winter. Congregational Work enters 250 families. The church has its own little fortnightly, Yeast Cakes. A Boys' and Girls' C. E. Society has been organized, and the methods of the U. S. A., described in The Congregationalist of last week, are used in a Boys' Club of 40 members. The pastor, Rev. W. B. Forbush, has led in organizing the Quaboag Ministers' Meeting, comprising ministers of five denominations in the Quaboag Valley.

NORTH BROOKFIELD.—First. The Sunday school made a gain of 28 last year in membership, and the congregations at both services have been steadily increasing since the commencement of the pastorate of Rev. J. L. Sewall.——Union. The annual roll-call met with a large response. The Sunday school, Y. P. S. C. E. and Junior C. E. Society are in good working order.

WARE.—East. Rev. A. B. Bassett has been granted leave of absence until September on generous terms. He will travel in the Orient with Dr. Selah Merrill and will study in Germany. Mrs. Bassett will accompany him. Rev. A. J. Dyer will be the temporary pastor.

SPRINGFIELD.—Hope. Rev. R. W. Brokaw has begun a series of evening sermons on The Sermon on the Mount.——First. Rev. F. L. Goodspeed is preaching a course of sermons on The Parable of the Prodigal Son. The house is filled to the doors at nearly every service.——North. The parish house plans are developing. The building is to stand on a lot adjacent to the meeting house. It will be two stories in hight, with brown stone front and brick elsewhere, and connected with the church edifice by an archway. The house will contain a banquet hall, a kitchen, a parlor, ante-rooms and on the upper floor a lecture-room. The cost is estimated at $24,000, of which $7,000 will be for the land. The sum of $10,000 is provided by pledges and ready money.

CUMMINGTON.—Village has completed a vestry for the church edifice, costing $1,150. The new structure has a parlor, audience-room and kitchen.

NORTH HADLEY.—Second had reports from its various societies at the annual gathering. About 90 members responded to the roll. The expenses of the year were $905.

WORTHINGTON had 15 accessions last year. The S. S. membership is 127 and that of the church 146. The benevolences were $95.

DALTON, Rev. G. W. Andrews, pastor, after publishing The Pilgrim for seven years conjointly with the Palmer church, has decided to issue the paper henceforth alone. The first number, in magazine form, with 25 pages, including advertisements, is just out. The pastor is editor. The periodical is wide-awake and readable, published monthly, and devoted to local interests. It shows this month that 18 new members were received in 1896. The statement of benevolences, $2,297, does not represent the entire benevolences. The church is thoroughly organized and highly prosperous and efficient. Mr. Andrews has filled the pastorate already 14 years.

NORTH ADAMS has voted to become incorporated. The annual meeting last month was the most successful ever held here. Three hundred persons attended. The year's increase, 23, makes the total 659. The average S. S. attendance has been 280. The continuance of the free pew system will depend on the voluntary support of the work. Rev. W. L. Tenney is pastor.

Maine.

PORTLAND.—Williston. The men gave a supper and social to the ladies Jan. 22. A dozen prominent men, dressed in full waiter suits of white linen, served. Nearly 200 persons sat at the bounteous table. A fine musical program followed in the main auditorium. The whole entertainment was unique and pronounced one of the best ever given by the church.——St. Lawrence Street, owing to change of location, will hereafter be known as the St. Lawrence Church, the name being retained for historic associations and identity.

PRESQUE ISLE.—At the fall meeting of Aroostook County churches the idea of forming a civic league was originated and resulted in the formation of such an organization Jan 27. The objects are: To educate in good citizenship, arouse and maintain a reverence for law, secure the enactment of the best laws and see them executed and the choice of competent officials. Rev. Charles Harbutt was chosen president, and there were representatives from Houlton, Caribou, Fort Fairfield, Presque Isle, Island Falls, Ashland and other places.

Limerick made its roll-call a social occasion with supper and fraternal intercourse.——Limington's evangelistic meetings were productive of much good. Rev. S. D. Towne assisted.

New Hampshire.

NEWPORT.—On the occasion of the golden wedding of Hon. and Mrs. Dexter Richards, Jan. 27, a large concourse, including many notable persons of the State, congratulated the honored host and hostess. The afternoon was reserved for out-of-town guests and the children of the community, and in the evening the citizens extended greetings. The pastor, Rev. James Alexander, in behalf of the donors, presented a testimonial in the form of a casket of solid gold, containing an address and a book of gold, on whose pages were written 1,800 names of the citizens and children of the town. Such was the appreciation of the town for the gifts by Mr. Richards of a fine public library building and endowment, and a high school building not yet finished. Mr. Richards is a native of Newport and has always lived here, holding prominent offices in town and State. He has always been a generous supporter and member of the Congregational church. Furthermore, his benefactions are not limited to this town.

EXETER.—First. The past year marked a new departure in the midweek prayer meeting. Topics have been chosen by a committee and duly announced. After the opening of the meeting individuals previously designated have led off with remarks and others followed. Certain evenings have been devoted to missions, and one evening in the month the pastor lectures on an article in the creed of 1883. Increase in attendance and interest has resulted.

TAMWORTH.—The longevity of the deacons and their wives has been remarkable. At the annual roll-call Deacon and Mrs. James Chesley responded at the ripe age of 84 years, after nearly 60 years of married life. Deacon and Mrs. Faxon Gannett still live at the age of 89, and two years ago Deacon William Hidden died at 97. Mrs. Hidden died earlier, after living with her husband 64 years.

Concord.—West. During the past year the chapel has been shingled, painted and otherwise improved. New pews were added in the audience-room. The total expenses have been $1,409 and benevolent contributions $357. The condition of the church is healthy and prosperous. Nine have been added, eight on confession. Extra meetings have been well attended in the out-districts.

Loudon.—A growing co-operation is manifest under the faithful ministrations of the new pastor, Rev. Andrew Gibson, and the outlook is more hopeful than for years. Prayer meetings are held during the week at the different homes, proving beneficial and giving encouragement for their continuance. Three have recently united with the church.

Lancaster for two weeks has held union evangelistic services with the aid of Rev. Ralph Gillam. Many of the meetings have tested the utmost seating capacity of the churches, and the interest is deepening. Already nearly 150 have publicly expressed a desire to begin the Christian life.

East Jaffrey had more than 100 present at the late church roll-call. Past bills are all paid and a balance remains.——Brookline's "fortnightly club," recently organized, is studying the various departments of our national government.

Vermont.

Morrisville.—More can be said of the new edifice than was contained in an item last week. That payment of the entire indebtedness is arranged for is due to the hearty generosity and sympathy of the entire membership, and for this spirit gratitude was felt at the first service within the new walls, last week Sunday. The interior is specially pleasing. The high ceiling, circular oak pews, the large organ and corner pulpit lend an attractive effect. There are rooms for the pastor, choir and parlor, and a large, well-lighted vestry, which can be opened into the auditorium. Electric lights and nine memorial windows, the gifts of individuals, are tributes to former prominent members. In connection with the dedication a sacred concert and fellowship meeting were held. At the latter neighboring and former pastors spoke and messages of congratulation were read. Rev. G. N. Kellogg is pastor.

Milton held its roll-call in January with a dinner and reports. A large attendance responded. The pastor has recently given the younger S. S. scholars a New Year's reminder.

Manchester had about 150 members at its annual meeting. Good reports were heard. Rev. F. V. D. Garretson has assisted for nearly a week in revival services.

Bethel has entered upon a new era under the pastorate of Rev. W. A. Warner, lately called. The S. S. service is prosperous and two normal classes are sustained.

Alburgh Springs held its annual gathering Jan. 20.——Benson has formed a literary circle.——Derby has resumed services, the pastor, Rev. H. M. Perkins, having returned from his vacation.——Essex held a week of evangelistic services.——Rev. M. F. Hardy of Townshend, who distinguished himself by courage and activity at the late fires, has been appointed chief engineer of the fire department.——Rev. F. V. D. Garretson is holding revival services in Newfane.

Rhode Island.

Providence.—Union had a net increase of 28 members last year, and paid $13,000 on a mortgage debt, also to foreign missions $2,115, home missions $3,973 and $750 for regular memberships in Y. M. C. A. Current expenses were $13,539. All departments are flourishing.——Central. Lenten services have been arranged for Thursday evenings with special music by the choir and preachers in order as follows: Rev. Drs. S. E. Herrick, Reuen Thomas, Alexander McKenzie, Daniel Merriman, A. H. Bradford, C. C. Hall and the pastor.——Pilgrim. The society voted an increase of salary and an addition to the vacation of the pastor for the coming year.

Connecticut.

New Haven.—United received 47 additions last year and 80 new members in the Sunday school. The church contributed about $9,000 for benevolences. Under the assistance of the Men' Club the congregations of Sunday evening have been large and have included many men of the city hitherto not interested. The addresses are highly ethical and educative. Last Sunday evening Profs. G. P. Fisher and A. T. Hadley of Yale spoke on Dangers and Safeguards of Our Free Institutions. When Mrs. Booth spoke recently $400 were collected for her work.——Howard Avenue. The total home expenses of the year were $3,427. The pastor, Rev. W. J. Mutch, is giving a course of lectures Tuesday evenings on The History of the Bible.

Hartford.—In spite of the large number of churches in this stronghold of Congregationalism, a careful accounting of the Protestant people of the city shows that not one in three attends church, while only 11,957 out of an estimated population of 75,000 (over 50,000 of whom are Protestants) are members of a Protestant church. Out of an adult Protestant population of 37,161, there are 22,773 who do not attend church at all, either regularly or irregularly. Some interesting facts regarding church membership in this State were brought out at the meeting of the Institutional Church League and the state of things is being recognized by the clergymen.

Plainville.—Since the beginning of the present pastorate two years ago, 43 persons have united with the church, mostly on confession. The benevolent contributions have been doubled and the receipts of the year are larger than the expenditures. A kindergarten department numbering 46 members has been added to the Sunday school, and a home department of nearly 100. A Junior C. E. Society of about 50 members has also been started. All the church services are well attended. Cottage prayer meetings are being held Sunday afternoons with gratifying results. Rev. J. E. Herman is pastor.

Derby.—First had a successful annual gathering and a bounteous supper. An unusually large number of responses to the roll were heard. A number of new committees on church work were appointed, among them two which deserve special note, strangers and visitation. Last year there were nine accessions. Rev. S. S. Martyn is pastor.

Niantic.—The congregations have more than doubled during the past six months, and renewed life is felt in all departments. The services of a trained young singer have been of great assistance to the pastor. The C. E. Society celebrated Christian Endeavor Day by the organization of a Junior Society.

Plantsville.—The annual meeting was one of much interest, 126 answering the roll. The pastor's report was encouraging and showed a net gain of eight during the year, making the present membership 394. Much work of repairing and laying of new carpets in 1896 was done by the Ladies' Aid Society.

Bethlehem.—Immediately on the dismissal of Rev. E. P. Ayer, to allow him to pursue post-graduate study at Yale Divinity School, his father, Rev. C. L. Ayer, was engaged to continue the work.

West Winsted, a branch of Winsted, has plans all ready to remodel or make a large addition to the meeting house. A fund is ready for the purpose. The church has an excellent choir.

Cromwell had a roll-call and social gathering Jan. 1. The benevolent offerings amounted to $1,414. The resident membership is 130. The gifts of individuals were not reported.

South Manchester records for the past five years, during which free pews were in use, a total income of $20,000, an increase of 50 per cent. over the previous five years.

Newtown reports a good year past with seven additions.——Washington's benevolences last year were $1,000.——Cornwall's benevolences amounted to $383, including a special Christmas Armenian offering of $50.——Special meetings of an evangelistic nature have been held or are still in progress in Eastford, East Hampton, Columbia, Bristol, Brooklyn, Kent, Salisbury, Lakeville, Meriden and Chester.——Plymouth received 16 additions in 1896 and has a balance in the treasury.——Westfield Church, Danielson, received 42 additions the past year.——The memorial windows presented at Wethersfield by the late Miss M. B. Smith are in position.——Dr. and Mrs. S. L. Blake of First Church, New London, held a largely attended reception in the parish house recently.——Rev. E. A. George has introduced Sunday afternoon vesper services at Willimantic.——Talcottville, with 206 members, paid out in benevolences $1,607.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

Brooklyn.—Plymouth. The membership of the church is 1,804, including 89 accessions last year. The total of the three S. S. enrollments is 1,726. The total receipts of the church were $31,949. A new feature at the midweek prayer meeting was tried with success lately. A general subject was opened to free discussion, and Dr. Abbott was asked many questions. Hereafter the latter part of the meetings will be conducted in the same manner. ——Bushwick Avenue. The annual review showed growth socially, financially and spiritually. The membership gain is 67, with a total of 288 The receipts were $3,049, the expenses $3,030. The S. S. roll contains 237 names.

Wilmington.—Revival influences that have been prevalent in this parish for some weeks still continue, with frequent conversions. The new converts and others show their appreciation by various gifts to church and pastor; to the latter a much needed fur overcoat. A Ladies' Aid and C. E. Society have been organized. Rev. H. A. Johnston is pastor.

Syracuse.—Plymouth. The meetings for prayer in January were profitable, culminating in greatly deepened spiritual interest. Rev. E. N. Packard, D. D., is pastor.——Danforth. The evangelistic meetings in this portion of the city, extending over most of January, are now closed and it is believed have been quite successful, a large number having manifested an interest.

Ogdensburg.—During Rev. C. W. Wilson's two years' pastorate the church has received 69 into membership. As a token of his valued labors he recently received from his people a purse of $21. A stringed orchestra discourses attractive music regularly. The ladies have placed a new range in the kitchen of the church.

Middletown.—First. Notwithstanding the payment last year of the $2,000 debt, and meeting other financial obligations in these hard times, the benevolent contributions of this church were larger than for a number of previous years. Rev. W. A. Robinson, D. D., is pastor.

De Ruyter, a new church, is constantly growing, a continual spiritual interest prevailing, so that hardly a week passes without conversions. A C. E. Society has been organized with 34 members. Rev. D. W. Bull is the pastor.

Rev. W. R. Curtis is assisting in special efforts at South Granville.——Rev. H. E. Gurney, State evangelist, has begun work with Olean Church.

New Jersey.

Paterson.—Auburn Street. Jan. 24, the pastor, Rev. T. G. Shearman, Jr., preached morning and evening on topics suggested by the pending arbitration treaty with England. In the evening an invitation was extended to voters present to sign a petition to the New Jersey senators that they use their influence for speedy ratification.

Dover.—The new building is progressing satisfactorily and will be finished early in the spring, but the young church feels the financial burden. Special meetings were carried into the third week and much interest is manifested. Recent new members make 21 added on confession in a year. The membership is 66.

Pennsylvania.

Philadelphia.—Central, at its annual meeting, reported good progress. The membership is nearly 700, including 18 received last month. The monthly musical service on the last Sunday evening in January included the rendering of Mendelssohn's Forty-second Psalm. A "memory social" was recently held, in which interesting reminiscences of notable events in the early history of the church were given.——First (Germantown) has had a prosperous year. Great advances have been made in the Sunday school work, of which the pastor, Rev. D. E. Marvin, has taken charge. Special opening services have been adopted and the interest awakened is great. The pastor is now giving a series of Sunday evening discourses on Great Characters in the Old Testament.——Park has received 41 new members since the pastor, Rev. C. B. Adams, began work, Jan. 1, 1896, and the congregations have trebled, though three or four new churches have started in the neighborhood. A Literary League for young ladies and a Literary Union for men have recently been organized. The annual church supper had a large attendance.——Kensington is already finding its new chapel crowded. Rev. N. N. Bormose received 15 at the last communion, and finds his Endeavorers of great help in both spiritual and temporal matters. They take in hand the sexton's work, carpeting the platform and the systematic visitation of the neighborhood.——Snyder Avenue has its place of worship full to overflowing and is in urgent need of a new, commodious chapel. The pastor, Rev. F. E. Wieder, baptized 10 children and received 18 new members last Sunday, making the present membership 87. The Sunday school has enrolled 100 new members since the recognition council in November.

tion and numbering 75. The room was decorated appropriately and the program was entirely in the hands of the veterans, several of whom gave five-minute talks relating to personal experiences of thrilling interest. Patriotic songs were sung and instrumental music was furnished. A table filled with war relics was exhibited. The soldiers were finally refreshed by the serving of hardtack and coffee in tin cups, supplemented by ice cream and cake.

Georgia.

ATLANTA.—First. The two weeks following the Week of Prayer were spent in evangelistic services, the pastor, Rev. H. H. Proctor, preaching forcibly and the members doing an unusual amount of personal work. As a result 70 conversions are reported, mostly among men. This may be in part a fruit of the work of the Young Men's League.

ATHENS.—Rev. C. S. Haynes, the pastor, has originated a "covenant praise service," which occurs once a quarter, and includes in its attendance members from every church in the city. It has accomplished much and is largely attended.

MACON has been refreshed by recent evangelistic efforts and is preparing to cancel a long-standing debt. Rev. J. R. McLean is pastor.

Florida.

The Melbourne church is enjoying a special revival season, with the assistance of Rev. William Shaw of Atlanta.

THE INTERIOR.

Ohio.

MARBLEHEAD has been pastorless three years, but life has been maintained by the fidelity of a few devoted Christians. Last October the services of Rev. J. H. Hull of Cleveland were secured for three days of each week. The work was pushed vigorously. Services were held Sunday mornings in the church near Lakeside and evenings here, to accommodate the widely scattered congregation. Two Sunday schools and two Ladies' Aid Societies are flourishing. A Y. P. S. C. E., a Boys' Brigade company and a military company composed of young and middle-aged men, with the pastor as captain, have been organized. The regular meetings have been well attended and deep interest is manifest. At the communion service, Jan. 10, 52 members were added to the church, 39 on confession, which much more than doubled the former membership. The new members are already working.

CLEVELAND.—Union and East Madison Avenue have been assisted in special services by Mr. Charles Frew, a recent graduate of Mr. Moody's Bible Institute. Mr. Frew is himself an active member of the Archwood Avenue Church and was for about 20 years a successful actor, but now gives all his time to religious work with great acceptance.

Illinois.

Dover raised $1,400 last year for all purposes.——Des Plaines shows evidences of progress last year in membership and finances.——The reports of the year in La Harpe give encouragement, home expenses being $1,300, benevolences $55 and accessions 31.——In Wyoming and Ashkum special evangelistic efforts were well favored and resulted successfully.——Naperville had expenses of $4,281 last year, over half of which was for property improvements, and $236 for benevolences.

Indiana.

INDIANAPOLIS.—People's at its annual meeting showed an encouraging condition. The Sunday school has been changed to the morning hour, and the attendance, which was expected to fall off, has been made good. About $2,200 have been raised on the field for all purposes. The house of worship, which was purchased from the Presbyterians, has been repaired in the vestry and new art windows have been put in. The church now has a membership of 230. Rev. O. D. Fisher, the pastor, has also given himself to the development of the new Union Church, a mile distant, preaching there afternoons and conducting the prayer meetings. That work also is in a promising condition ——Plymouth. Mr. H. C. Mabie of the Outlook lectured before the McCulloch Club and a large audience, Jan. 29, upon The Relation of Recent American Literature to Our Social Life.

DUNKIRK is worshiping in its new and tasteful house of worship, although the building is not as yet completely equipped. The dedication will occur in the spring. The S. S. attendance has doubled since services were held in the new building, and the congregations have largely increased over those of the hall. Rev. W. A. Thomas is receiving the cordial support of the community.

TERRE HAUTE.—First gave a welcome reception with a large attendance, Jan. 26, to Rev. C. H. Percival and wife. A cordial spirit was manifested as an auspicious opening of the new pastorate.

Michigan.

OVID is rejoicing in the possession of a good parsonage, situated on one of the finest corner lots of the town. The Ladies' Society has been the moving spirit in the matter, having given $322. The benevolences have advanced considerably.

Rev. Messrs. C. F. Swift, Plymouth Church, Lansing, and A. M. Hyde, First Church, Greenville, are giving their congregations the benefit of a series of sermons which they worked out together on the moral teachings of some of the best books. The discourses are pictorial presentations for Sunday evenings and deal with such books as The Scarlet Letter, Romola, A Singular Life, etc.

Wisconsin.

RHINELANDER.—Rev. J. H. Chandler closes a three years' work in this parish, Feb. 15, to accept a call to Owatonna, Minn. The conditions of the parish have demanded the clearing up of old debts and the opening up of various forms of organized work in a church made up largely of untrained material. It has been almost a necessity, also, to make up for the lack of home influence by special methods that belong to the institutional church. The open church plan was strictly followed for a year, and in a modified form is continued. During the past year services have been maintained in three outstations. The pressure of the work with little vacation has somewhat seriously affected Mr. Chandler's health and made a change imperative.——Rev. G. C. Haun, superintendent of the Sunday school missionary work of the State, has been working for about three weeks in the vicinity of Rhinelander and at two points, North Crandon and Dunbar, eastward on the Soo Railroad, where it is hoped soon to organize churches.

EMERALD GROVE.—Rev. Gideon Hammond, who was dismissed from the pastorate Jan. 29, has been active during the three years of his service in raising money to pay off the debt on the beautiful edifice, which is now free of encumbrance. In order to encourage the people to greater effort, he was content to receive last year, in lieu of his stated salary, the free-will offerings of the people. The church has grown under his pastoral care. The membership is now about 120. In December the church celebrated its semi-centennial. Over 400 members have been received from the beginning. The location is on the famous Rock Prairie, in the midst of a prosperous farming community.

BRODHEAD.—Rev. A. S. Kaye, who completed a successful pastorate of over eight years Jan. 1, was at the time of his resignation the oldest settled pastor in the Beloit Convention. He is now in his new charge in Waverley, Ill., and his successor, Rev. Gideon Hammond, begins Feb. 7.

BELOIT.—Second is preparing for a month of special evangelistic effort, beginning Feb. 7. Cottage prayer meetings are proving helpful. The Men's Sunday Evening Club will co-operate heartily.

Two weeks of special services in Eagle River have resulted encouragingly.——A Business Men's Club has been formed in Tomahawk to assist evening services.——Rev. William Moore of Clinton has recovered his health and is vigorously at work again.——New Richmond's benevolences exceeded last year's by $101.——Special meetings in Ashland last year were aided by Rev. C. C. Campbell.——Washburn has greatly improved its house by adding electric lights and a lecture-room. Provisions have been generously distributed in surrounding districts and in boarding houses.——Spring Green at its annual meeting had good reports and encouragement.

THE WEST.

Missouri.

CARTHAGE.—Evangelistic services in country schoolhouses, conducted by Rev. B. F. Logan (Cumberland Presbyterian), resulted in many conversions. Deeming the Congregational polity best adapted to the needs of the community, he explained it to the people. Mt. Olivet Sunday school of 55 members and the preliminary organization of Mt. Olivet Church with 18 members have resulted. The prospective meeting house will be located about five miles from Carthage, the nearest place in which religious services are held. Mr. Logan will continue in charge of the work.

OLD ORCHARD.—At a recent meeting it was decided to sell for $1,200 the lot on which the church had intended, when the way was open, to erect an edifice. Another site has not yet been fixed upon.

Iowa.

GRANT CENTER.—A church of nine members was organized here Jan. 24. It is the outgrowth of a Sunday school. Supt. C. A. Towle has recently assisted Rev. G. W. Tingle of Rodney in special meetings at Grant Center. This new church is the only one for miles around.

PERKINS, Rev. Abè L. Nutting, pastor, assisted by Rev. W. L. Brandt, held a series of special meetings, in connection with which several persons professed conversion. Mrs. Nutting is now holding meetings at Gaza, where she supplies on alternate Sundays.

DES MOINES.—North Park, Rev. Benjamin St. John, pastor, received 30 members in 1896, but the losses were so heavy that the net gain was only one. Over $500 were given to the various missionary societies, and the home expenses were about $1,800.

Minnesota.

MANKATO.—First. Since the resignation of Rev. F. M. Washburn, Prof. A. H. Pearson of Carleton College, Rev. J. L. Nott and others have supplied the pulpit. An effort is making to secure a pastor. The existence of the Normal School in town makes this an attractive field.——Swedish has had a prosperous year under Rev. E. V. Bjorklund, 28 members having been received. A series of special meetings has been held, and a visit from General Missionary Okerstein was of much service. At the yoked church in Kasota divisions have been healed and the field is prosperous.

NEW ULM.—Reports at the annual meeting showed that $1,650 have been raised during the year for all purposes. Seven new members have been received, and all departments show increased life. A largely attended reception greeted the new pastor, Rev. H. W. Johnson of Washington, D. C.

MONTEVIDEO.—At the annual meeting it was reported that the cost of improvements on church building to the amount of $1,500, with obligations for running expenses, have been met, and $300 have been given to Windom Institute.

MINNEAPOLIS.—The 17 city churches have joined in an invitation to the American Missionary Association to hold its annual meeting here next October.

Kansas.

OSAWATOMIE pays its pastor each month and closed its fiscal year, Jan. 1, without debt. Rev. S. L. Adair, who established the church in 1856 and continued as its pastor till 1891, and who is now in his 86th year, superintends the Sunday school. The pastor, Rev. T. S. Roberts, preaches for the flourishing Indianapolis church in the country, Sunday afternoons.

HILL CITY.—Rev. T. H. Gourley of Lenora is holding union revival services here with a remarkable spiritual awakening. Fifty persons have already professed conversion. Liquor selling is being stopped by the conversion of both sellers and drinkers.

WICHITA.—Plymouth. Thirty-six members were added during 1896, making the present membership 168. The benevolent contributions amounted to $505. Profitable extra meetings were held before and during the Week of Prayer.

Supt. A. S. Bush is making a tour among the pastorless and weak churches of northwestern Kansas, preaching and strengthening the S. S. work. His visits are cordially welcomed. He preached last month in Alton and Almena, Jan. 14, and conducted a short series of meetings in Atwood.

Nebraska.

OMAHA.—First. Though the church was pastorless for the larger part of the year, the reports at the annual meeting were encouraging. The debts had been reduced somewhat. The sums pledged for pew rentals during the evening aggregated $3,000, and it was confidently expected that this amount would be sufficiently increased by persons not in attendance to provide for all current expenses. The board of trustees was reorganized, and active business men formerly connected with it resumed their places, much to the comfort and assurance of the congregation. The pastor, Rev. F. A. Warfield, is steadily increasing his influence, not only among his own people, but throughout the city.——St. Mary's Avenue, Rev. S. W. Butler, pastor, found much encouragement in the review of the year at the annual meeting. The work of the Sunday school has been unusually effective and some old debts have been paid. The Men's Club maintains its high standard, always securing large Sunday evening congregations and helping to furnish music for all the services. The Y. P. S. C. E. continues to aid Parkvale Mission financially, and also is furnishing teachers for the Sunday school.——Plymouth. Twenty persons united during 1896, 15 on confession. Notwithstanding the grave difficulties of the year, all current expenses were reported paid in full. Rev. H. S. MacAyeal is pastor.

MILFORD.—The ordination, Jan. 26, of Mr. G. A Munro was an occasion of deep interest. Coming into the ministry from teaching, he has been pastor here for more than a year, and by his helpful, stimulating sermons, his sympathetic pastoral service and his interest in public affairs has commended himself to all classes. A council was called for his ordination several months since, but unfavorable weather prevented the attendance of a quorum. At this meeting all but one of the churches invited were represented. The examination was interesting and thoroughly satisfactory.

LINCOLN.—Swedish, still worshiping in the basement of the First Church edifice, has been blessed of late with special manifestations of interest. There have been eight or 10 hopeful conversions and four persons have united on confession. Rev. J. M. Tillberg is pastor.

LONG PINE.—Now that the neighboring churches in Holt County have secured a pastor, Mr. J. H. Andress is able to devote his whole time to this field, and there is constantly deepening interest. He will begin special meetings at once without the aid of an evangelist.

PLYMOUTH.—Evangelist T. E. Horton, who was assisting the pastor, Rev. G. J. Battey, on this field, on account of illness was compelled to leave for home. The pastor will continue the work.

North Dakota.

DICKINSON.—Reports at the annual meeting showed that 13 members had been added during 1896, seven on confession. Forty-five entered the Sunday school, making the membership 105. The Ladies' Society raised $425, which was paid on the organ and current expenses. The pastor's salary was paid up to date and all church expenses were met. This has been a difficult field to work up, but success has been attained.

AMENIA, Rev. J. J. Davy, pastor, has progressed during the past year. The meeting house and parsonage have been repainted and other repairs have been made. This church has from the first been self-supporting and has always taken great interest in missionary work. Ten persons have united recently.

GRAND FORKS.—Union meetings are in progress, under the lead of Rev. Alexander Patterwoon. Several hopeful conversions have already occurred, and the interest is deepening.

Rev. U. G. Rich, pastor at Michigan City, is holding special services, in connection with the Methodists, with growing interest.——Evangelist McQuarrie is assisting Rev. G. S. Bascom in revival meetings at Hankinson.

PACIFIC COAST.

California.

SAN FRANCISCO.—Through the efforts of the Bay Conference the Congregationalists have secured one of the finest suites in the Y. M. C. A. Building, to be used as a headquarters. It includes a large assembly room for the meetings of the Monday Club, with smaller rooms to accommodate The Pacific and various benevolent societies. Mr. Caleb Sadler was the efficient chairman of the committee having the matter in charge.——Bethany. Rev. Joe Jet, the Chinaman whose ordination we chronicled last week, is the second ever ordained on the Pacific Coast. The first one, Rev. Jee Gam, extended to him the right hand of fellowship. Mr. Jet has returned to China to superintend the mission work of the Chinese Association.

VENTURA, at its annual meeting, was delighted to find a balance of $46 in the treasury. This was the more gratifying because only four months ago the church was facing a debt of $400. While some gave way to discouragement, the Ladies' Aid Soci-

BELOW ZERO.

Scientists now tell us that the bill of the stork is one long nerve. But then, so is the bill of the plumber. How marvelous are Nature's works!

The best way to keep water pipes from freezing, and so falling into the hands of the plumber, is to supplement the furnace by open fires on the coldest days. The expense of a single water freeze-up will often pay for a complete open fireplace.

You really need some way of re-enforcing the furnace when the mercury drops to zero. Open fires are the easy, economic method. An open fireplace costs just one-half what you expect it will cost. ety bravely attacked the debt and swept it out of existence.

SANTA ROSA, after revising its roll and retiring about 40 persons, has an actual membership of about 90. The new pastor, Rev. L. D. Rathbone, is rapidly winning the confidence of the community.

OAKLAND.—Oak Chapel. The pastor, Mr. J. C. McInnes, reports 12 persons as expressing a purpose to live a new life since the special meetings in connection with the Week of Prayer.

MILLS COLLEGE, for women only, is experiencing a tender and delightful revival spirit. Dr. L. H. Hallock, recently of Tacoma, is the resident pastor.

Oregon.

PORTLAND.—First. Rev. A. W. Ackerman has organized a pastor's class for instruction in denominational and doctrinal matters. It will embrace three grades of students: the unconverted, Christians not yet church members, and communicants who wish guidance as to their duties.

Washington.

COLFAX.—This leading church of Whitman County, Rev. H. P. James, pastor, has closed one of the most prosperous years in its history. Twenty-three persons have united, 15 on confession, making a present membership of 146. All bills were met, the women aiding to the amount of nearly $500. The benevolences amounted to $191.

TACOMA.—First. The special services during the Week of Prayer were continued, there being marked evidence of the presence of the Holy Spirit. A half-hour prayer meeting before the morning service is well attended, and proves useful in preparing hearts to receive the word.

WILL THAT TIME COME?—When a man cares nothing about selection, when a woman would prefer to choose her wood mantel from fifteen patterns instead of from one hundred, then the Paine Furniture Co. will have no special advantage over other stores, except in the matter of price. It is today, however, a great advantage to every one who is purchasing a mantel to be able to visit these great warerooms and see so many styles fully complete and erected. It eliminates all the risk of disappointment in the purchase when the exact result may be seen and studied beforehand.

TWENTY-THREE DOLLARS pays all expenses of a seven-days' tour to Washington. On Feb. 12, March 12 and May 12 the famous Pennsylvania Railroad personally conducted tours to Washington will leave Park Square Station by special cars and Fall River Line. A stop of five hours will be made in Philadelphia on the going trip, affording an opportunity to visit the United States Mint, Independence Hall, where rests carefully guarded the Old Liberty Bell, Carpenters' Hall, and the new City Hall. In Washington tickets include a complete tour of the capital under personal escort, and four and three-fourths days' board at the best hotels in the city. This is a golden opportunity to visit the national capital. The rate is remarkably low, the service perfect, and every detail which an extended experience and a long study of tourists' needs have suggested is arranged to the greatest advantage of the tourist. Persons who prefer to join the tour at New York may do so, purchasing tickets from that city at rate of $19. An additional tour will be run on April 5. For tickets, itineraries and full information apply to D. N. Bell, Tourist Agent, 205 Washington Street, Boston, or address Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

What Doctors Say About Wearing Rubbers

A famous New York doctor, Dr. W. C. Phillips, was lecturing on health. It was a bad night, and he began "How many of you wore rubbers to-night? Hands up. Not half of you. I thought so. Every one of you should have rubbers on a night like this. To go without them, is to invite colds, bronchial trouble, catarrh, or pneumonia."

And every doctor says the same—"wear rubbers."

"CANDEE" RUBBERS

are made by the oldest rubber makers in the world. Every style—Boots, Shoes, Arctics, Gaiters, but only one quality—unvaryingly the first.

CHURCH REMODELING.

THOMAS W. SILLOWAY, Church Architect,
10 Park Square, Boston.

Mr. Silloway's long practice in building or remodeling over 400 church edifices enables him to save and utilize all the valuable parts, and for a comparatively small outlay produce a building preferable to a new one of much greater cost. He proposes to continue the work of remodeling as a specialty, and tenders his services to committees who would practice economy, and where the means are limited.

TEMPERANCE.

—— Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, has established a branch of the Keeley Gold Cure for inebriates.

—— Temperance forces in Minnesota are assaulting the Legislature with appeals for a law permitting county local option.

—— A clergyman died in Boston recently who was driven out of Salem by a mob because he insisted on an enforcement of the prohibitory law then on the statute-books.

—— The British attorney general admits that the sale of liquor in the Parliament Houses at Westminster is illegal, and urges that a special act be passed exempting the legislators from the operation of the licensing and excise laws.

—— The annual report of the Church Temperance Society of New York city, just rendered, gives these interesting statistics:

Consumption of intoxicating liquors in U. S. A., gallons	1,140,764,716
Retail price of liquor consumed	$962,192,852
Cost per capita of population	13.79
Liquor dealers in State of New York	45,057
Number of saloons in city of New York	6,697
Number of bona fide hotels in city of New York	273
Number of "fake" hotels in city of New York	2,105
Number of "bogus" social clubs	1,000

—— Massachusett's Supreme Court decides that the statute limiting liquor licenses to one in every thousand of the population is constitutional. The justification of the decision is stated thus:

> It is too late to question the validity of such statutes. This one does not differ in substance from any statute which forbids the carrying on of a trade or business, or the exercise of a profession, by other than licensed persons. Such statutes are upheld because the resulting exclusion of unlicensed persons is not designed to confer on those who are licensed an exclusive benefit, privilege or right, and where that result does follow it is merely the collateral and incidental effect of provisions enacted solely with a view to secure the welfare of the community. The limitation of the number of licensed places within the territory of a town or city is a reasonable exercise of the police power, and therefore is not in conflict with the Constitution of the Commonwealth or the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

MRS CAROLINE E. MOWRY.

Mrs. Caroline E. Mowry, wife of William A. Mowry, of Hyde Park, Mass., died on Thursday, Jan. 14, in her sixty-second year. The funeral services were at her late home on Monday, the 18th, Dr. A. W. Archibald officiating. The burial was at Swan Point Cemetery, Providence, Dr. J. G Vose, her former pastor, offering the prayer. A large gathering of relatives and friends from Providence, Dorchester, Salem, Worcester and other places assembled at the funeral to testify their respect and love for the deceased.

Mrs. Mowry was a native of Smithfield, R. I. She confessed Christ and united with the Globe Congregational Church in Woonsocket when she was sixteen years old. Her faithful Christian life of forty-five years, as a member of the Globe Church, the Elmwood and Beneficent Churches in Providence, the Second Church, Dorchester, the Tabernacle Church, Salem, and the First Congregational Church, Hyde Park, has been known and read by all who knew her.

A loving wife, a fond mother, a good neighbor, interested in all good work, especially in the more distinctively religious and missionary work of the church, she lived out in her daily life the highest principles of our Christian religion. One who was accustomed to meet her at the woman's meetings writes of her that "the impression received from her in the missionary meetings was that the work was a living heart interest which she never let go for an instant." She was thoroughly familiar with every volume of her complete bound set of Life and Light. One writes of her, "I recall especially her interest in Mrs. Gulick's school and in the work of Dr. Pauline Root."

Her death was without pain and peaceful. She was ready and willing to go. The night before her death she repeated the lines from Montgomery's hymn,

'Tis not the whole of life to live,
Nor all of death to die.

She leaves a husband, three children and two grandchildren. "Her children rise up and call her blessed."

DEAR SIR:—In March last I was suffering from a severe catarrhal cold. My right ear was almost totally deaf, and the ringing in it was exceedingly annoying. I purchased an outfit and commenced its use, continuing through the day as I would have opportunity. About 5 p. m. the congestion in the eustachian tube disappeared, my hearing was fully restored, and I have since had no recurrence. Since then I have, on several occasions, checked and cured bronchial colds, and I have no hesitancy in recommending it. Very truly yours, C. D. LAW.

Guarantee. I will refund the money to all persons purchasing Booth's Pocket Inhaler Outfit anywhere in the United States, during 1897, who will say that HYOMEI has done them no good, on condition that they apply direct to the head office, 23 East 20th Street, New York City. (Signed) R. T. Booth

Hyomei is a purely vegetable antiseptic, and destroys the germs which cause disease in the respiratory organs. The air, charged with Hyomei, is inhaled at the mouth, and, after permeating the minutest air-cells, is exhaled slowly through the nose. It is aromatic, delightful to inhale, and gives immediate relief. It is highly recommended by physicians, clergymen, and thousands who have been helped and cured.

Pocket Inhaler Outfit Complete, by Mail, $1; (for foreign countries add $1.00 postage); outfit consists of pocket inhaler, a bottle of Hyomei, a dropper and directions for using. If you are still skeptical, send your address; my pamphlet shall prove that Hyomei cures. Are you open to conviction? Extra bottles of Hyomei Inhalant by mail, or at druggists, 50 cents. Hyomei Balm for all skin diseases, by mail, 25 cents. Your druggist has Hyomei or can get it for you if you insist. Don't accept a substitute. PROBABLE FRUITS OF RELIEF FOR ORPHANS.

From one of the younger missionaries in the Turkish field we have this letter, dated at Marsovan, Jan. 6:

A recent "underground mail" brought us copies of The Congregationalist from Nov. 12 to 26, in which its plans for the relief of Armenian orphans and their first success were described. I cannot resist writing you a word of warm approval from the region for which the relief is designed. The six massacres in the Marsovan field took the lives of nearly 400 persons. That is less than one per cent. of the Armenians in this field. If twice as many have emigrated since then, the loss of three per cent. of the population is no more than many wars have cost. This is not said to minimize the severity of the awful stroke, but to show that it does not of necessity mean either the destruction or the disintegration of the nation. Since the days when Armenia was a buffer state between Rome and Parthia, buffeted by both, on through all the Mongol and other invasions, the Armenians have lived on the brink of destruction, but God has not suffered them to be destroyed or to wander far from their ancient center of Ararat. I believe God must have kept them for some good purpose, and that we must aid on plans in this line.

There are about 250 widows and 800 orphans in our field. Of the latter sixteen have been placed in the orphanage at Brousa; fifteen girls and five boys are now cared for on our premises and fourteen are supported in the Protestant city schools. We have used up all the resources granted us thus far, and are writing by this mail to Constantinople for a new grant with which we can increase the number under our own care. Anatolia College and our Girls' Boarding School can pretty easily add departments for lower instruction —the orphan boys are now instructed free by advanced students. But we must have additional accommodations, for the schools are now literally overflowing, and you would be surprised to see what steady, sterling school work is being done. This is a supreme moment in evangelical work, for we have the good will of Armenians as never before. "He that soweth and he that reapeth may rejoice together" in fruit gathered unto life eternal. God speed your efforts through The Congregationalist Fund.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

REV. CHARLES C. BRUCE.

The death at Somerville, Jan. 26, of Rev. Charles C. Bruce removes from earth an Amherst graduate of 1875 and a minister who has held pleasant pastoral relations at Rowley, Haydenville, South Deerfield, Amherst and Medford, in this State. He was born in Peterboro, N. H., in 1854, studied theology at Andover, and in 1878 was ordained. For several years past he has not been in good health and has been residing in Somerville.

BUFFALO
LITHIA WATER

Disintegrates, Breaks Down and Eliminates Stone of the Kidneys or Bladder, Both Uric Acid and Phosphatic Formations.

ANALYSIS AND REPORT OF
DR. R. OGDEN DOREMUS,
Professor of Chemistry in the Bellevue Hospital Medical College, New York.

NEW YORK, Dec. 3d, 1896.
E. C. LAIRD, M. D., Resident Physician, Buffalo Lithia Springs, Va.

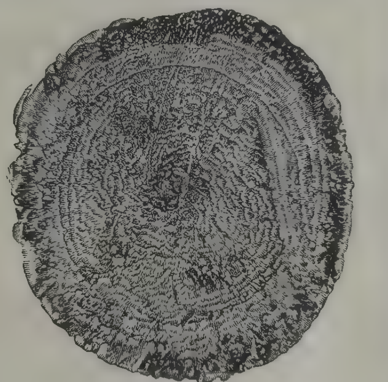
DEAR DOCTOR—I have received the five collections of Disintegrated Calculi, each collection containing a number of fragments, and also the three boxes, each containing a single calculus, mentioned in your letter as discharged by different patients under treatment by the

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER
Spring No. 2.

I have analyzed and photographed parts of each specimen, and designated them alphabetically.

One of the Calculi, from the collection marked "A," was 3 16 of an inch in diameter, of an orange color, and on section exhibited a nucleus, surrounded by nine concentric layers of a crystalline structure, as shown in the accompanying photograph marked "A," magnified 12 diameters.



(Calculi "A" magnified 12 diameters.)

On chemical analysis it was found to consist of Uric Acid (colored by organic substances from the urine), with traces of Ammonium Urate and Calcium Oxalate.

A fragment of a broken down calculus from the same collection was found to consist of Uric Acid.

(Report as to six specimens of Calculi omitted to economize space.)

The contents of the boxes marked C" consisted chiefly of whitish crystalline materials.

On microscopic examination they exhibited well defined prismatic crystals characteristic of "Triple Phosphates," as shown in the accompanying photograph "C," magnified 20 diameters.

On chemical analysis they were found to consist of Magnesium and Ammonium Phosphate (Triple Phosphate), Calcium Phosphate, Calcium Carbonate a trace; Sodium and Potassium Salts in traces, Uric Acid and Urates none. Calcium Oxalate none. Organic debris in considerable quantity, and matters foreign to Calculi

(Collection "C" magnified 20 diameters.)

Yours respectfully,
R. OGDEN DOREMUS.

According to distinguished Medical authority Uric Acid Poisoning shows itself in Gout, Rheumatism, Lithæmia, Stone of the Kidney and Bladder, Bright's Disease of the Kidneys, Herpetiform Neuralgic Affections, Nervous Prostration, Nervous Irritability, Nervous Asthma, Nervous Headache, cases of Mental Depression and in certain forms of Dyspepsia and Eczema.

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER dissolves and washes out of the system Uric Acid Deposit, and is Nature's own specific for these and all troubles of Uric Acid Origin.

Taken as a common beverage or table water it acts as a preventive of Uric Acid Deposit and of the distressing maladies caused by such deposit.

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER is for sale by Grocers and Druggists generally. Pamphlets on application.

DAY OF PRAYER FOR COLLEGES.

AMHERST.

The attendance at the voluntary gathering of students and professors in the morning was unusually large. Chapel exercises were made unusually impressive by earnest words from Dr. Alexander McKenzie, whose hold upon the attention and the hearts of the students is always evident. At the meeting which followed letters were read from some of the older alumni and from the Amherst delegations teaching and studying at Auburn, Andover, Hartford, Harvard and Yale seminaries. Then the three alumni sent from Andover, Hartford and Yale, Messrs. H. H. Loud, H. Schauffler and E. W. Lyman, gave earnest and direct messages to the student body.

For the older alumni within and without the college Prof. John M. Tyler spoke, emphasizing courage and conquest in character. Rev. A. W. Hitchcock of Newburyport spoke of the test which the world brings to men to see if they are in earnest, and Prof. C. E. Garman, always popular but not frequently heard by the general student body, brought the meeting to a close with a simple, plain and inspiring talk directly to the student hearts and lives. His thought was genuineness, and whole-hearted surrender to Jesus Christ. The president spoke earnestly and is evidently eagerly looking for deeper and more devoted Christian life in the college. Class prayer meetings followed this long meeting, and at three o'clock the entire college gathered in the stone church to listen to the sermon by Dr. McKenzie, whose text was, "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." He made plain the drawing power of Christ and held him up before the students as the hope and life of all.

WILLIAMS.

The morning prayer service was admirably conducted by Rev. S. T. Livingston, now instructor in elocution and English in the college. At 11 45, A. M., a prayer meeting was held in the room of the Y. M. C. A., led by Professor Hewitt, who gave an interesting talk on the history and significance of the day. Rev. W. W. Clark, '66, gave some reminiscences of the influence of the day during his college course.

In the afternoon Rev. Dr. P. S. Moxom delivered an excellent sermon to the entire college on the relative values of supreme ends, emphasizing the profound worth of "service to humanity which is service to God." He had a narrow escape from missing his appointment, as his train was delayed by the storm. He entered the chapel as the congregation were singing the last verse of the hymn before the sermon. In the evening a meeting was conducted by the president of the Y. M. C. A., H. M. Briggs, '97. A greeting from the Williams men of the Hartford Theological Seminary was presented by Edwin W. Bishop, '92, and a letter from Auburn Seminary signed by the president and professor of theology, both of the class of '64, and other graduates of the college was read. Rev. W. W. Clark then made an address on the Study of the Bible, and President Carter followed with remarks on the value of prayer in a college student's life. The day was regarded by the active Christians in college as altogether profitable. Mr. Clark remained in town over Sunday to conduct meetings with special reference to Bible study.

WESTERN RESERVE.

Work was suspended in the under-graduate departments of Adelbert College and College for Women. The class prayer meetings were well attended and the general prayer meeting was the largest ever held here. In Adelbert the Very Rev. Dean Williams of Cleveland preached an excellent sermon upon Enrichment of Life. In this sermon especially Dean Williams reminded one of Phillips Brooks. Rev. H. C. Haydn preached at the College for Women upon The Entrance to a Large Life through Allegiance to Principle. A large number of the students of Adelbert College are entering the ministry. The percentage has rapidly increased in recent years. About three-fourths of them are members of churches. Plans for a new building for the Y. M. C. A. are under way. It is expected that the corner stone will be laid at the next Commencement.

OBERLIN.

For some years it has been the custom to have several special religious services during the week in which the Day of Prayer for Colleges occurs. This year Rev. C. W. Carroll, pastor of the Hough Avenue Congregational Church in Cleveland, addressed the students on three evenings. Large audiences were present and the addresses made a deep impression. Mr. Carroll has been asked to give a fourth address this week. On the Day of Prayer at the usual forenoon meeting in the college chapel between 900 and 1,000 students were present, although attendance is not compulsory. The meeting is the most significant religious occasion of the college year, often being marked by conversions or by the choice of some form of Christian service as a life work. The meeting this year seemed to reveal an unusual amount of interest. About four-fifths of the men in the college classes are Christians, and a somewhat larger proportion of the whole membership of these classes including the women.

BELOIT.

The students held largely attended prayer meetings at nine in the morning and again in the afternoon. The sermon before the whole college was preached by Rev. J. L. Withrow, D. D. Its theme was The Conversion of Paul, and the idea of personal devotion to Christ, thus brought out, was the key-note of the day. At the afternoon meeting it found expresssion in personal testimony that bespoke a deepened spirit of loyalty to the Master in the earnest inquiry, "Lord, what wilt though have me to do?" and in words from voices not heard in these meetings before. Altogether it was a day of marked power and helpfulness.

YANKTON.

Despite the severe cold the Day of Prayer was observed in a helpful way. The Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. had a union prayer meeting at 7 A. M. Rev. G. R. Merrill, D.D., of Minneapolis preached in the forenoon an inspiring sermon from John 1: 42, "Thou shalt be called Cephas," Christ's appeal to the noblest ideals of life. The sermon was followed by a testimony and consecration service led by various members of the faculty. In the evening Dr. Merrill gave an address at the Congregational church upon A Method in Bible Study.

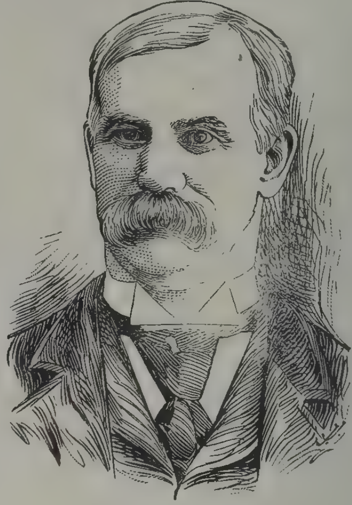
Quackery is always discovering remedies which will act upon the germs of disease directly and kill them. But no discovery has ever yet been approved by doctors which will cure consumption that way. Germs can only be killed by making the body strong enough to overcome them, and the early use of such a remedy as Scott's Emulsion is one of the helps. In the daily warfare man keeps up, he wins best, who is provided with the needed strength, such as Scott's Emulsion supplies.

BROKEN DOWN IN HEALTH.

Shouts to Whole World His Cure By Dr. Greene's Nervura.

Andrew H. Olney, Gibson, N. Y., says:—"I was broken down with nervous and physical prostration, before using Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy, and life was a burden. Now life is a joy and sleep is a luxury compared to it before taking Nervura.



ANDREW H. OLNEY, ESQ.

"I wish I could shout loud enough so all the world could hear, and tell them the good this wonderful medicine has done for me. It has made me from a weak, trembling, nervous, irritable man, to one who feels he is on the highway to long years of health and happiness through Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy."

If constipated, use Dr. Greene's Cathartic Pills with the Nervura.

Dr. Greene, 34 Temple Place, Boston, Mass., the most successful physician in curing nervous and chronic diseases, can be consulted free, personally or by letter.

ELSEWHERE.

At Mt. Holyoke College the raging storm interfered sadly with the scheduled program. Since the fire the girls have been scattered in the homes of the village and the distance of many of them from the church, where the larger gatherings of the student body are now held, prevented their assembling. Rev. F. L. Goodspeed of Springfield, who was to have preached, will have a sermon all ready for another year.——At Smith the preacher was Professor Frink of Amherst College, whose text was, "This one thing I do." He emphasized the subordination of one's whole life to the mastery of Christ. At morning chapel President Seelye and Professors Wood and Tyler spoke helpfully, and their words left a deep impression upon many hearts.——At Wellesley the preacher was Rev. Charles Cuthbert Hall, D. D., of Brooklyn, recently elected president of Union Seminary. He spent last Sunday at the college.——Auburn Seminary made something of a departure this year by holding a conference on Christian work, in which such prominent ministers as Rev. Milton Merle Smith, D. D., and Rev. John R. Davis, D. D., of New York city, and Rev. William R. Taylor, D. D., of Rochester, participated.

Dr. Donald of Trinity Church, Boston, addressed the students of the University of Chicago, where four meetings were held simultaneously in the morning, a general meeting in the afternoon and a meeting of divinity students.——In Chicago Seminary members of the different classes met in the morning, and at 3 P. M. a general gathering of the students listened to reports from thirty colleges represented in the seminary. Contrary to custom, reports from State universities were given and were as encouraging as any. The meeting was one of the best for years.——At Fargo Rev. E. P. Ingersoll, D. D., of St. Paul spoke twice.

WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING.

CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, JAN. 29.

Thursday's snowstorm had so retarded transportation about the city and from the suburbs Friday morning that the hour from eleven to twelve found only about a third of the usual number in Pilgrim Hall, but enough for a good meeting. Mrs. G. W. Pierce read about the murmuring Israelites in their journeyings, who, after the report of the spies, feared to enter the promised land, looking at the man-side rather than the God-side of things. She suggested many useful lessons to be learned from their experience, notably that because of unbelief we often fail to grasp God's promises.

Several ladies reported from their auxiliaries increasing interest, Mrs. Judson Smith especially recommending a leaflet just published by the Board, Paragraphs on Progress, by Mrs. C. H. Daniels, and Miss Child giving encouraging facts with regard to receipts since the annual meeting.

Miss Ellen M. Stone added a second chapter to her interesting address of the previous Friday upon Bulgaria, speaking somewhat in detail of the missionary women, each with her own work, and giving some pleasant hints of individual adaptation and power, one making good use of her previous knowledge of Turkish acquired in Brousa; mother hearts yearning for the children who have come to America; one in her free hospitality accustomed to say, "There is always room for three," a tender allusion to her own three far away; another, "worth her weight in gold," whether she stays in her own home or tours, or prescribes for the sick; while Miss Cole and Miss Matthews, the latter having recently returned, together care for the girls' school in Monastir. In addition to sympathy and prayer for individuals and special work, Miss Stone urged prayer for the government and people, and that all advance may be in the right direction, believing that, "Those who honor God the most are those who go forward and make ventures."

HOW TO VISIT CALIFORNIA.—Since the inauguration of personally conducted tours, railroad travel has been revolutionized. Forty years ago a vestibule train in charge of a tourist agent and chaperon, and equipped with a barber, bath apartments and a ladies' maid, could hardly have been imagined. Yet such progress has been made, and the special Pullman train used by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company on its Golden Gate tours is a veritable hotel on wheels. It is lighted by electricity and heated by steam, and affords all the comforts of a parlor, club-room or private boudoir. The first tour to California will leave Boston Jan. 26, 1897. Space for this tour is being rapidly engaged, the low rate of $315 from Boston placing it within the reach of all. The second tour will leave Feb. 23; $355 from Boston. The last tour will leave March 26; 220. Application for itinerary, detailed information and space should be made to Tourist Agent, 205 Washington Street, Boston, or George W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

BLINDNESS PREVENTED.

THE ABSORPTION TREATMENT A SUCCESS.

NO MORE WAITING TO BE BLIND.

THE New York Observer says: "In the absorption treatment we find the most successful and humane method of treating diseased eyes or weakened vision ever devised. It is a boon to suffering humanity, hundreds having been successfully treated at the Bemis Sanitarium for diseases of the eyes often said to be incurable without the knife or risk; and as the treatment assists nature to do its own work without the use of drugs, the patients feel that a new lease of life as well as eyesight has been given them. Among the grateful patients we find Rev. B. N. Palmer, D. D., of New Orleans, La., well known to our readers. Dr. Palmer, some two years ago, noticed his eyesight failing, and consulted Dr. Knapp of New York and Dr. Pope of New Orleans, who diagnosed the case as atrophy. After being under treatment one year, they pronounced his case hopeless, and further treatment was abandoned. On July 24, 1896, one eye being nearly sightless and the other failing, he consulted E. H. Bemis, eye specialist of the Glens Falls, N. Y., Sanitarium, remarking that he had 'nothing to lose and a great deal to gain,' as cataracts were forming which would make blindness sure, and the little sight left was only available with the aid of a strong magnifying-glass. On Sept. 7, six weeks after commencing the absorption treatment, the strong lens had been laid aside, and the glasses discarded years ago now enable him to read again, to the great surprise of himself and friends."

The following is an extract of a letter from Dr. Palmer to an investigator regarding the above treatment: "Almost by every mail I receive letters of inquiry as to my experience of the treatment of my eyes. His theory is rational, based upon the self-restoring power of nature herself. Medicine cures only by rousing a peccant organ to the performance of its duty, when disease is thrown off and the patient recovers. The eye, he thinks, should form no exception. His aim, therefore, is to stimulate the eye, promote its secretions and increase the circulation; thus revitalizing the eye and enabling it to fulfill its functions, it throws off all the troubles and repairs its own waste. His method is simple, safe, in no way unpleasant, without disfigurement."

In order to bring before the public the advantages of the absorption treatment, which does away with all risk in treating the eyes, and furnishes a home treatment which can be safely used at the patient's home when it is impossible to visit the sanitarium, we would state that a valuable pamphlet will be forwarded to any address free, and should be read in every family, as it gives the cause of failing eyesight and diseased eyes, how prevented and cured. The rapid increase in the number of persons who are becoming blind and relying upon artificial aids to see demands a treatment which will reach the cause.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

Most centers report a quiet and listless condition of affairs. Notwithstanding this, the idea is still fondly cherished that spring will see a more active inquiry and movement for general merchandise.

As yet, the curtailment of the production of cotton goods has not strengthened the market for these goods, although it is confidently expected to do so. The wool and woolen goods situation keeps improving in marked contrast with the cotton manufacturing industry. Up to last Saturday the sales of wool at Boston since Jan. 1 aggregated 40,000,000 pounds, as compared with 24,000,000 pounds during the same period last year. Several more woolen mills have also started up and altogether there is a better feeling. The large purchases of wool are probably due to the desire to anticipate a higher duty on this staple.

In iron and steel the situation is most unsatisfactory. The demand is not only very slack, but prices are by no means steady. The large wheat exports continue, and the shipments of corn to foreign countries are very heavy, as they have been for some time past. Bank clearings in the United States last week aggregated $1,047,000,000, an increase of nine per cent. over the previous week, and four per cent. more than the same week last year. Much of the increase of nine per cent. was due to the clearing weather, the storm of the previous week having materially retarded business.

In speculative circles there is absolutely no excitement and but little interest shown.

The world would be greatly transformed and much more easy to live in if everybody limited his acquisitions to his ability to assimilate them to his life.—C. D. Warner.

The governor of Indiana expresses the truth of the matter when he says:

> I regard the act of legalizing prize fighting in Nevada as being not only unpardonably pernicious, but utterly iniquitous and monstrous. Under the most favorable circumstances, the prize-ring has always been the resort of lawbreakers and ruffians, as a rule, and the startling intelligence that one of the States, dignified by a place in the Union, has deliberately entered into copartnership with professional promoters of public exhibitions of unspeakable brutality, and prostituted its power in aid of undisguised lawlessness, presents a phase of degradation that must necessarily be regarded as a crime against society, and such a distinct reproach to our boasted civilization that the effect cannot be otherwise than to condemn us as a people by thus offending the moral sentiment and provoking the righteous criticism of the enlightened nations of the globe.

WHERE HISTORY IS BEING MADE.—The attention of the whole country at the present time is turned toward the national Capitol where so many questions of great public interest are being debated by both houses of Congress. The personally conducted tours operated under the management of the Royal Blue Line afford an opportunity for every one to visit Washington under the most favorable conditions and at a minimum of expense. The parties start Tuesday, Feb. 16, Thursday, March 18, Friday, April 2, and Tuesday, May 4. The rate of $27.00 from Boston pays for transportation for the round trip, staterooms, meals en route, transfers, five days at the Riggs House, Ebbitt House or Willard's, side trip to Alexandria and Mount Vernon, a stop at Philadelphia and privilege of stop over in New York as long as desired. Rates in proportion are made from other points in New England. Although the rate is low the accommodations are absolutely first class and the managers cater to the best people. A special "Inauguration Tour" has been arranged for March 2, and two tours to Old Point Comfort and Washington will leave March 26 and April 20. Illustrated itinerary and further information can be obtained from A. J. Simmons, N. E. A., 211 Washington Street, Boston.

DELIGHTFUL MEXICAN TOUR.—Mexico, with its grand natural scenery, its semi-tropical climate, its interesting history and its strange civilization, is a most attractive region for tourists. The sights of that remarkable country can be seen to the best possible advantage in connection with Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb's excursions. Those enterprising tourist managers are forming a party to leave Boston Feb. 25. The travelers will stop at various places in the Southern States, and in Mexico visit a dozen or more of the principal cities, spending a week in the city of Mexico, and making trips down into the tropics over both the Tampico and the Vera Cruz lines. On the return California is to be visited. The entire journey will be made in a vestibuled train with a dining car, and only a limited number of passengers will be taken. An interesting guide to Mexico, with a full description of the tour, will be sent by Raymond & Whitcomb, 296 Washington Street, Boston, to any address, on application.

TWENTY-THREE DOLLARS pays all expenses of a seven-days' tour to Washington. On Feb. 12, March 12 and May 12 the famous Pennsylvania Railroad personally conducted tours to Washington will leave Park Square Station by special cars and Fall River Line. A stop of five hours will be made in Philadelphia on the going trip, affording an opportunity to visit the United States Mint, Independence Hall, where rests carefully guarded the Old Liberty Bell, Carpenters' Hall, and the new City Hall. In Washington tickets include a complete tour of the capital under personal escort, and four and three-fourths days' board at the best hotels in the city. This is a golden opportunity to visit the national capital. The rate is remarkably low, the service perfect, and every detail which an extended experience and a long study of tourists' needs have suggested is arranged to the greatest advantage of the tourist. Persons who prefer to join the tour at New York may do so, purchasing tickets from that city at rate of $19. An additional tour will be run on April 5. For tickets, itineraries and full information apply to D. N. Bell, Tourist Agent, 205 Washington Street, Boston, or address Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

ILLUSTRATED BIBLE TREASURY.

Illustrations of Ancient Monuments, Scenes in Bible Lands, Animals, Plants, Antiquities, Coins, etc., to the number of 350 are distributed through the text of the Helps.

"THE ILLUSTRATED BIBLE TREASURY. There is no book like this. Its aim is to place the student in the age and atmosphere when each book of the Bible was written, to enable the reader to study the book amid its surroundings and to become permeated with its life. The writers who have combined to make the volume are among the most celebrated Bible students, scholars, Egyptologists and divines of Great Britain and America. . . . The book contains helps to the study of the Old and New Testaments, with an analysis of the books and articles on the Canon, Monumental Testimony, etc., a series of articles on History, Chronology, Geography and Bible Science; notes on Bible antiquities, Jewish worship and sects—a carefully compiled concordance with a Bible atlas. More than three hundred and fifty illustrations accompany the text, and all of them are of value to the students of the Bible. They are not pictures so much as guides and expositors in the Holy Word. The teacher who has this treasury will be able to bring forth things new and old for doctrine, for reproof, for instruction in righteousness, to answer objections, refute arguments, and uphold the truth of God. Such a book demands attentive study and rewards it. It is a result of ripe learning consecrated to the best of uses and will be of great service to those who read and teach the word of God. This treasury will be bound with several new editions of the Bible, which will make it of special value and convenience."—New York Observer, December 31, 1896.

GERMAN Protestants have reason to be proud of the great names which stand at the beginning of their history. They celebrated the 400th anniversary of Luther's birth in 1883 with much enthusiasm, and similar commemorations of the birth of Melanchthon follow a like anniversary on the sixteenth of the present month. We print elsewhere a sketch of his life and character which touch our modern thought at many points. If the popular opinion assigns to the masterful genius of Luther a greater place and fame, the sober second thought of students agrees that Melanchthon's wide learning and cautious, irenic spirit were almost equally necessary to the permanence of the influence of the Reformation. In his willingness to make concessions on all but vital points, in his testimony to the points which are vital to an evangelical Christianity, in loyalty to the truth against the current of his own inclination, and in his purity and simplicity of thought and character, he was an inspiration and example to the whole church. The study and commemoration of his life work cannot fail to be a help in the effort to quicken the spiritual life of Germany and the churches of German ancestry in America.

That the evangelical churches in and about Boston are gaining on the population seems to be proved by statistics recently gathered by the Boston Congregational Church Union. In 1871 what is now known as the Metropolitan Water District had a population of 495,596, in 1895, 977,583. This was a gain of 97 per cent. But during the same period Baptists advanced 110 per cent., Congregationalists 95 per cent., Episcopalians 122 per cent., and Methodists 107 per cent. For the last ten years the figures are equally encouraging. Not all the Christianity in the world is found within the churches, but their growth is a pretty good indication of how much progress evangelical religion has made in the community. No doubt in the last quarter of a century there has been a relaxation in the tests for church membership, but we should not be willing to affirm that it has resulted in any lowering of the general average of Christian living among the professors of religion.

It looks as if the next three weeks would witness a vast deal of activity in behalf of Mt. Holyoke College. Much of the effort will be focused upon securing a proper observance of Mary Lyon Sunday, Feb. 28, which marks her 100th birthday. But the thought of many public occasions will be turned in the direction of the noble mother of women's colleges. The Chicago Congregational Club at its woman's night, Feb. 22, will give special attention to Mary Lyon and her school. That the college is not without honor in its own locality is shown by the ardor with which the Connecticut Valley Congregational Club and the Franklin County Association of Congregational ministers have enlisted in the present movement, which we shall hope to forward by special articles in our paper next week. We know of no college which has so great and so just a claim upon the Christian public irrespective of denominational distinctions. The Valley Club, by circular letter, pertinently suggests to every Congregational pastor in Massachusetts the peculiar fitness of preaching, on Feb. 28, a sermon on the higher education of women.

The question of employing evangelists is at this time before many churches. Where it is decided to do this it will promote the peace of the community after the evangelist has departed if the money to pay expenses is secured before contracts are made. Finance committees, where union meetings are held, often have hard tasks and sometimes say hard things. Unexpected bills are apt to come in much oftener than expected contributions. Buffalo is furnishing an instance in point. Last April Rev. B. Fay Mills conducted a series of meetings there in which many of the churches joined. The committee has just published a statement of its failure to meet all the obligations incurred, which is not at all complimentary to some of the pastors and churches. The committee says:

> It seemed as though the nearer settling day came the more pronounced was the opposition to the meetings. The pastor of one church, after making an ante-mortem, doctrinal, microscopic examination of Mr. Mills, thought he discovered about the time his church would be called upon for the insignificant sum of $25 that he was a shade out of the way on the question of the atonement, which released him from any financial obligation. The pastors of other churches, evincing a complete and determined misconception of the purpose of the meetings, publicly denounced Mr. Mills's methods. A large down-town church was prominently represented throughout the meetings and had the assurance to advertise their continuance at its own church, yet from it the munificent sum of $5 51 only was received.

One church, where several meetings were held, charged $330 for the use of its edifice. Another, near by, where three meetings were held, charged only $10. The committee's comments on the contrast are not likely to promote Christian fellowship. It should be added that Mr. Mills is not in any way connected with the trouble and has made no complaint concerning the remuneration he received, which is said to have been very small. The lesson to be learned is to provide for financial necessities first in evangelistic meetings, which will go far to promote spiritual results afterwards.

What better way of promoting an interest in foreign missions can be found by an individual church than to contribute one of its members to the foreign field? Our Chicago letter tells of the effect produced upon a great church in that city by the action of one of its choicest young women, who bears an honored name. In these days, when so many nearer causes side-track the foreign missionary movement, there is nothing so sure to bring it back to its rightful prominence as the gift of a son or a daughter to Africa, India, China or Japan. If, in addition, the support of its child can be guaranteed by the church, it has put itself in the most vital and helpful relations to foreign missions. We believe such a connection of many individual churches with individual foreign missionaries would do much toward imparting concreteness and enthusiasm to the work of discipling the nations.

The frank adjustment to present conditions of the many people who have found themselves unable because of hard times to maintain their former position in society is one of the hopeful indications of returning prosperity. Those are most fortunate who earliest accepted the situation, and as soon as they found their income cut down refused to run into debt and set about openly to live within their means. But a large number who were not courageous enough to do this at first now find it harder to undertake the inevitable task, yet they are doing it. A Western pastor writes us: "Clear-headed ministers in this region agree that their people are at last learning the lesson of the hard times. They are giving up their pride and hardness and becoming more humble. For instance, in my own church there have been various families who used to be well off and prominent in society, but since losing their property they have been unwilling to attend church on account of pride. They could not wear as fine clothes as formerly or give as much as others were giving, and so they stayed away. But of late I have seen them in the pews, apparently determined to take their places in church life again. This, we think, is to some extent the case the country over. If so, we feel that there are better prospects for a return of prosperity than during the past three years. Such a spirit is a better advance agent of good times than any man from Ohio can be." The same lesson has had to be learned by many men in readjusting their business. It must be learned by all our benevolent societies, our colleges and churches; and, when learned, it may prove to be worth all it has cost for tuition.

MR. MOODY AT SIXTY.

No one could hear Mr. Moody's impassioned words at the close of his address to the great audience of Christian Endeavorers in Mechanics Hall last Thursday evening without gaining an added respect for the man. It was the eve of his sixtieth birthday, and its nearness led him to speak most tender and touching words concerning himself. He could not disclose all the feelings that were sweeping through his heart, but it was plain that the solemnity of the passing years, the realization that the time is short and the sense of accountability to God for the decade on which he is now entering moved him powerfully. He had been but a poor witness to God, he confessed, in the threescore years that had fled, but he besought the prayers of all present that he might preach better and live better in the years during which God might yet spare him.

It is an interesting, though perhaps undesigned coincidence, that his sixtieth birthday should find Mr. Moody holding meetings in this city where, as he puts it, "God first found him," and where the associations reminding him of the early days of his Christian faith and service are so many and so precious. It is certainly fitting that here, where he was born again, he should be made the recipient of the testimonial of $30,000 that friends of his on both sides the Atlantic have raised to signalize his sixtieth birthday. The gift is not an honorarium to the evangelist, but a contribution to the educational work so dear to him, and it will be used for the erection of a chapel for his Mount Hermon students.

Mr. Moody's presence in Boston for the last five weeks has raised some questions with reference to the relation of evangelism to the regular activities of the church. Certain individual utterances of his have been criticised as unwise and untrue. We have heard it said that he was losing the sunniness of his disposition, that his gospel today is not the gracious, winsome message that it used to be, that he is dwelling in his thought closer to Sinai than to Calvary. But in all this time we have heard nothing that impugns in the slightest his deep sincerity. If it were ever challenged there would come, we believe, from the reporters beneath his platform, out far beyond the bound of the audiences that assemble to hear him, from the club houses, the fashionable circles, the homes of the high and the lowly, the shops and the factories, one emphatic chorus of assent to the purity of Mr. Moody's motives and the integrity of his life. One who knows Dwight L. Moody cannot but believe that he lives close to God, that his one ambition is to be used of God. Joined to this singleness of purpose is a humility rare in men of his class, rare in one who has been honored so conspicuously in two continents. The entire absence of cant and sham from Mr. Moody's make-up, his downright common sense and rugged directness contribute greatly to his power and usefulness.

Much of the criticism which Mr. Moody encounters ignores the fact that God does not combine in a single character all the graces and the virtues that mark the perfect man. Not what Mr. Moody is not, but what he is should be the basis on which he is judged. No one is obliged to accept all his views of the authority and interpretation of the Scriptures. So far as we understand them, some of them do not commend themselves to the intelligence of the church today, nor are they the views which the majority of his own Northfield and Mt. Hermon students are likely to accept as they come in contact with the educational processes of our time. That he should insist on his own views is to be expected of a man of such downright earnestness and positiveness. But we are not to suppose he would deny to others the privilege of scholarly research or the right to exercise conscientious judgment concerning the Bible. Why, again, should we complain because Mr. Moody seems to ignore certain wide fields of human life, certain legitimate regions of thought and interest? There will always be plenty of guides competent to conduct us into the inviting region of literature and of art, but this age has not a superabundance of men possessing the prophet's touch with God and able to lead multitudes of men to a larger knowledge of God. If Mr. Moody speaks without due discrimination concerning the lives and examples of church members, we may remember that the man who is tremendously in earnest does not always stop to weigh his words. The church is not invulnerable. Modern Christianity has its weak spots. It is always in order to tell Christians to be better. If Mr. Moody's way produces genuine repentance and reconsecration of life and a better type of Christian living throughout all our churches, then he is speaking the message which we all need to hear.

At any rate, those who pride themselves on their breadth ought not to find it difficult to make room in their fellowship for D. L. Moody. No man covets more the sympathy and co-operation of all who call themselves followers of his Lord. At the beginning of what may be his last decade of service he seeks earnestly the prayers of all his fellow-believers. That God has done a marvelous work through him in his forty years of unwearying Christian service is as plain as the record of the Apostle Paul. That God has yet much more for him to do we hope and believe. And we voice the desires of multitudes of Christian people everywhere when we say, God bless Mr. Moody as he passes this memorable milestone in his life.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

One of the best of the many biographies of this "the most individual man who ever lived," "the very homeliness of his genius being its distinction," closes with the exhortation that a niche be found for him in the Pantheon of the world's heroes. "There let him remain forever, lonely, as in his strange lifetime, impressive, mysterious, unmeasured and unsolved."

Fortunately men are not so minded. Neither the scholarly few, the intelligent many, nor the aspiring multitude are content to have the deeds or words of Lincoln relegated to the realm of mythology. Everything is conspiring to bring his very word, act and portrait to the light, and in his case, as with the Bible characters, the scrutiny of criticism is enhancing rather than diminishing the rank of the man and the value of his message, especially to every American citizen and believer in democracy.

What, then, was that message, and has it lost its pertinence for us who are a generation removed from the desperate but victorious grapple of the nation with foes within? No. Foes change, but evil and enmities abide. Hence it will never become untimely or unwise to resolve "that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people and for the people shall not perish from the earth." Once the resolve is made, in what spirit shall it be executed if not "with malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right"?

Today we see government by bosses, not by the people, in several of the oldest commonwealths of the land. Today we see selfish capital and selfish labor warring against society and each other. Today we also see sectional strife arising, with a new alignment but full of the old spirit of enmity born of ignorance, prejudice and selfishness. Conservative and radical differ in their diagnosis of the disease and their prescription of the remedy, but agree that the patient is ill. Who will lead us to more healthful ways of living? The man who knows, trusts, confides in the common people, as Lincoln did, and emulates his marvelous patience and statesmanlike opportunism.

Lincoln was born Feb. 12, 1809. Let private citizens, public officials and all men who have civic responsibilities celebrate the anniversary of his birth as becometh men to whom God has given for an ensample the witness of a life full of tenderness, courage and self-sacrifice.

A NEW MOVEMENT IN THE CHURCH.

It has not yet appeared, it is only anticipated. But it is sure to come. At present the church is subdivided into societies to a greater extent than ever before. Almost every conceivable business belonging to it is in the hands of a club or a committee. Church calendars present at least a page of officered organizations, whose meetings have become so numerous that a printed weekly bulletin has become a necessity. We know of one medium sized church which has three temperance societies, with regular meetings, while the subject is a frequent topic of discussion in several of the others. Maintaining these meetings, whose attendance seldom exceeds a dozen in each, constitutes the "work" of their members. The same persons have been faithful attendants for years and their main reliance seems to be on the prayers, one or more being offered at each meeting.

Often only a nominal relation is maintained between these sects of our divided churches. No one except the pastor is acquainted with them all. Each glories in its efforts to maintain its own meetings. Sometimes one organization assumes the duty of investigating some of the others. In a Boston C. E. Society recently a motion to send a committee to the church prayer meeting was seriously discussed. Almost every sort of duty which used to devolve on individuals is now placed in the hands of committees, and personal responsibility, except to attend meetings, is reduced to a minimum.

The new movement will consist in bringing the church together and directing its united energies to practical ends. Some one will conceive a reasonable plan for the federation of the societies of the local church. At present the time spent in attending meetings is out of all proportion to the work accomplished. The complicated machinery of the church grinds itself out. There is little except chaff in the hoppers. There is a great whirr while the chaff runs through, but when it is found to have been but little changed in the process the motive which runs the machinery flags. The whole church acting together would generate a new enthusiasm. The elders would be inspired by the presence of young people in the prayer meeting, and they, in turn, would find something in the larger experience of maturer minds which they now miss. Contributions would grow by being taken together. Fewer societies would do more work by creating a larger sense of individual responsibility and a deeper consciousness of mutual support. The enthusiasm of the united church will some day be a surprise to itself, and its influence will be multiplied in the community.

It would not be strange, either, if a similar movement should make itself felt in the denomination by a closer federation, at least, of our missionary societies. When it comes to be realized that their business is one, and that its economical administration and successful results depend largely on some real and right relation of each department to the others, the churches will know more about their missionary work for the world and will feel more deeply their responsibility for carrying it forward.

Many organizations in one body make the appearance of busy but superficial activity. Unity in spirit and in action, a united sense of responsibility and call to duty, promote deep spirituality. This generation has carried division of life and labor in the church to an extreme. When the reaction comes united enthusiasm will develop devotion and power as yet unknown.

WHAT MAKES LIFE WORTH LIVING.

Some years ago a production by an English author appeared entitled Is Life Worth Living? It has caused wide and somewhat prolonged comment and not a few persons have argued more or less earnestly that life is not worth living. One feature of the discussion has been noteworthy. Those who have answered the question in the affirmative have not all been Christians but, so far as we can recall, all Christians who have discussed it have taken the affirmative with emphasis. He must have had a very sad and peculiar experience who has maturely determined that life is not worth living, in spite of its inevitable distresses of many sorts. But to a Christian believer there can be only one answer to such a question. Life is abundantly worth living.

Were it not for what God has revealed about himself, it would not be strange that the perplexities and cares, the sufferings, sins and sorrows of human life sometimes should cause many to dispute the worth of the privilege of life. Some people do seem to have little but misery here. But because God has revealed so much concerning himself, because he has made known his love, his justice, his grace, because he has sent Jesus Christ to redeem us and be our example, and because he has declared that this life is not the whole of life, or even its more enduring portion, but only the preparation for and introduction to the eternal life which awaits us hereafter, it is indeed short sighted to assume that life is not worth living.

We are to look at life as God looks at it. That means that we are to put faith bravely in him. We cannot yet understand the mysteries of our existence as he understands them, but we can refuse to allow them to dishearten us. When we come to look back upon them from the other world, doubtless we shall see that they were ordered for us in wisdom and kindness, and that we should have been far worse off without them. One object of them certainly is to give opportunity for the exercise of that simple faith, the vital importance of which we even now can comprehend in a large degree. Were there no need of faith, our souls would wither instead of expanding.

We have made no mention of the positive and countless joys which enrich most of our lives, even at their worst. They may not be overlooked. But, even apart from them, faith in God and the assurance of its future fruition in bright, eternal peace and reward are enough to render any life well worth living.

CURRENT HISTORY.

The Arbitration Treaty.

One has but to scan such a symposium on the treaty as The Critic published last week to see how men of highest character and patriotism differ. Rev. Dr. Joseph H. Twichell of Hartford defends delay, urges scrutiny of every section of the treaty and refuses to believe that the senators will procrastinate or reject from unworthy motives. Bishop Potter and Dr. Henry J. van Dyke intimate that they distrust the Senate and condemn it for having less wisdom than the people. There is a criticism of public men which can do more evil than good, and it is a grave charge one makes when he asserts that the Senate at any time has lost touch with the people, and yet it cannot be denied that the framers of the Constitution intended that now and then it should do so in order that a check might be put upon popular frenzy. There are men in the Senate whose vote to reject or emasculate the treaty will inevitably lead their constituents and the public at large to believe and assert that they have acted from base motives. Their characters and their past actions will warrant such judgment. There are others who, if they vote to reject the treaty or if they vote to amend it in important particulars, will be understood to do it from the purest motives and in accordance with the best light they have. There are others who, whatever they do, will be understood to be acting from mixed motives, partly good and partly bad, and the constituent or the editor attempting to pass judgment upon them will do well if he detects the dominating impulse.

That many of the worthiest men in public life hesitate before they enter upon an agreement with Great Britain, however worthy its object, is due to their reading of history and their knowledge of affairs abroad today. They cannot help distrusting the Power which is so "earth hungry" and so indifferent to moral obligations when the interests of its investors and traders are concerned. Hence, if for a variety of reasons, some defensible and some indefensible, the treaty is delayed or found defective, it will not be solely or even partially because the arbitration principle is distasteful to our legislators or to our people, but because sins of the past and present, personal and national, prevent that perfect harmony of thought and action which in a more righteous world would obtain. The full text of the treaty was laid before the British Parliament last week, and on Monday of this week Senator Sherman reported the treaty with amendments to the Senate. It was discussed in executive session, some of the best friends of the treaty joining with its foes in defeating Senator Hill's motion that it be debated in open session.

Anglo-Venezuelan Arbitration.

Unless the legislature of Venezuela rejects the treaty signed last week in Washington by Sir Julian Pauncefote for Great Britain and by Señor Andrade for Venezuela, which action is altogether unlikely, within a few months Rt. Hon. Baron Herschell and Sir Richard H. Collins, representing Great Britain, and Chief-Justice Fuller and Justice Brewer of the United States Supreme Court, representing Venezuela, with a fifth jurist to be selected by them, will meet in Paris to determine the boundary line between the colony of British Guiana and the United States of Venezuela. Their verdict, based on facts, principles of international law and a few special rules, will be final. Thus will pass into the realm of arbitrament, through judicial investigation, a question which has long severed diplomatic intercourse between Great Britain and Venezuela; which we, in obedience to impulses of the highest nature, endeavored to settle by friendly counsel and, failing in this, used language which was stern and unmistakable. The special commission appointed by President Cleveland will never be called upon to formulate its verdict, but all the exceedingly valuable data which it collected will be at the service of the counsel who will appear before the arbitration tribunal. It seems to us that Great Britain, by agreeing to this compact, has recognized the tenability and force of the Monroe Doctrine as unequivocally as could be desired. Whatever may be the fate of the general arbitration treaty, the ratification of this compact will ever redound to the honor of all concerned, whether the officials who negotiated and drafted it or the people of Great Britain and the United States who decreed, by unmistakable signs, that such a method must prevail, the idea of Anglo-American war over a South American boundary line dispute being intolerable to contemplate.

Official Malfeasance.

This term but mildly describes the act of the young college bred Republican governor of New York State, who last week, in defiance of public sentiment and the counsel of his shrewdest partisan advisers, appointed as superintendent of the State Insurance Department, with its immense patronage and opportunity for blackmail, a man whose crooked record as a lobbyist has been determined by legislative investigation, and whose reputation as a servile partisan is notorious. Forgetful of the fate of Governor Hill and Judge Maynard, indifferent to the welfare of his party, or his oath to conserve the interests of all citizens of the State, Governor Black named Mr. L. F. Payn, and a Senate with a Republican majority confirmed him, only nine senators of that party retaining self-respect and courage enough to defy Governor Black and Senator-elect Platt. Later this same governor is planning to aid in hamstringing the present State Civil Service Law. Fortunately a constitutional provision and a judiciary which he cannot control are likely to thwart the plans of the "machine."

The Course of British Affairs.

The presence of the Prince of Wales at Mr. Bayard's farewell dinner was an unusual act, indicating his desire to accentuate the feeling of cordial respect which the British officials and people have for Mr. Bayard and the people he represents. Recent by-elections in Great Britain indicate a setting of the tide against the Tory-Unionist coalition. Persistent dissensions in the Irish ranks, a tactical blunder on Mr. Dillon's part, which has given the ministry a chance to formulate a plan for a new tax commission, and Irish Roman Catholic co-operation with Anglican Tories in forcing sectarian schools on rate-payers, have not bettered the outlook for harmony in and out of Parliament. The Education Bill has passed its second reading in the House, but it concedes too much to please Nonconformists and not enough to satisfy Anglicans, and, despite Mr. Chamberlain's advocacy of it, it may be defeated, as was its much more complex forerunner last year.

Spain's Proffer to Cuba.

Forced by the failure of her troops to win victory, by her lack of credit abroad and her depleted treasury at home and by pressure from the Department of State at Washington, proud Spain has at last offered terms to Cuba, which, if made sincerely a few years ago, might have bound the province to her and prevented the present rebellion. But it is our opinion, confirmed by statements made by reliable American and English journalists in Cuba, as well as by leaders of the revolution there and in this country, that no terms which Spain may offer will be accepted by the revolutionists. Spain's generals and troops have so treated neutrals and prisoners of war that men who originally deprecated the revolt now sympathize with it, and the autonomist party has dwindled away overwhelmed by the evidence of Spanish cruelty and venality. Spain must suppress the rebellion or lose Cuba, and just now there is more reason to look for the former than the latter course. Reports from Porto Rico do not indicate that the reforms recently proffered to it will be accepted as satisfying all local needs.

The Situation in the East.

Again it is reported that the sultan has had presented to him, in a collective note from the Powers, their ultimatum respecting reforms which he must enforce, and we are asked to believe that this time reforms must follow. But, if reports from Berlin are correct, not a word is said in the note about any penalty attaching to disobedience, nor is there any confirmation of the happy rumor of a fortnight ago, which credited Germany with willingness to act with Great Britain, Italy and Austria, even should Russia and France oppose coercive measures. Nor will Sir Michael Hicks-Beach's speech in the British House of Commons, or the outbreak in Crete and Greece's desire to resort to arms in defense of Christians and conquest of Crete, tend to produce harmony of action at Constantinople, or lead the sultan to obey any paper mandate. Russia's policy will not change, even if the czar has epileptic fits semi-monthly, or weekly instead of monthly, as is now the case, and France will not be led to the point of breaking with Russia by any such brutal, impolitic assertions of British policy respecting Egypt and North Africa as the British Chancellor of the Exchequer made in his plea last week for parliamentary indorsement of the ministry's demand that a generous appropriation be made for the Dongola expedition.

The massacre by Mussulmans of a large number of Christians on the island of Crete, and the burning of the Christian quarter of Canea, has deeply stirred Greece and revealed the real situation in Crete, where the Porte stands pledged to grant reforms that have not, probably will not, come. Should Greece move now in any martial way it might prove to be the spark which would explode the mine.

Meanwhile, what of Armenia? Dr. Lepsius of Berlin, in his book, Armenia and Europe: An Indictment, just published, sums up the record of the Turk there: killed in the massacres, about 85,000; towns and villages laid waste, about 2,500; churches and convents destroyed, 568; forced to adopt the Mohammedan faith, 559 villages, with all their surviving inhabitants and hundreds of families in the towns; churches turned into mosques, 282; number of those without means of subsistence, about 500,000. The exodus continues of all who can get away from Turkey, but for the thousands who cannot there is little light ahead, and the time is far distant when it will cease to be necessary for financial aid to be given, or for prayers to be offered up for those who minister aid and those who receive it.

The Indian Famine and Plague.

Three thousand and more deaths from the plague in Bombay, with cases reported in Delhi on the north and Bangalore on the south and along the borders of Afghanistan, indicate somewhat the proportions of the problem which the British India officials face. Yet at the international sanitary conference, to open at Venice this week, the British delegates probably will decline to enter into any agreement respecting the inspection or infection of cargoes from Indian ports, since the same would hinder commerce. The British climate being hostile to the plague germs, and sanitary laws being fairly well enforced in British ports, the British delegates will say to those of less favored countries, "What have we to do with thee? Cleanse your cities, enforce necessary local precautions, and you will not suffer."

The direct charge against British administrators in India, which must be disproved sooner or later if Britain's good name is not to be irretrievably tarnished, is this: A reserve fund of Rx. 27,000,000 (nominally £27,000,000) has been accumulated through direct taxation since 1878–9, and in theory expended solely in constructing relief works, irrigation plants and the machinery to cope with just such a crisis as the present. Those who devised this scheme, and many of those who have administered it, repeatedly referred to the fund as a "sacred trust," as indeed it should have been. But the official accounts show that only £14,464,000 of the amount gathered from the people have been expended as pledged, and it is freely asserted that the balance has gone to pay the bills of the Afghan war and other governmental expenses scarcely meriting the descriptive word "philanthropic," or in any way contributing to meet the needs of the famine situation today.

NOTES.

The Senate has ratified the amendments of the treaty with Japan. It makes operative immediately reciprocity of recognition of the validity of patents, trade-marks and designs.

The indictment of the giver of the Seeley dinner at Sherry's, New York city, his most active supporter and the middle-man between the salacious-minded diners-out and the immodest women who danced before them, is a welcome omen that vice in high places is not to be tolerated. Captain Chapman, who made the raid, has been acquitted.

The destruction by fire of the Pennsylvania capitol at Harrisburg gave a local Methodist church the opportunity to return a courtesy shown years ago by Pennsylvania legislators. Then the church edifice was destroyed by fire and the congregation was given the use of the hall of the House of Representatives. Now the legislature is sitting daily in the new edifice of the church whose former attendants once worshiped in the capitol.

Senator Lodge has consented to a recommitment of the Immigration Restriction Bill, so that objectionable amendments likely to prevent presidential concurrence may be stricken out. Opposition to the bill hereabouts comes from men like T. W. Higginson and William Lloyd Garrison, who approach the question as idealists, and from the Central Labor Union, which represents federated labor. It opposes an educational test of any kind, though objecting to the admission of criminals and paupers.

The Mormons, failing to secure votes enough to elect their own candidate for United States senator from Utah, saw to it that Moses Thatcher, the recalcitrant Mormon, did not slip in where they could not, so they voted for and elected a Gentile named Rawlins, who has served them well heretofore when in the House of Representatives. Their failure to elect their own man is a happy omen, and in the long fight events have occurred and words have been spoken which will seriously undermine the Mormon power.

We need a first-class minister, or, better yet, an ambassador, at Constantinople during the next four years. Our missionaries and fellow-American citizens in Japan also are hoping that the man selected to represent us at Tokio may be one of the largest caliber. Treaties are to become operative which in their first workings are sure to cause friction, and our representative must be a man of tact, courage and experience. Moreover, history in Eastern Asia is making so fast now that our national interests demand that we should be in touch with everything done at Peking, Tokio and Seoul. In view of this it is encouraging to find it said in a semi-official statement sent forth from Canton, "Major McKinley wants gentlemen in the foreign service, and wants men of education, culture and ideas, who will in their bearing, their acts, official deeds and utterances exemplify the best, truest and highest type of American citizenship."

IN BRIEF.

The plea that wastefulness, whether in eating or decoration or anything else, furnishes work for the unemployed, is always fallacious. Wastefulness in the interest of charity is worse than false economy.

Our story in last week's issue, The Revival in Sardis, gave point to at least one Friday night prayer meeting last week. If not literally, it is certainly potentially, true. And that is the highest type of fiction.

The University of Chicago announces Lady Aberdeen, wife of the Governor-General of Canada, as orator at the next meeting of the convocation, April 1. Chicago University leads as the breaker of educational traditions.

Prof. Charles A. Briggs of Union Theological Seminary sails for Europe this week to spend a year abroad. He deserves a period of rest. The Presbyterian Church already has it, so far as he is concerned, for some time ago he ceased to be a disturbing factor.

Printer's ink is still effective. The recent reference in Franklin's letter concerning Professor Jernberg's work at Chicago Seminary brought him $250 for the support of his paper, The Evangelisten, which circulates among the Norwegians and Danish.

We have received attractive programs of Melanchthon celebrations next Tuesday at Andover and at Princeton Seminaries. The Christian public generally, as well as young men preparing for the ministry, will do well to note this important occasion.

Mr. Moody continues to spend his Sundays in New York, and in his great Carnegie Hall audiences the wealthy and fashionable classes are well represented. The sermon last Sunday afternoon was upon The Prodigal Son, and after it 150 persons rose for prayer.

The matron of a Texan orphanage recently saved from destruction by fire all but two of the orphans, but while caring for them three of her own children were consumed by the flames. "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends."

The Bible with which Mr. McKinley will be sworn in taking the oath of office will be a new one, furnished by the bishops of the African Methodist Episcopal Church. As a Methodist and a friend of the Afro-American Mr. McKinley could scarcely have done a more delicate act of courtesy.

Some sympathetic inquiries have been received concerning the sprained ankle of Deacon Dudley, whose visits to various churches in Boston are being described in our columns. As was seen in last week's issue, he was able to attend church twice, and this number shows that he has fully recovered his health.

Are you going to San Francisco to the Endeavor Convention, July 7 to 12? After considerable dickering with the railroads, a round-trip rate of $51 from Chicago has been secured. It will probably cost about $23 more to get from Boston to Chicago and back. Chances to visit the Pacific coast at so low a price are rare.

The bill recently introduced into the Massachusetts Legislature by Mr. Whitehead of Fall River, to amend the Sunday laws so as to allow the running of steamboats on Sunday, would seem to be simply a provision to open up again the Sunday excursion business, with the demoralizing results which would naturally follow. The bill ought not to pass.

Idaho, Arkansas and New Hampshire have sent in their returns for the Year-Book. It is a suggestive contrast that while New Hampshire has gathered the reports of 190 churches, a city in Massachusetts having nine churches has at the same time reported only two. Of Massachusetts conferences eight have reported, Mendon, as usual, being the first received, Jan. 5.

The West is believed to be more indifferent to the preservation of Sunday as a day of rest than the East. But there are signs of a growing regard for the day in some Western States. The Missouri House of Representatives last week voted, seventy-seven to forty-two, to prohibit Sunday baseball playing in that State. We shall watch with interest the fate of this bill in the Senate.

The Presbyterian Home Missionary Society's debt is now nearly $300,000. Its secretaries report that "not only the men, but the fields as well, are on the eve of a great disaster." Some adjustment to present conditions, at whatever cost, is the first and imperative necessity for a society in such a condition. To keep calling in vain for money and accumulating debt is to make the disaster irretrievable.

A meeting of the Congregational Association was held last week at which it was voted to authorize the committee on plans to complete agreements fixing the boundary lines of the lots on which the new Congregational House in Boston is to stand. The committee was also instructed to sell and cause to be removed the buildings now occupying the lots. We expect soon to witness the first visible steps toward the new structure.

Rev. Dr. H. A. Hazen cast a bombshell into the ranks of the members of the New England Historic Genealogical Society at their meeting last week by proposing that women be admitted to membership. Why not, pray, if they have the money, the leisure and the interest which would make them useful members? More and more women, especially those belonging to the rapidly multiplying patriotic orders, are making use of such collections as the Genealogical Society has.

It is not wise to celebrate prematurely legislative victories for good causes. Much exultation has been expressed because the national House of Representatives voted to abolish the sale of intoxicants in the Capitol. But last week the Senate sent the bill to the calendar, where it is likely to remain undisturbed. The remarks which preceded the vote showed plainly the purpose of the Senate to kill the bill. It is what was expected by most of those familiar with this kind of legislation.

Brooklyn churches are disturbed over a State law, which they have just discovered, prescribing who shall preside at their meetings, who shall vote in them, and making the Congregational Church Building Society a governing body, with power to declare churches under certain conditions extinct and to take possession of their property. The law seems to have been the result of a stupid blunder of legislators. In its present form we do not believe the courts would sustain it. To do so would be practically to legislate Congregationalism out of existence in New York.

In the death, last week, of Edward Whitney of Worcester, at the age of sixty-three, that city, Plymouth Church, the denomination and the Y. M. C. A. cause lose a valuable supporter. He belonged to the rapidly dwindling old guard of Y. M. C. A. men which included the late R. K. Remington of Fall River and O. D. Morse of Springfield. These men were identified with the Y. M. C. Association when for several years it carried on an evangelistic campaign throughout the commonwealth. It is worth while to recall this earlier and now abandoned phase of Y. M. C. A. activity.

The new International Lesson Committee is to hold its first meeting in Philadelphia, March 17, to consider the selection of the fifth series of lessons. The committee will hold a session in the Y. M. C. A. lecture-room, corner of Fifteenth and Chestnut Streets, at 2.30 P. M. of that day, to receive suggestions, which are invited from any who propose to use these lessons. Suggestions which cannot be presented in person may be addressed, previous to that date, to Dr. Warren Randolph, Newport, R. I. After the suggestions have been received, the committee will hold a conference with writers and editors of international lesson helps.

Prof. George D. Herron of Iowa College, in an interview with a London Chronicle representative recently, foretold "an immense social revolution" in this country. If he had said "evolution" he would have hit nearer the mark. We are too conservative a people to secure by revolution what can be secured with much less waste and friction by evolution. Evolution implies normal, revolution abnormal, methods of gaining given ends. Professor Herron came nearer the truth when he said that "The idea of Saxon federation is taking hold in America—the idea of some sort of cohesion among the Anglo-Saxon peoples of the world, with the idea of bettering the conditions of life all around."

Melanchthon was a layman, be it noted. He also was one of the many great men who may have lived too long. If he had died before 1546 he would not have compelled Calvin to say, when he did die in 1560, "O, Philip Melanchthon! . . . A hundred times, worn out with fatigue and overwhelmed with care, thou hast laid thy head upon my breast and said: 'Would God I might die here,' and a thousand times since then I have earnestly desired that it had been granted us to be together. Certainly thou wouldst have been more valiant to face danger, and stronger to despise hatred, and bolder to disregard false accusations." The term rabies theologorum originated with him, and the disease was never more virulent than during the epoch in which he lived.

Exactly 100 of the Andover alumni lunched together at Young's Hotel, Boston, last Monday. Probably so large a number of Andover ministers have not met together in Boston for forty years. Many friends who had not seen each other for years recalled pleasant experiences shared in student days. Rev. Dr. E. L. Clark presided over the meeting. Most of the members of the faculty were present. Rev. Dr. G. M. Adams offered prayer. Addresses were made by Dr. Arthur Little, Prof. J. H. Thayer, Dr. Daniel Merriman, Prof. George Harris, Dr. A. E. Dunning, Rev. Messrs. S. V. Cole and H. P. Dewey. A letter was read from Prof. E. C. Smyth. Some entertaining and some weighty words were uttered, and all agreed that the meeting was amply rewarding in enjoyment and suggestion.

Rev. William Rader of San Francisco was appointed chairman of the committee to assign ministers to the pulpits of that vicinity during the C. E. meeting next summer. He is preaching a series of sermons on the higher criticism of the Bible, somewhat in the line of Dr. Abbott's series in Brooklyn. Following his recent sermon on Jonah, the Occident called on him to resign his position as chairman, on the ground that many of the churches would be unwilling to receive preachers selected by a man of Mr. Rader's views. If the Christian Endeavor is to be the fish for which Mr. Rader is the Jonah, after his exit he can still make San Francisco his Nineveh. The Pacific says loyally that the answer of California Endeavorers will be that Mr. Rader should represent them at the convention.

The Congregationalist's Oriental Party of 1895 held a very successful reunion in Boston, Feb. 2. Twenty-one members, with several of their friends, were present. They found generous entertainment at Young's Hotel, and after dinner saw their experiences of travel over again by means of a stereopticon and views provided by Dr. George E. Hall of Dover, N. H. Most of these were from Dr. Hall's kodak, and many of them represented members of the party among the ruins of Egypt and Palestine and Greece, or in the palaces and mosques of Constantinople and other Oriental cities. All were agreed as to the great value of the kodak to perpetuate the experiences of tourists in far lands. Among those present from a distance were Dr. and Mrs. G. R. Leavitt of Beloit, Wis., Dr. and Mrs. F. A. Horton of Philadelphia, Mr. C. W. Anderson and family of Montclair, N. J., and Mr. and Mrs. Adna Brown of Springfield, Vt.

The hold which the New England Sabbath Protective League is gaining upon those elements in the communities whose support is most desirable may be inferred from the place and character of its forthcoming annual meeting. It is to be held Feb. 14, at 4 P. M., at the Central Congregational Church on the Back Bay, Boston. Rev. Reuen Thomas, D. D., will preside. The address of welcome will be made by Dr. E. L. Clark Dr. G. C. Lorimer and Bishop Foster will speak, and Sec. M. D. Kneeland will present the annual report. United States Senator George F. Hoar has accepted the presidency of the league. His platform may be inferred from this declaration: "I believe thoroughly in a day of rest, which shall be largely devoted to the contemplation of divine themes and to the worship of God and teaching his law; and in protecting this observance against labor or other discords by law." The league is to be congratulated on securing so eminent a layman to succeed Bishop R. S. Foster.

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM NEW YORK.

Brooklyn Matters.

Dr. Abbott's position as regards the Bible continues to be the uppermost topic of conversation in religious and anti-religious circles and of newspaper comment. The week has brought no more coolness into the discussion. One thing, however, people abroad, personal strangers to the doctor, can hardly understand—the reluctance of those who most widely disagree with his views to openly combat them, so warm is their fraternal attachment for the man and their appreciation of his ability and work in many spiritual lines. Only their strong conviction of duty to the Master and his truth could bring to or hold in their position of forensic antagonism the brethren whose official action was the subject of editorial comment in last week's Congregationalist and the religious papers generally.

Two or three physicians and pastors have founded an order of (female, chiefly self-supporting) Trained Christian Helpers to care for the sick, ministering gratuitously to the poor. Seven young women have already been received with religious services, and more will follow. The periodical alarm concerning overwork required of pupils in the Girls' High School is now at its hight, stimulated this time by a concerted movement of physicians of the Homeopathic Medical Society of Kings County. The January meeting of the Congregational Club was given mainly to hearing from Commander and Mrs. Ballington Booth of the work of the "Volunteers" among the unchurched masses, specially among prisoners. The club adopted the resolutions of its New York sister in favor of the pending arbitration treaty.

The annual meeting of Lewis Avenue Church (Dr. Kent's) showed a prosperous state of finances: receipts for the year, $13,900; expenditures some few dollars less, with a reduction of bonded indebtedness; assets over liabilities about $67,000.

The Pilgrims.

Dr. Virgin is rejoicing over the retrospect of another year's work of his church, all branches of which have been carried on prosperously. Of the fifty-two members received (twenty-seven on confession) two were from his Chinese Sunday school. This now supports one of its former members as a missionary of the American Board in his native Chinese village, and is building a church for him there. The Pilgrims' receipts exceeded those of several preceding years, and the harmony remains unbroken. The pressure of work has compelled Dr. Virgin to resign his membership in the Congregational Home Missionary Society's executive committee, where he has done good service for years.

Minor Items.

Another trial of the new motor street cars was made this week, a longer trip than before, and was even more successful, proving that the air-power is far more easily and readily managed than the cable or electricity, and the motion far more comfortable. Old folks want the new cars hurried up at once. Not a little surprise is created here by Pres. Seth Low's sudden change of base on the Greater New York question. After printing in The Century and elsewhere some of the strongest arguments yet written against the consolidation, he now comes out in its favor, which seems not much like the level-headed citizen that he is.

The city board of health has made a new move in the care of our public schools. It appoints inspectors to visit the primary schools daily, under certain rules and regulations, looking for symptoms of contagious diseases among the children present and learning the nature of illnesses that are keeping any of the pupils at home. The object is, of course, to take suitable precautions against the bringing of dangerous diseases into the schools, and to prevent their spread among the homes of the pupils.

A Serious Loss.

Our young churches in the northern wards, now numbering eleven, have lost a valued friend and helper in the person of Mr. Sereno D. Bonfils, for many years a merchant here, who suddenly died of heart failure in his sixty-sixth year. He was a lineal descendant, on his mother's side, from John and Priscilla Alden, and was baptized in the Old South Church, Boston. He materially assisted in the formation of Trinity Congregational Church, Tremont, of which he was trustee or deacon, or both, most of the time until his decease. Christ Congregational Church at Mount Hope, of which his son, Rev. Ellsworth Bonfils, now representing Atlanta University in the North, was for some years pastor, and our church in Bedford Park were also largely due to his gifts and labors. He was a Christian of unfailing cheerfulness and unwavering faith.

Personal.

Dr. Dana is still gaining strength and giving growing promise of complete recovery. Dr. Kincaid yet lingers on this side of the river, but with daily waning physical strength, while strong and bright in Christian faith and longing to go hence and be forever with the Lord. HUNTINGTON.

FROM THE INTERIOR.

Farewells to a Missionary.

The Union Park Church has the good fortune of having two of its members at work in the foreign field. Miss Ada Haven has for some years been rendering excellent service in China, and now Miss Gertrude M. Willcox, daughter of Prof. G. B. Willcox, is on her way to Japan. She will probably teach in Kobe College for the present, although her preference is for purely evangelistic work. It is a long time since anything occurred so to deepen interest in missions in Union Park Church as the decision of Miss Willcox to go abroad. For two or three weeks friends have been bidding her good-by. First came a reception at the home of Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Blatchford, at which members of young ladies' missionary societies and of the W. B. M. I. were present. Besides delightful social features there were fitting addresses by Dr. J. G. Johnson, Professor Mackenzie and Mr. Blatchford, the singing of hymns and the utterance of tender God bless you's. Special services were also held at the rooms of the Woman's Board, and a part of Wednesday, Jan. 27, was set aside by the ladies of the Union Park Church for special addresses and the presenting of gifts of useful articles and memorials of affection. At the meetings of the Endeavor Society and in the general prayer meeting words of cheer and hope were spoken, so that altogether the young woman could but feel as she left us what a blessed testimony to the power of Christ's constraining love she was giving and receiving. While it is not what it once was to go abroad, it still means a great deal to give up a refined and cultivated home and friends of youth, and go out into a far country from which return is possible only two or three times during life. It is something to rejoice over that so many are found, even in these secular days, to make sacrifices like this.

Revival in Douglass Park Church.

Special meetings have been held for a month. Last Sunday fifty-one were received into fellowship as the first installment of those who have been brought under the power of the Holy Spirit. Only fourteen came by letter. Thirty were adults, and twenty-two heads of families. Eleven received the ordinance of baptism; fourteen came from the older members of the efficient Junior Endeavor Society. While such an addition as this means much for any church, however large, it means far more for a church which, like Douglass Park, has had a hard struggle for existence, and is not able even yet to meet all its bills unaided. But the strength now obtained will add largely to the resources. There have been no sensational meetings, no peculiar methods, nothing but the plain presentation of the gospel, accompanied by earnest appeals. Rev. J. D. McCord, State evangelist, led the meetings for two weeks. His preaching is always acceptable and rarely without result. Subsequent meetings were held every night by the pastor, Rev. F. T. Lee, assisted by ministerial brethren. While no one of our churches has as yet an ingathering like this to report, in not a few of them a good work is going forward. We do not believe that the winter will pass without witnessing a good many conversions among those who have been more or less regular in their attendance upon religious services.

A Recognition Social.

The First Church in Chicago has always been noted for its ingenuity in conducting its sociables. The one last Tuesday evening was called a recognition sociable. Curiosity attracted many who might not otherwise have been present. The recognition consisted in guessing the names of many of the elder persons present from photographs taken when they were young. Mr. C. H. Case, who has long been the superintendent of the Sunday school, having been obliged through pressure of duties and ill health to lay it down, was presented with several valuable books, and his wife with flowers.

Political Decapitation.

Governor Tanner has already begun to swing the political axe. The commissioners of the West Side parks have been removed bodily, with a single exception. The charge is that they have spent money and have nothing to show for it, and that as Governor Altgeld's favorites they have cheated the people. It is feared that this wholesale removal is an indication of the existence of another political machine which may not be any great improvement on the one from which we have so long suffered. Still it is true that the State is in debt when it ought to have an abundance of money, and will be compelled to anticipate its tax levies by borrowing to meet its necessary expenses. For a State which has no bonded debt this seems wholly unjustifiable.

Associated Charities.

The principle of association or system in charity received a new emphasis through the visit of Robert Treat Paine of Boston and his addresses at various meetings held by those interested in the relief of suffering. The pressure of the severe weather of a week ago, and the swift response of wealth to the appeal of the mayor for $100,000 for immediate use among the poor, awakened an interest in the subject quite unusual. The great meeting of the week was that in Plymouth Church, Sunday afternoon, when the auditorium was crowded to listen to the discussion of the best methods of dispensing charity, and especially to hear Mr. Paine. In his opinion charity should seek to do four things—relieve need promptly and tenderly, prevent unwise alms to the unworthy, raise into independence every family where this is possible, make sure that no child grows up a pauper. Most of all, said Mr Paine, is work needed. The truest charity, therefore, is the furnishing of employment to those who are without it. This suggests the problem of the great city, where panics or financial disturbances, even if slight, are certain to deprive thousands of work.

Chicago, Feb. 6. FRANKLIN.

FROM LONDON.

"The Event of the Century."

It is doubtful whether the cable messages from England to the secular press of America have conveyed an adequate idea of the intense satisfaction which the signing of the general arbitration treaty between Great Britain and the United States has given in religious circles on this side. On every hand one hears expressions of unbounded joy that the fraternal feeling that undoubtedly exists between the two communities, especially in their distinctively Christian sections, has now taken concrete form; for it is universally assumed that the treaty will be ratified. If Lord Salisbury showed any disposition to go slower than or not so far as Mr. Olney, in that respect, as in others, he does not represent the heart of the British people, the vast majority of whom desire that the treaty should be as binding, inclusive and far-reaching as possible. It having been stated that the choice of a monarch as nominator of an umpire in the event of disagreement is repugnant to some American journals, the Tablet, a leading Roman Catholic organ, seizes the opportunity to urge that the choice should be left to the pope, whose "impartiality between the two countries could not be questioned," and whose "desire to promote the interests of peace would at least be equal to that of the King of Sweden." The Daily Chronicle, to whom much credit is due for the part it played in the events that led up to the treaty, is influentially supported in the suggestion that the consummation of the treaty should be marked by a day of international celebration. I have seen it definitely suggested that The Congregationalist's Pilgrimage did not a little to foster that happy state of public feeling which has resulted in what the Chronicle fitly calls "the event of the century."

United Nonconformity.

The work of Free Church federation proceeds apace. Never was any movement taken up with more enthusiasm or unanimity by all sections of British evangelical Nonconformity. Within two or three years 300 local councils have been formed, embracing 8,000 churches, and representing at least a million members. Rev. Thomas Law, one of the original promoters of the movement, now spends his whole time in organizing councils throughout the country, whilst, in order to cope with the increasing work of the Metropolitan Council, Rev. John Matthews has been compelled to relinquish his pastorate. Although disestablishment is not in the program of the National Council, the catechism of Free Church principles just about to be issued, the impending publication of a series of hand-books on the history and principles of the Free churches and the intended compilation of a Free Church year-book must inevitably tend in that direction. When the time comes for considering the question of state establishment the Anglican Church will find itself, as never before, confronted by a united Nonconformity. Many a poor country minister thanks God for the formation of the council, since he now has access, by means of the circulating library, to which Dr. Robertson Nicoll has contributed 500 volumes, to books that otherwise he might never have the opportunity of reading. One illustration of the kind of work done by local councils may be given. At the opening of the year some thirty of them joined in sending to every home in the districts which they covered an invitation to attend some place of worship in 1997—100 000 such invitations being distributed by 5,000 visitors. This winter 100 Free Church demonstrations, addressed by leaders of the federated denominations, are taking place in our principal towns.

Parliament of the Free Churches.

Elaborate arrangements are being made by the Metropolitan Council for the national assembly in London, March 9–11. Never in the history of the Free churches of Britain have so many eminent Nonconformists met on one platform as will then be brought together. Literally, the foremost men in each denomination have promised to take part. Dr. Monro Gibson is president; Dr. McLaren preaches the annual sermon; Mr. Price Hughes, Dr. Barrett and Dr. Berry also preach; Dr. Rogers, Dr. Clifford and Dr. Oswald Dykes read papers; Dr. Parker presides over a meeting for young men and women. A general interchange of pulpits will take place in London the preceding Sunday. The Lord Mayor of London's invitation to the 1,500 delegates to a reception at the Mansion House, and the offers of the Bishop of Rochester and the new Bishop of London to entertain the visitors, are significant recognitions of the national character of the congress. Commenting on the action of the bishops the Guardian, the leading organ of the Established Church, urges the wisdom and advisability of Anglicans cultivating in this way the acquaintance of Nonconformists, whilst even the Anglo Catholic Church Times is constrained to remark that the most extreme divergences of opinion need never prevent one man from showing hospitality to another or from being his friend, and then goes on to suggest a round-table conference on the education question, all of which goes to show that the time for the state to inflict disabilities on Nonconformists and for "Churchmen" to snub them is rapidly drawing to a close. It is now an established fact that in England Congregationalists, Baptists, Methodists and Presbyterians, without counting other Nonconformists, provide more church accommodation and have in their Sunday schools 400,000 more scholars than the Church of England.

Under a Cloud.

A cloud hangs over the London County Council. As soon as this body came into existence it at once inaugurated a new and better era in municipal life. The council was pervaded by a healthy moral tone, and in particular distinguished itself by its concern for the welfare of the workers of London, stipulating, for instance, when giving out work to a contractor, for the eight-hour day and the trade union scale of wages. Then the council went a step further; dispensing with the contractor, it started a works department of its own. Unquestionably by this means good and, on the whole, economical work has been done. There has been no scamping and no complaint is made of the quality of the work, but some unfortunate scandals have recently occurred. It has been discovered that in order to make a fair show certain officials of the work's department cooked the accounts. There has been no "jobbing," no misappropriation of funds; but where a loss was incurred on one piece of work, profits on other jobs were taken to make up the deficiency; an equalizing process has been going on, presumably to avoid criticism and censure. From the first the moderate or conservative element on the council has been bitterly opposed to the democratic policy of the council doing its own work, and now they are yelling in triumph. The case, however, is not so bad as doubtless the moderates would like it to be. Documents were fabricated, fictitious signatures given, but there was no financial fraud. The culpable officials acted very foolishly and have suffered the penalty of summary dismissal. The fact that, despite most ingenious devices and the collusion of officials, the malpractices were discovered by the exceedingly smart and able young comptroller, Mr. H. E. Haward—who, by the way, is a Congregational church secretary and Sunday school superintendent—proves the effectiveness of the council's safeguards and the probity of the councilors as a body. In the case of the Metropolitan Board of Works, which the council superseded, corruption for long went on unchecked. The progressive cause in both our municipal and national spheres has latterly suffered check, but this can be only a temporary setback, for much needed work yet remains to be done, and the forces of progress and righteousness must prevail.

Dr. Pentecost's Mind.

After nearly five years' remarkably successful work in West London, Dr. Pentecost returns to his native land. Since receiving the call from Yonkers he has all along intended to accept it, his apparent vacillation being due to a desire not to act rashly or inadvisedly. The Marylebone Church left no stone unturned to induce Dr. Pentecost to remain; the grave and reverent leaders of the Presbyterian Church of England unitedly urged him not to go, and his presbytery took the unusual course of declining to accept his resignation in the hope that the Yonker's people might be prevailed upon to withdraw their call. If they had done this, Dr. Pentecost would have consented to remain; as they positively refused to release him from his promise, he cannot choose but go. And this is in accord with his personal wishes. It is a question, not of dissatisfaction with his present charge, but of determining where he will spend the rest of his ministerial life. He feels that if ever he is to go "home" it must be now, else he must remain permanently in England. He will again tender his resignation at the meeting of the presbytery in February, when there will be no further opposition. It is his purpose to give up his work at Marylebone about the end of March at latest. The strenuous endeavors that have been made to retain Dr. Pentecost in London are the best possible evidence of the value and success of his ministry here. The good wishes of a very large circle will follow him to his new sphere. Dr. John Watson is mentioned as his possible successor.

Dr. Mackennal's Health.

Dr. Mackennal's many American friends will be glad to know that he is recovering from the physical breakdown which some months ago compelled him to cancel his engagements and to take a two months' holiday. Since his election to the chair of the Congregational Union in 1886 his public work has gone on increasing, whilst the duties of his pastorate have steadily grown. Until this breakdown, due to exhaustion of the nerve centers, he has never had a two months' holiday, although he has been in the ministry nearly forty years. Dr. Mackennal is one of the hardest working men in the country, and latterly has rendered splendid service in connection with the Free Church federation movement. His medical adviser says there is no reason why he should not do eight or ten years' good work yet, and it is to be hoped that he may be spared in activity for a much longer period. He occupies a position by himself in the denomination, and his leadership will be specially needed in impending struggles.

Good Men and True.

Dr. John Clifford, having all but killed himself by thirty-eight years' incessant work at Westbourne Park Chapel and on behalf of the whole metropolis, starts in March on a yachting cruise round the world, in the course of which he hopes to reach New York and Boston before the middle of August. Mr. Silvester Horne, one of the most brilliant of the younger generation of Congregational preachers, has greatly benefited by his long, enforced rest and hopes to resume his ministry at Kensington Chapel in April. Pastor Archibald G. Brown, the "East End Spurgeon," after a thirty years' markedly successful ministry on the simplest evangelistic lines at the East London Tabernacle, has resigned the pastorate, and set out on travels which may lead him to the States. Much interest has been excited by the reappearance of Mr. Stopford Brooke in a London pulpit after an absence of three years, during which period Bedford Chapel, where he preached for many years, has been demolished. Mr. Brooke's greatly improved health leads his friends to hope that his voice may again be regularly heard in the metropolis. Dr. Herron of Iowa is now spending some weeks in London, studying, preaching, and being interviewed. Dr. Charles Ray Palmer is shortly due at Mansfield College.

DEACON DUDLEY'S SUNDAYS IN BOSTON.

IV.

BY ALDEN ENDECOTT.

"Well, Jacob, where shall we go tomorrow?" asked Mrs. Dudley, as they withdrew from the dining-room, where several of the boarders loitered over dessert to discuss the Bradley-Martin ball.

"I'm not particular," he replied, with an abstracted air.

If the truth were told the good deacon was a bit homesick when Saturday night came round, and he was thinking just then of his fellow-deacons at home. He wondered which one took his place in passing the contribution box in the broad aisle, and whether his Bible class of elderly women held together in his absence. He wished he had brought his Barnes's Notes with him, so he could study the Sunday school lesson Saturday evenings, as he did in the plain sitting room which seemed a thousand miles away. Men seldom enjoy boarding, and the lively chatter at dinner this evening about the racing on the boulevard and the Geisha—whatever that might be—had grated on his provincial ears. City life in some of its phases was growing more and more distasteful to him. Meanwhile Mrs. Dudley scanned the Sunday notices in the evening paper. At length she remarked, in a judicial tone, "Here's something that sounds real nice—the Church of the Higher Life. Let's go there."

"Is it a morning service?" asked the deacon.

"No, it comes at three in the afternoon," said Mrs. Dudley," and we shall have to hurry, for Sunday dinner is such an elaborate meal we never get through much before three. It's not far off, though, only round on St. Botolph Street."

"Who's the minister?" was the next query.

There was an awkward pause, for Mrs. Dudley recalled the woman preacher at the Christian Science Church, so she answered hurriedly, mixing the pronouns in her confusion: "O, he's Mrs. Van Anderson. Do you suppose it's a foreigner?"

They sallied out just after dinner for 44 St. Botolph Street, and found the Church of the Higher Life gathered in a gymnasium. A month ago they would have criticised the absence of ecclesiastical furnishings, but they were beginning to look for truth beneath outward forms. All else was forgotten, too, when the preacher appeared. A noble figure, clad simply in a dress which hung in Grecian folds, head and hands uncovered, absolutely without ornament, hair combed back smoothly from a face of singular purity and strength, she stood before the audience of about 200, Bible in hand, the embodiment of perfect health and womanliness. Whatever doctrine she might proclaim one instinctively recognized a personality dominated by lofty ideals.

After singing from a book called Truth in Song, which looked precisely like a Moody and Sankey hymn-book, the preacher said: "We have been singing 'God is present everywhere,' now let us realize the Presence." All bowed in silent prayer, and then united in repeating the Lord's Prayer. Scripture reading followed, and after more singing came a sermon on the Ideal Marriage. It must be confessed that to these two simple listeners much that was said about "living in the consciousness of the perfect," with similar vague expressions, was wholly unintelligible. After the sermon came what she called "healing ministry." The people sat in perfect silence and were exhorted to send loving thoughts to sick and sorrowing friends in the faith that they would be healed and comforted thereby. This part of the service was really impressive, and the evident sincerity of the worshipers, most of whom were middle-aged women, could not escape notice. A lengthy benediction, "in the name of Immaculate Love," closed the services, and the congregation quietly dispersed. On going out each received a four-page leaflet setting forth the aims of the church. Its special features are: a healing service every Sunday, a weekly Emerson Study Club, a mothers' meeting and the Arkeso Club for young people. Reaching the street Mrs. Dudley drew a long breath and said to her husband, "Did you ever hear such bosh, Jacob?"

To her amazement he replied, soberly: "But I believe, Hannah, there's a real truth somewhere in that sort of preaching. I couldn't make head nor tail to half she said, but I'd like to go there again."

Half doubting the evidence of her own ears, Mrs. Dudley adopted the tactics of diversion, like a mother with an unruly child, by saying, hastily: "We've just time to take this West End car and go over to that Universalist Church on Shawmut Avenue where they advertise 'Pleasant Sunday Afternoons.' Don't you suppose they meet on stormy days?"

They were a little late and the edifice was thronged so they had to stand. A woman whispered to Mrs. Dudley, "You hain't missed much yet, only some of the organ music and readin' the Bible and Mr. Perrin's prayin'." A violin solo, the rendering of one or two selections by a famous elocutionist and a talk on the kindergarten made up the rest of the varied program. Not caring for the music, Deacon Dudley adjusted his spectacles and read a small paper, copies of which were distributed in the vestibule, and discovered that this was the Every Day Church, that Rev. G. L. Perrin was the popular pastor and that something seemed to be provided in the way of entertainment or instruction for every day in the week.

Going home he was uncommonly silent, and vouchsafed this single comment on the performances of the last three hours: "I guess the Lord was 'bout right, Hannah, when he advised letting the wheat and tares grow together till harvest time. I'm sure I couldn't undertake to tell what's gospel truth and what ain't in this great Sodom of a city."

That week Deacon Dudley received by mail some pamphlets which explained the essential doctrines of the Church of the Higher Life, and was pleased to find so much that squared with his own views of truth. He drew a pencil mark around this paragraph and silently passed it to Hannah.

"And ye shall seek me and find me when ye shall search for me with all your heart. In that day when, more than riches and honor and power and selfish glory, you shall desire spiritual understanding, in that day will come to you the revelation of God in your own soul, and you will be conscious of the indwelling Father, who is Life and Strength and Power and Peace."

1497. Philip Melanchthon. 1897.

The Life-Work and the Personal Traits of the Scholar of the Reformation.

By Rev. Isaac O. Rankin.

Philip Melanchthon, the 400th anniversary of whose birth comes on Feb. 16, was fourteen years younger than Luther and survived him for exactly fourteen years. If in spite of this equality of age Melanchthon's life seems longer to the student of Reformation history the impression is largely due to differences in their early experience. When Melanchthon stood at Luther's side in the first great public debate between the Reformers and the Roman Catholics at Leipsic in 1519 Luther was thirty-six and Melanchthon only twenty-two, and from this time onward their labors and experiences were parallel, until at Luther's death his younger friend was left to set in order and complete the work of Protestant defense and organization alone.

The extraordinary development of a precocious talent is the most striking feature of Melanchthon's early life. Born in the village of Bretten, on the hills between the Necker and the Rhine in the present Grand-Duchy of Baden, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts at Heidelberg in his fifteenth year. Removing thence to Tübingen, before he was twenty he had gained for himself a fame as classical scholar and editor which won the enthusiastic recognition of Erasmus. At twenty he published his Greek grammar and at twenty-one was called, on the recommendation of Reuchlin, to the chair of Greek in the University at Wittenberg, in whose faculty Luther had been for ten years the animating spirit.

Melanchthon's parents were godly and prosperous people. His father, George Schwarzerd, was a well-known armorer—a trade which had not yet lost its importance by the decay of the older usages and shows of war. More significant for his mental development was his relationship to the famous humanist and Hebrew scholar Reuchlin, who was his great-uncle on his mother's side, and who seems to have admitted the ambitious and promising lad to a close intimacy. To Reuchlin's influence was due, no doubt, the direction of Melanchthon's studies to philology and that unrivaled acquaintance with the rediscovered treasures of the classic world which prepared his mind to accept and value Luther's direct appeal to Scripture in the original tongues. To Reuchlin is due also that change of name, in accordance with the pedantic fashion of the time, which translated his patronymic Schwarzerd (Blackearth) into its Greek equivalent. Melanchthon himself found the name rather too ponderous, and shortened it in his later years to Melanthon. Reuchlin's own scholastic rebaptism was Kapnio, which, if translated literally, becomes "Little-smoke."

It was a time when the new wine of the renaissance of learning was everywhere threatening to burst the old bottles of scholastic thought. Fugitive scholars from the Orient were teaching Greek in the university centers. Reuchlin had bribed the Jews to teach him Hebrew and had written the first grammar of that ancient tongue. Erasmus was settling the received text of the Greek New Testament. There was an enthusiasm of scholarship which carried the new learning everywhere. Reuchlin and Erasmus had prepared the way for Luther, who merely said what they were thinking and applied their principles of free research in practical church life. Melanchthon's transfer from Tübingen to Wittenberg was a change from an atmosphere of elegant scholarship and acute verbal criticism to one of active application of principle in church life and practice. From editing Latin plays and Greek philosophy he came to be the theological adviser of the Reformation, the writer of its most widely accepted creed, the most influential of its university professors and the fashioner of its forms of external church life.

No one could have seemed less fitted by nature for so wide a range of activities. Of feeble habit of body, he seemed quite unequal even to the great literary tasks which fell to his share. Of stammering tongue, there was little prophecy of the fame as a lecturer which called thousands of students to Wittenberg. A layman, who never himself entered the pulpit, he became the master and teacher of preachers and gave form both to the theology and church order of Lutheran Germany. Cautious, fond of peace, ready to yield every point that was not essential to the truth, never abandoning the hope that Christendom might be held together, it was he who stood as champion for the reformation at Augsburg when it came to the formal and final break between the papacy and the German churches. Loving quiet and hating the battle of words, his pen could seldom rest from controversy in the whole forty years of his life in Wittenberg. He is, indeed, the scholar pushed into action, and he shows the strength and weakness of the character. It was Luther's bold leadership which forced him to the front and Luther's thought which largely shaped his thinking. Each supplemented and completed the other. Luther was nothing if not polemic, and his fierce invective has ever since put his admirers to the blush, but while Luther was calling men "sots" and "asses," and scattering a host of like opprobrious terms, Melanchthon combated error with a gentleness and courtesy which in that rough age was often mistaken for weakness. The friendship of the two, in spite of differences of manner and disposition and a growing divergence of theological opinion, never failed. Luther's last letter was written to his friend, and to the last Luther studiously refrained from public mention of his name in connection with the points of disagreement—no light self-restraint for a man of his vehement and outspoken habit—and only once, in writing to a close personal friend, does Melanchthon complain of the "servitude" in which he sometimes felt himself held by Luther's overmastering personality.

Of Melanchthon's public activities outside of Wittenberg two are of special interest. He took a prominent part in the unsuccessful conferences with the leaders of the Swiss reformation, Zwingli and Œcolampadius. Melanchthon was at this time still in complete accord with Luther in regard to the meaning of the eucharist, which was the chief point of disagreement between Zurich and Wittenberg. On other grounds he can hardly have regretted very deeply the failure of the conference. The Swiss were identified with a political and ecclesiastical democracy which was wholly foreign to the thought of both the Wittenberg reformers. They looked upon the authority of the German princes as the hope and support of the churches. To have joined hands with the Swiss would have been to abandon this fundamental principle of church order and dependence upon the secular arm. The excesses of the fanatical extremists in their own party only confirmed them in this opinion. This explains their attitude of deliberate opposition to the uprising of the peasants, which was an anticipation in South Germany of the French Revolution, both in its rebellion against intolerable oppression and its hopes of a better social order founded upon liberty, fraternity and something more of equality than the age had known. To this movement Luther expressed his dislike in terms which seem to us little less than brutal. On this ground of the supremacy of the secular arm in its own sphere Melanchthon must also have based his approval of the burning of Servetus by the authorities in Geneva.

The same point of view appears also in the crowning work of Melanchthon's life, the Augsburg Confession. The politic Emperor Charles called the German Diet together to secure a double unity, against the Turks who had just been driven back but were still threatening Austria, and against the Lutheran heresy. The princes who had protected the latter were called upon to present a statement of the grounds of their belief and of their complaints against the papacy. Luther, who was still under the ban of the empire, had been left at Coburg, and it fell to Melanchthon to prepare this statement, which was signed by the princes and read before the emperor and the Diet by the chancellor of the Elector of Saxony, in whose train Melanchthon had come to Augsburg. It was a matter for the princes, who alone were represented. Luther's standing before the Diet at Worms had been that of a contumacious offender at the bar of a superior court; Melanchthon and the other theologians had no standing at all before the Diet at Augsburg. It was upon the princes that they depended.

Without bearing this in mind the attitude of the reformers toward the practical questions of their time cannot be rightly understood. As professors in the Wittenberg University both Luther and Melanchthon were the personal paid servants of the Electors of Saxony and felt themselves bound to consult and obey them in every important act. Had the electors been men of a different stamp the German reformation must have had a different history. This subservience to princes is the characteristic mark of German religious history to this day, and the Protestant churches are far less emancipated from its thraldom than the Roman Catholic. Their ministers and theological teachers are public functionaries paid by the state, and the freedom of action of the congregation is reduced to its smallest proportions.

It was Melanchthon's office "to coin the good metal which Luther dug out of the earth." By literary skill, original contribution of knowledge and irenic breadth of view he enlarged the sphere of Luther's influence and deepened the power of the truth he taught. To Luther's vehemence and acerbity he was an eminently safe counselor. Every step away from the ancient usages was taken by him under stern conviction of its necessity and against the settled desire of his heart for unity. This conciliatory spirit finds its expression in the Augsburg Confession. It brought upon him again and again from the more radical of the reformers the charge of readiness to betray their cause. For the sake of union he was ready to admit even an authority of bishops and of pope founded upon human custom, if only the liberty of the gospel might be secure. To his mother, who asked him what she should believe, when the learned could not agree, he answered that she was "to continue to believe and pray as she had formerly believed and prayed, and not to suffer herself to be disheartened by the disagreements of the controversialists"—an answer applicable to disturbed spirits in our own time, which reveals at once the practical and ethical tendency of Melanchthon's thought and his strong grasp of the continuity of the inner life of the church.

Very attractive and delightful is the personal character of Melanchthon as shown in his friendships, in the love of peace and quiet which made him write in the year before the Augsburg Diet, "O happy they, who abstain from public business!" in his beautiful and helpful family life, and in long years of controversy carried on with a patience and courtesy unexampled in the history of the time. It is significant of his modesty that he absolutely refused the title of Doctor of Theology in terms which might well be studied by ambitious ministers today. In this unassuming spirit, also, he suffered himself to be persuaded into marriage by friends who knew how much he was in need of some one to care for his weak health and home needs. Katherina Krapp, upon whom the choice of these friends fell, was the daughter of the burgomaster of Wittenberg. She made him a home in which he took great delight, calling it an ecclesiola Dei, a little church of God, and showing himself a most sympathetic and devoted husband and father. A learned Frenchman coming in to see him was astonished to find him sitting, a book in one hand and with the other rocking the cradle, so that, in spite of his dread of interruption for his studies, he does not seem to have found the duties of professor and house-father quite incompatible. From one end of Europe to the other scholars, theologians and men of affairs came to hear or to consult with him, and it is said that twelve languages were sometimes spoken at his table. It is interesting to find a trace of yielding to the flesh which he kept so well under in his frugal and industrious life. He was a South German and evidently did not take kindly to the North German cooking. "It is a pity," he writes, "that we have in this pitiable nest no proper nourishment. There is nothing good to be had, and if one had it they don't know how to cook, omnia sunt barbarica."

If Melanchthon's interest in astronomy was largely due to his belief and study of astrology, his studies in that and other natural sciences bear testimony to the breadth of his intellectual interests. At heart he was a student always, and in the learned fashion of the time wrote in both Greek and Latin more easily than in his native German. Of his own choice he would never have left the professor's chair. He remained in Wittenberg to the last, in spite of the division of the university and oft-repeated invitations, one of them from the king of France, to go elsewhere. To the friendship of two famous contemporary artists, Lucas Cranach, who was a citizen of Wittenberg, and Albrecht Dürer, we owe our knowledge of Melanchthon's personal appearance. The copperplate by Dürer, from which our illustration is taken, is especially interesting and gives a lively idea of the brow and eye of a thinker and the mouth of a generous and persuasive man. It bears the date of 1526, when Melanchthon was twenty-nine. No doubt the face grew thinner as bodily infirmity, the sorrow of home troubles, the bitterness of unsought controversy which made him long for peaceful days and deliverance from the "rabies theologorum"—the madness of the theologians—and the care of the churches grew heavier upon him, but the essential power, gentleness and kindliness it never can have lost. In him the gentler and more conciliatory type of the reformed theology remembers one of its greatest leaders and confessors.

CURRENT THOUGHT.

AT HOME.

Rev. Edward M. Chapman of Worcester has a capital article on The Menace of Pseudo-Patriotism in the February North American Review. He concludes thus: "No nation, surely, ever had greater cause for pride in past achievement, present opportunity or future promise. In none has devotion to the public weal been deeper, more intelligent, or more self-forgetful in periods of national storm and stress. Patriotism has been in a sense popularized. Let us see to it that, to adopt Coleridge's famous distinction, it be not plebified. As we contemplate our unique situation, our unexampled progress, and our immeasurable resources, we are forced to the conclusion that if any danger ever seriously threaten us, it must come from within rather than without. This means that genuine American patriotism, in accordance with Bolingbroke's dictum, 'must be founded in great principles and supported by great virtues.' It implies further that the principal field for its display is likely to continue to be domestic rather than international; and that nothing can more surely militate against the fulfillment of our national mission than our adoption of that ideal of military imperialism which is leading the nations of Europe into a labyrinth of increasing complexity and difficulty."

Hon. Carl Schurz, in Harper's Weekly, sums up a trenchant condemnation of the Senate's procrastination in dealing with the arbitration treaty thus: "It is no exaggeration to say that the eyes of the whole world are on the Senate of the United States at this moment. With the treaty, the Senate is also on trial. Certainly, senators should not stifle their honest convictions. But unless the Senate can irrefutably prove that, contrary to the universal belief, this treaty will make for wrong instead of justice, for international discord and broil instead of peace, it would, by rejecting or even unnecessarily delaying the ratification of this treaty, present to the world a pitiable display of American statesmanship and American civilization."

The Christian Intelligencer, after a discriminating comparison of the work and value of the large and small churches, concludes thus: "If the object of churches is simply to furnish Christians a place where they may assemble for the personal enjoyment of their religion at the smallest possible outlay of means and effort, make and keep the churches large; do not be weakened by the outgoing of a single family or dollar so long as it is in your power to prevent it. But if the object of the Church of Christ is to carry the gospel to the masses until every community and country under the sun shall have received it and become evangelized, encourage colonization; encourage the multiplying of religious centers, whence the light may radiate; encourage practical church extension. Let the large, rich, full mother hive swarm now and then, and in affectionate solicitude for those that go out look after their proper hiving again in some new field, where there is room for Christian activity and growth."

ABROAD.

The British Weekly makes Dr. Pentecost's treatment by the Presbytery of London the text for an editorial confession that "it is altogether out of harmony with the spirit of the time, and it is even out of harmony with Presbyterianism itself. If it were true that church courts really possessed and exercised the power of dealing with ministers as they choose, irrespective of the inclinations of the minister, there would not be much to say. But it is notorious that, whatever their legal rights are, every call is decided by the opinion of the individual minister concerned. That being so, his decision should be given as quickly and as quietly as may be, with no ostentation, no fuss, no apparent desire to make capital, no parade of motives."

The Christian World, commenting on the arbitration treaty, thinks it "will be generally recognized that the weakest part of this noble treaty is that which concerns rival territorial claims. It may be thought unlikely that any two judges on either side would decide against their own country. But unless they should do so the requisite majority cannot be attained. Perhaps experience of the action of umpires in minor districts may hereafter lead to the appointment of an umpire also in case of territorial disputes. Perhaps, also, as patriotism becomes less of a savage passion and more of a national sentiment, judges will have the courage to decide against their own country when she is wrong. Meanwhile, we must hope that where the tribunal fails the good offices of a friendly Power will supply the place of umpire. And, indeed, in view of such an achievement of humanity and reason as this treaty, any Power which left the court in order to appeal to the arbitrament of devils on the battlefield would be overwhelmed with infamy."

Rev. R. Wardlaw Thompson, writing in The Chronicle, the organ of the London Missionary Society, respecting the outlook for Protestant Christianity in Madagascar, now that France is in control, says: "It is evident now that the crusade to win Madagascar to the Church of Rome, which was preached by the Archbishop of Paris in the spring of 1895 and which was proclaimed throughout France from Catholic pulpits, is to be carried on with all the audacity, determination and subordination of means to ends of which the Jesuits have so frequently shown themselves to be capable. Our Protestant missions, seriously hampered by the anti-English feeling which is so painfully prevalent among many of the French officials, are commencing a conflict with Jesuit craft, boldness and unscrupulousness, backed by the prestige of French sympathy and the natural fear of French officials to offend a party which has so powerful an influence on public opinion in France. The recent action of the government in demanding the evacuation of the large and important hospital of the Friends and London Missionary Society Missions, on grounds which it is impossible to regard as other than monstrously unjust, is a very unpleasant and ominous indication of what may be in store for that mission and ours in the near future."

THE CRADLE TOMB IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

[A copy of this poem, republished by request, was made by Dean Stanley and hangs in a frame close by the "cradle tomb."]

A little, rudely sculptured bed,
  With shadowing folds of marble lace,
And quilt of marble, primly spread
  And folded round a baby's face.

Smoothly the mimic coverlet,
  With royal blazonries bedight,
Hangs, as by tender fingers set
  And straightened for the last good-night.

And traced upon the pillowing stone
  A dent is seen, as if to bless
The quiet sleep some grieving one
  Had leaned, and left a soft impress.

It seems no more than yesterday
  Since the sad mother down the stair
And down the long aisle stole away,
  And left her darling sleeping there.

But dust upon the cradle lies,
  And those who prized the baby so,
And laid her down to rest with sighs,
  Were turned to dust long years ago.

Above the peaceful pillowed head
  Three centuries brood, and strangers peep
And wonder at the carven bed—
  But not unwept the baby's sleep,

For wistful mother-eyes are blurred
  With sudden mists, as lingerers stay,
And the old dusts are roused and stirred
  By the warm teardrops of today.

Soft, furtive hands caress the stone,
  And hearts, o'erleaping place and age,
Melt into memories, and own
  A thrill of common parentage.

Men die, but sorrow never dies;
  The crowding years divide in vain,
And the wide world is knit with ties
  Of common brotherhood in pain;

Of common share in grief and loss,
  And heritage in the immortal bloom
Of love, which, flowering round its cross,
  Made beautiful a baby's tomb.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER.

BY MRS. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

The woman who is called upon to preside at a meeting has very much the same kind of responsibility that belongs to the leader of an orchestra or the master of a choir. To her it falls to see that everything is done in an orderly sequence, that precious time is not wasted, that each person has all the time she is entitled to for presenting her subject or explaining her position, but that the rights of the whole body are not invaded by an aggressive or indiscreet partisan; in short, the harmony of the meeting depends largely on the tact, good sense and impartiality of the person in the chair.

As it may be any one's duty, occasionally and perhaps unexpectedly, to preside in a meeting it is well for all of us to know something about the requirements of the situation. I hold that a woman should be equal to any emergency. Talking not long ago with a distinguished educator the remark was made to me that all-round women are few. One finds a woman extremely well fitted in a certain direction, but helplessly inadequate to certain others, and the plea was to have women symmetrical, trained in many ways, ready for any service.

By close attention to the way in which excellent presiding officers, such as Frances Willard and Mary Lowe Dickinson, for example, manage large assemblages and councils, one may gain a very good idea of the thing as it ought to be done. By the study of a little book of parliamentary rules, of which there are several to be had, small, compact and inexpensive, one may learn precisely what she may do, and precisely what she must never do. By boldly putting the results of her study and her observation into practice when her turn comes, as come it will, by putting an amiable modesty to the front as an excuse for her mistakes, and by the cultivation of a serene unconsciousness of self, any woman, even one wholly domestic and retiring, and lacking the advantages of training in this line which are now given to our girls, may become a good presiding officer.

Our little unpretending clubs for women, few of them without a definite aim in the pursuit of some branch of art or literature, afford an admirable opportunity for gaining knowledge and experience in the tactful conduct of meetings. These clubs are so educational, so profitable, that one wishes they were established everywhere, and that all women belonged to at least one. The abuse of a good thing is discovered when, not satisfied with one pleasant club, or at least with two, a lady recklessly throws herself into the current, and joins a half-dozen.

A presiding officer cannot exploit her own views. She does not express her opinion, or if she feels that she must do so some one else must temporarily take her place in order that she may go upon the floor, as an ordinary member might. Her rôle is to be both impersonal and impartial, and she must control her own temper, her face, her tones, so that her self-mastery enables her to control the meeting. For she is the judge on the bench, the captain on the quarter-deck, the driver who holds the reins over mettlesome steeds, the engineer guiding the train, the personage, for the time being, on the throne of authority—this quiet gentlewoman who is exercising her gifts in the quality of a presiding officer.

FOOD FOR THE INFANT.

I.

BY MARY E. GREEN, M.D.

Should a dozen intelligent mothers be asked to give an outline of a child's diet up to the age of one year you would be quite likely to receive a dozen different answers. There might be some points on which they would agree, but disagreement would be the rule. Statistics have been repeatedly given of infant mortality, yet with all the progress which science has made in other directions this mortality is not materially lessened. Mothers all too often have forced upon them the responsibility of a life to care for without previous knowledge or education. Guided by love, instinct or intuition, all of which may lead her astray, she realizes, after the "rose with all its sweetest leaves yet folded" has been taken, how unfitted she was for that which she should have known best. It is useless to expect a decrease in infant mortality until there are more intelligent and widespread ideas regarding the building material of the body, or, in other words, the food which contributes to life and health. It is only when we come to the human family is this disregard of material which enters into the structure found. The architect, if he would construct a building for strength and endurance, selects brick, stone, mortar, wood, glass, paint, etc., to this end. Every mother should know the value of food, not only for supplying hunger, but for those qualities which shall contribute best to build a perfect constitution.

It is not enough to have a child well born; that counts for little if the food and environment are not conducive to its highest physical development. What, then, shall be the food of the child up to one year of age? Nature has furnished the most perfect of all foods in milk, as it contains the five food principles which enter into the composition of the body in the right proportion for the nourishment of the young. First of all, the child should have the mother's milk and absolutely nothing else. If this is impossible then the question arises what is the best food for the child. The answer is simple enough—that which the nearest approaches the mother's milk, as we must look to the building material if we would have the child healthy and strong.

The first food for the child, then, should be prepared by taking the upper part of the milk and diluting it with one-half boiling water. To a cupful thus prepared add five grains of sugar of milk; do not under any circumstances add ordinary sugar, as this has to be transformed in the process of digestion and is often the primary cause of indigestion. If the child is to be bottle fed continue this food up to six weeks of age, then use only one-third water to two-thirds milk; at three months give the milk pure and increase the sugar of milk one teaspoonful during the twenty-four hours. During hot weather the milk should be sterilized. There are expensive sterilizers but nothing is better than the ordinary glass fruit can which may be found in every home. Fill one of these with milk, set it in a tin pail of cold water and put it on the stove to heat. As soon as the water comes to the boiling point remove from the fire. Let the can remain in the water for half an hour then put the milk in a cool place. By this method all germs are destroyed. Undoubtedly there are changes which take place in sterilizing milk which affect its digestibility but it is the only safeguard, especially during the summer months. Is it better to give the child the milk from one cow? No, I think milk from a mixed herd is preferable, as one cow might possibly be diseased, give an inferior quality of milk, or be fed on objectionable food. Any good brand of unsweetened condensed milk ranks next to pure milk as food.

The patent foods or so-called gluten foods are highly objectionable, owing to the large amount of starch they contain. The glands which secrete the fluid for digesting starchy foods are not developed until the teeth appear. Starch is a food which contributes to the storing up of fat in the system, instead of being an element of strength, and a child largely fed on starchy foods has little resistance against sickness. Malted milk has less objection as the starch has been chemically changed by the process of malting, so that it is easily assimilated and it is further combined with milk which makes it a valuable food.

Regularity in feeding the child is important. Give it food once in two hours for the first three months, after that only in three hours. Avoid feeding during the night as much as possible; if the child is fretful a drink of water allays thirst and insures quiet. Remember that the stomach must have rest. It is injudicious feeding that produces those troublesome ailments known as colic and indigestion. Simplicity in diet and care as regards cleanliness and sterilization of food, absence of medicines, especially the so-called home remedies such as the various teas, will, other things being equal, insure a healthy child.

JOAN OF ARC.

THE MAID OF ORLEANS.

BY JANET SANDERSON.

Jeanne d'arc, called by us Joan of Arc, was born at Domremy, France, Jan. 6, 1412. The three boys and two girls of the peasant's family to which she belonged were brought up to work hard, fear God and honor the saints. Joan loved to hear best of all from her mother's lips the stories of the saints Catherine and Margaret. She loved to carry flowers to the chapel to place before Our Lady; she gave most of the little money that she earned in charity; she visited the sick, where a warm welcome always awaited her. This simple maid, with a mass of dark hair above her high forehead, was tall, strong and healthful, with a sound mind, modest and devout; but no sickly fanatic nor morbid dreamer. She had "the inward eye of seeing" which the other children lacked. She heard music in the rainfall and saw pictures in the sunset clouds. The fertile fields were clad in glory, each flower bearing a message from on high. The peasant garments she spun and wove by her mother's side were no common, homely, prosaic clothes, for in them she saw the white wool of the tender lambs she had guarded on the flowery hillside, and the blue flax blossoms she had so often plucked. God was in all things to her and therefore nothing was commonplace.

Close by the humble cottage home was a dense forest, where was the great beech tree of which the country people told many tales. They called it the fairies' tree, for it was said that the fairies danced about it. On festival days the villagers hung it with garlands and played and danced about it, and the priest came once a year to say mass under it. In its shade Joan often lingered to ponder over the reports brought into the quiet, peaceful village by traveling monks and wayfarers, that an English king was ruling over the land. Sorrow filled the heart of the little maid. She could think of nothing else in her humble labors about the home, in the fair fields while watching the flocks, beside the fountain, in the chapel, by her little chamber window and under the fairies' tree. She had heard the prophecy, and brooded over it, that a maid of Lorraine should save the land.

Joan was but a child of twelve when there appeared to her one day at noontime in the garden a great light, out of which a voice spoke, saying, "Joan, be a good child; go often to church." At first she was frightened but other voices came, telling her of the sorrows of the kingdom and that she was the maid to lead an army, carry help to the dauphin, and deliver France. So she grew accustomed to the voices but answered simply: "I am only a poor peasant girl. I know not how to ride or lead men at arms." Still the voices kept saying, "Save France." Then she argued that a dutiful daughter could not leave her home, that she knew nothing about a soldier's life and couldn't even ride a horse. Truly it was a hard struggle, but the voices altered not. It was always the same message, "Save France," so when they directed her clearly to go to the governor of Varicouleurs for aid she left her much-loved home, her many friends, her fairy tree, and went to her uncle and told him all. He, too, believed that a maid from his land should save the kingdom and he took the child, simply clad in a red woolen gown, to visit the governor. Annoyed by such interference he told the uncle to box the child's ears and send her home.

Not discouraged, the voices still speaking, she tried again. Brave men heard her kindly this time and promised to take her to the dauphin Charles. They gave her a horse and the dress and equipment of a soldier. As she was to travel with men she chose the dress of a man. The governor gave her a sword and a letter to Charles, and she departed with four armed men through the enemy's country, arriving after eleven days' journey at the dauphin's castle in Chinon. He had purposely placed another on the throne, but Joan discovered the deceit and, looking around upon the nobles, soon found Charles, and kneeling before him said, "I am Joan, the maid sent by God to save France." She asked for troops to save Orleans, and told him that the voices had assured her that he was the true heir and she must lead him to Rheims to be crowned Charles VII. of France. A council of the learned met in St. Catherine's Church and summoned the maid.

As she came, a blush suffused
Her pallid cheek such as might well beseem
One mindful still of maiden modesty,
Though of her mission true.

Her lovely limbs robed in a snow-white vest,
Wistless that every eye on her was bent
With stately step she moved.

She answered all their questions fully, and her sweetness and simplicity won all hearts. Knights and warriors gathered to fight under the banner of her own device—white, embroidered with lilies—and a suit of armor, glistening white and silvery, was made for her. She would not take the sword because the voices had told her of an ancient weapon with crosses on its blade, which was lying buried behind the altar in the Chapel of St. Catherine of Fier-bois, which was to be hers. This she found, then, as Southey sings,

Over her robes the hallowed breastplate threw
Self-fitted to her form; on her helmed head
The white plumes nod, majestically slow
She lifts the buckler and the sacred sword
Gleaming portentous light.

Onward she rides on a snow-white horse, her white banner and white plumes waving in air, her armor shining in the sunlight. Thousands of soldiers are at her command as they rush on towards Orleans. Again and again they are driven back, but the valiant maid cheers them on, crying, "Fear not, the place is yours." An arrow pierced her in the neck; she drew it out with her own hand and rushed back to the ramparts, and victory was won. She led them from place to place wherever the voices beckoned, and was always victorious. The English believed her to be a witch, but the French thought her a prophetess.

After such successes it was easy to lead the king to his crown, and an army of 12,000 men headed by the maid set out for Rheims, where the coronation ceremony was performed. By the side of the king stood Joan, holding her sacred banner. When the ceremony was finished she knelt at his feet saying, "Gracious king, now is fulfilled the pleasure of God, whose will it was that you should come to Rheims to receive your worthy coronation, showing that you are the true king to whom the kingdom should belong."

Her father was present to witness the triumph of his daughter, and the king ennobled her and her family and descendants forever. Joan longed to return to her homely life in Domremy, but there was other work awaiting her. The fair fields of northern France must be delivered from the invader, and she must struggle against mean suspicion, for now her pathway darkens. At an attack on Paris the French were repulsed, and the weak king left St. Denis to the mercy of the English, who showed terrible vengeance. In a sally at Compiègne Joan was surrounded, pulled off her horse and taken prisoner by soldiers of John of Luxembourg, a poor nobleman. Her ransom was precious, and she was sold to the English for 10,000 gold francs. The base ingratitude of the monarch whose kingdom she had saved abandoned her in the hour of misfortune. The English accused her of being a witch and a heretic, and they took her to Rouen for trial. She was heavily chained by the ankles, was fastened to a beam and watched by a guard of five men of the lowest sort, who teased and mocked the poor girl without mercy. At her trial she boldly defended the truth of her revelations, and the judges sat lost in wonder because she answered to everything so cautiously and wisely. She was accused of blasphemy, heresy and witchcraft. In her ignorance she had been made to sign, not the simple formula read to her, but a long list of the crimes imputed to her and a confession of them. Her voices comforted her by saying: "Fret not thyself because of thy martyrdom; thou shalt come at last to the kingdom of Paradise."

In the old market-place at Rouen Joan's scaffold, heaped high with fagots, had been raised, and this sweet, brave girl of nineteen years was carried to it in a little cart, with a crown on her head bearing the words, "heretic, apostate, idolater." To the last she defended her king, and as the flames rolled around her she bravely proclaimed that her voices were from God.

News of her death reached the palace of Charles VII, and in no wise disturbed that ease loving monarch. But when the tidings came to the quiet village of Domremy it broke the loving heart of the maid's father. The mother lived to see her child's memory exalted and her prophecies fulfilled, in 1449, when Normandy was lost to England. Charles at last woke up to a determination to restore the memory of Joan, and constituted a commission to inquire into and report about her death. The trial was concluded at Rouen just a quarter of a century after that tragic event. The venerable mother and two sons were present to hear the sentence which established the innocence of the maid, and cleared her memory of the dreadful imputation of being a witch.

The part played by this heroine is unique in history. Few will deny that she believed herself inspired, but few will venture to assert that she was inspired. Michelet says of her: "The originality of the Maid of Orleans and what determined her success was not so much her valor or her visions as her good sense. Through all her enthusiasm this daughter of the people saw the question clearly, and was able to solve it." True it is that among the heroines of history the girl stands foremost in possessing the courage of a soldier, the devotion of a patriot, the purity of a saint and the constancy of a martyr, all being blended with true womanliness.

HYSTERIA AND TEMPER.

I have been much interested in the recent discussion regarding the child who kicks and screams in order to gain his point. As I have never had an experience like this I may not be a good judge, but it seems to me that the writer in your issue of Jan. 21 speaks from an entirely different standpoint from the one in Jan. 7. Are not hysteria and temper two entirely distinct states? Should they receive at all the same treatment? It seems to me that the first is uncontrolled weakness, while the other is uncontrolled strength, and must necessarily be treated differently. Even if a result of temper, the proper mode of treatment of real hysteria might be to soothe first. Surely "the remedies applied should not be harsher in the case of a little child than in the case of a grown woman," but in two cases of adults that have come under my personal observation "the family council, with the assistance of a medical expert," has found that merely soothing treatment was not the most effectual even for hysteria.

Is not the case of temper altogether different? It has been my experience to know recently in different families two children who have had the soothing method applied so efficaciously that they rule the house with a rod of iron, thus laying up trouble for themselves and their injudicious parents. The children know that they will be "soothed" and gain their point, rather than be allowed to cry.

I have heard an elderly lady, whose children have now passed middle life and are all useful Christians, tell the following personal experience: "Never but once did any of my children kick and scream for anything. Then, putting my foot upon the child's neck, with just pressure enough to hold her in position, she was kept there, not only till she was quiet, but long enough after to satisfy her for the remainder of her life, for she never again attempted this method to assert her will." Wise mother! Taking it in time one treatment was enough to cure.

In the case of a really hysterical child certainly the most careful and quiet treatment is required. It is a disease and one that needs exceeding wisdom and the assistance of the best medical aid, but an exhibition of genuine temper in a robust, healthy child is a quite different matter.

NOTES.

Parents and teachers should use their influence in favor of the passage of a bill now before Congress prohibiting the processes of vivisection in the presence of school children. Certain other restrictions are advocated, but none that interferes with the true interests of science. Exhibitions of wanton cruelty, however, ought never be witnessed by boys and girls.

At a time when the right use of wealth is so freely discussed these words by the famous explorer, Nansen, are worth pondering: "To require little is better capital than to earn much. The need to earn much fetters and enslaves a man, while the ability to do with little makes him free. He who needs little will more easily strive toward the goal he has in view, and will in general lead a fuller, richer life than he who has many wants."

The work of the Sabbath Protective League is about to be strengthened in New England by the formation of a woman's auxiliary. The W. C. T. U. has been invited to take the initiative, and a meeting to effect an organization will be held at the headquarters, 171 Tremont Street, Boston, on Tuesday, Feb. 16, at 3 P. M. Ladies occupying high social positions in New York and Washington have already pledged their support to the movement, the value of which will be recognized by every thoughtful Christian.

The article in this department by Dr. Green, who is president of the National Household Economic Association, and a member of both the American Medical and American Public Health Associations, will be followed by others, viz.: Food for the Child up to School Age, Food During School and College Life, Food for Working Girls and Diet for the Laboring Man. For some years Dr. Green had charge of a dispensary in New York city for women and children, and she is eminently qualified to treat the vital subject of dietetics in a judicious and scientific manner.

Commenting upon the experiment in co-operative housekeeping as described in the article, Girl Consorts, in our issue of Jan. 21, a correspondent says: "But to any who would seek similar quarters it is right to add that such could scarce be found at similar prices. The landlord, to whom these 'consorts' owe so very much, puts also the excellent service within their reach. All food supplies can be easily secured, and the pretty picture has its own needful reticence of details. The problem of home living is a serious one in this land; it is good missionary work to work at its solution. Less show in furnishings and more cooking of one's own meals, less fear of climbing many stairs and greater readiness to make the best of things one has, and last, but not least, a fair sense of the sacredness of the privacy of the simplest effort at home life—all is needful if you want the genuine thing. Any woman who wishes can be a fairly good housekeeper, but a home-maker is quite another and a better thing. Let us seek and reverence it more than great learning or wealth, and learn from the mother who, though unlearned, was so much wiser than we of the present generation."

Closet and Altar

No man need be without comfort while the gates of prayer are open to him.

Happy those who are able in truth to say, "My Lord and my God!" Here is the noblest inspiration for life, strength for work, comfort in trouble, hope in death. Here is what gives eternity itself its chief interest and joy.—William Forsythe.

Know of a truth that if any one else would fain speak in the temple, which is the soul, except Jesus alone, he holds his peace as if he were not there; and in truth he is not at home in the soul, for she has strange guests with whom she desireth to hold converse. But if Jesus is to speak in the soul she must be alone and be silent herself that she may hear the voice of Jesus, and then he enters in and begins to speak. He revealeth himself and all that the Father hath uttered in him according to the measure of the soul's ability to receive it.—John Tauler.

Lord! who art merciful as well as just,
Incline thine ear to me, a child of dust!
Not what I would, O Lord, I offer thee,
Alas! but what I can,
Father Almighty, who hast made me man,
And bade me look to heaven, for thou art there,
Accept my sacrifice and humble prayer.
Four things which are not in thy treasury
I lay before thee, Lord, with this petition:
My nothingness, my wants,
My sins, and my contrition.

—Southey.

The end of stated prayers should be made the subject of attention and care. In manuals of preparation for the holy communion how little emphasis is laid, as a general rule, on the regulation of the heart and conduct subsequently to the ordinance! The natural recoil from the strain which real prayer always puts upon the mind is levity. Against this levity the devout man should always watch and strive. When we have withdrawn ourselves for a while for communion with God the glare of the world should be let in gradually on the mind again, as an oculist opens the shutters by degrees upon his restored patient.—Edward M. Goulburn.

Hear, O Lord, our humble supplications. O thou who knowest what things we have need of before we ask, give us grace, we beseech thee, to seek first thy kingdom and righteousness; and do thou add to us all that is necessary for this present life. May we desire thee more than all thy gifts, that so desiring we may seek thee, and find in thee our true joy. Quench in us, O thou Lord of our life, all wrong desires. Deliver us from selfishness and pride, from sloth and idleness, from narrowness of mind and hardness of heart. Fill our hearts, we beseech thee, with the grace of thy Holy Spirit; make us kind, long-suffering and gentle; give us grace to deny ourselves, and to submit to thy holy will. In adversity, help us to be patient; in prosperity, keep us humble; and when we cannot see the way before us, may we fear no evil, knowing that thou art with us. May thy grace be sufficient for us, and thy strength be made perfect in our weakness. We beseech thee to hear us, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Caught by his rival's * * * * * locks
  And lips rich * * * * * * * * in hue.
He told his love, but she would * * * * *
  Her head about coquettishly,
And with a * * * * * * * smile at him;
  "Old * * * * ," or " * * *," was her reply.
Still he persisted till the time

The eldest of the family,
  And also first one in my class;
I'm always found in company,
  And yet alone I sometimes pass.

Unheard I ripple in the stream,
  Yet I am ever in your ear;
I make no sound to mar your dream;
  I form a part of every year.

Long have I silent been in death;
  No one in life my form has seen;
I mingle with your every breath,

I always am the first of all;
  Lo! I am found in every place.

PRIZE TANGLE-MAKING.

Among the literary exercises enjoyed before the days of newspapers was that of bouts-rimés, or "rhyming ends," which consisted in fitting verses to given rhymes. The sonnet was so commonly selected for this diversion, we are told, that in the seventeenth century that form of versification fell into disrepute among the more aspiring poets.

It has been suggested to "Tangles" that a contest of puzzle bouts-rimés might prove an enjoyable novelty to our nineteenth century puzzle lovers. It is therefore proposed that as many of our readers as can do so send in one or more puzzles—either enigmas, charades, anagrams, metagrams, or anything else to which the idea may be applied—in the form of three four-line stanzas, the lines of which shall end with the following words respectively: fair, part, share, heart; near, two, fear, true; place, home, race, roam.

Everybody should try this. The contest will remain open during the month of February, and the sender of the best twelve-line puzzle made on the foregoing rhymes will be given a copy of Bartlett's Familiar Quotations, ninth edition, a work too well and favorably known to require comment. We have in mind several friends who are expected to find this new tangle-making a very interesting field of effort for a leisure hour or two.

The Conversation Corner.

MR. D. F. will please omit all cuts this week, so as to leave the entire space for two sets of letters, one from the young children, the other from the "old children." The former all relate to animals.

CALIFORNIA.

Dear Mr. Martin: In my Corner communication, a few weeks ago [Jan. 7], I wrote Australia when I should have said the Sandwich Islands. I inclose a cutting, giving you a fuller idea of the matter. T. W. W.

This is the substance of the cutting:

The ugliest and yet most useful things in California are horned toads. They are by no means pleasant to look at and the Indians formerly held them in sacred veneration. Californians do not regard them very highly, and many kill them whenever found, imagining them venemous, which is not the case. The Hawaiians, however, know their value, and President Dole has written to different sections of California to have several thousand sent to Hawaii for the purpose of destroying certain insects. Investigation has shown that they are exceedingly valuable for this purpose, and there is now talk about preserving them more carefully in California.

But tastes differ, and against the opinion of this old Worcester County boy in California here is what a New England girl in New Mexico says about it:

Dear Mr. Martin: In your Corner of Jan. 7, T. W. W. of California thinks that horned toads are almost as frightful as tarantulas. I can't understand that at all. They are much more graceful in their proportions than the ordinary toad, and their colors, which change with their surroundings, are often beautiful. A strong pink tinge added to the sand color I have often seen and admired. L. W. C.

By the way, what has become of that California boy, who sent us, away back in the infancy of the Corner, the horned toad which made such a sensation among us? The lizard soon ran away, but the boy's handiwork, in the shape of a carved orange-wood box, still remains on my mantel.

VINELAND, N. J.

Dear Mr. Martin: I hesitate about sending this, lest you may have a collection of spider letters as large as the flock of "white old hens"! I presume no Cornerer will have the use for spiders I have just seen described. A Frenchman who kept a spider farm sold his pets to rich men who wished their newly filled wine cellars to appear old. The spiders, turned loose in the dark place, soon festooned the bottles with cobwebs and so helped on the deceit, very innocently, of course. But wasps have a real use for spiders—to feed to their baby wasps. When mother wasp has made her nest in the ground or built one of clay on a tree or a house, she lays the eggs and drops in a spider or two. These she kindly puts to sleep by stinging, and when the babies need them she knows that they are ready. The children will find these and other interesting things in Gibson's "Sharp Eyes." M. F.

RIPON, WIS.

Dear Mr. Martin: If you please, I would like to be a Cornerer. I will be eleven years old soon, and I am going to have a party and invite five or six little girls. [Better invite six.—Mr. M.] I would like to tell you about a horse I read of in a scrap-book. This horse liked to play jokes, so when the little boys were saddling him he puffed himself out so as to make himself as large as possible. Then the little boys got on and the horse started out, but when he had gone a little way he let his breath go, and the saddle swung under him and the little boys fell off. LILIAN M.

But how about the little boys, Lilian? Did they enjoy the joke?

BANGOR, ME.

Dear Mr. Martin: On my way to school this morning I heard a doleful, chattering sound among the English sparrows. I noticed one of the birds flying close to the snow with a dead bird in its claws. It flew into a hedge near by, I think, for I did not see it again. Is it the custom of the sparrows to care for their dead in this way? I have never watched them enough to know. ANNA B.

JAMAICA PLAIN, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: Our pig is doing well and eats a great deal. I think the animal described in last week's Congregationalist [Jan. 14] was a lively boy. BRUCE B.

This is the Bruce that had the guinea pig that came out of the bottle that was fired into by the pistol that contained the rings that belonged to the children that attended our Corner Party!

Speaking of "the best specimen of all" the animals, a lady writes as follows:

My husband says, tell Mr. Martin we have sent our young animal off to —— College, to be trained. There are a plenty more of them there, and though older than those you encountered on your wheel they are quite as noisy.

Yes, I have often noticed that the young animals of this species, when gathered together to be trained, make more noise and are more destructive than at any previous or subsequent period of their lives, and I think this is the uniform observation of families residing near the corrals where they are kept. This may spring from the aggregation of so many together, for as soon as their training is ended and they are separated this phenomenal tendency to noisiness and destructiveness ceases almost at once. As it is understood not to be a necessary or helpful part of their training, it may be safely predicted that the application of new scientific methods and the use of their own acute discernment, so manifest in other things, will combine to change this tendency, so that in the evolutionary progress of the species this undesirable peculiarity will at length be entirely eliminated.

And now for the other questions:

Some time ago I attended a funeral of a friend at which the clergyman read with much feeling Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney's poem, The Home Maker. Can you tell me where I can find it? The works of Mrs. W. which I have access to do not contain it. N. N. C.

It is in Daffodils, a little book of her poems published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. The closing stanza represents the mother, always on earth caring for and waiting for her children, as still the same:

And somewhere yet in the hill-tops
  Of the country that hath no pain,
She will watch in her beautiful doorway
  To bid us welcome again.

Where can I find the piece, No Sect in Heaven? MRS. S.

I found it in a little leaflet at the Tract Society Rooms on Bromfield Street. It was written by Mrs. Elizabeth Jocelyn Cleaveland, and has often been published in newspapers and in leaflets. The lady in the library showed me a broadside copy with this inscription: "Nason's Print, New-Berne, N. C." Was this a war-time print, when the Union soldiers occupied New Berne?

LOWELL, MASS.

I am very anxious to find a hymn commencing, "O, the angels hovering o'er us." It was written and set to music forty or fifty years ago. An aged mother on her dying bed repeated it and remarked that she used to sing it. I have made a great many efforts to find it, but have been unsuccessful. MRS. M.

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK.

Place Names. To the "picturesque" names cited in the Scrap-book of Dec. 24, a correspondent adds these, which were once used to distinguish school districts in a town in the Connecticut Valley: Bedlam, Foamer, Foggintown, Hangdog, Rattle Hill. It would be an interesting subject for a schoolgirl's composition, if the names are still used in that town, to tell the tradition of their origin. In other States very curious and sometimes very comical names are given to post offices and even to towns. Here are a few from the United States Official Post Office Register: A. B. C., Tenn.; Adieu (Jack Co.), Tex.; B., Ind.; Bad Axe, Mich.; Bird in Hand, Pa.; Bumble Bee, Ariz.; Calf Killer, Tenn.; Cat, Ky.; Dismal, N. C.; Dry Bone, Wis.; Eye, Ark.; Finis and Fort Spunky, Tex.; Hard Times, La.; Ino, Va.; Izee, Ore.; Jingo, Kan.; Joe, Ky.; Nine Times and Ninety-six, S. C.; Not, Mo.; O. K., Ky. (also in Miss. and S. C.); Pig, Ky.; Quick, Neb.; Rabbit Hash, Ky.; Shoo Fly, Io.; Shortly, Del.; Squirejim, W. Va.; Tin Cup, Col.; Troublesome, Kan.; U Bet, Tenn.; Useful, Pa.; Useless, Wn.; Wakeup, Ind.; Walk-up, N. C.; Whynot, Miss.; Wig, Minn.; Yell, Tex.; Zeb, N. C.; Zif, Fla.; Zig, Mo., and very many others of the same sort. But how much better it would have been if the inhabitants had selected names of pleasanter sound or higher meaning to bequeath to their successors and descendants! "What's in a name?" Very much—who would want to have a Useless or Dismal or Troublesome place for their residence, to make their home at Pig or Wig or Zig, or spend all their lives with a Bumble Bee, with a Dry Bone, or even with Rabbit Hash?

Towns That Are "Useful" and "Truly" "Worthy." (The last two words are names of places in Montana and Alabama.) Such are the towns that raise men—no matter what their names are. This thought has come to me from reading an article in one of the magazines, urging the erection of monuments in the native towns of eminent men, referring to some whose fame had reflected honor upon their birthplaces. This set me to thinking of the many country towns—some of them remote and small, perhaps—where were born and reared boys or girls who have gone out to accomplish something great and good in the world. Their record is a tribute to the churches and schools in those towns, even though no monument is erected. A young man told me the other evening of his native town out among the Berkshire hills. It has produced two good men—President Barnas Sears and Dr. Edmund H. Sears, who will be remembered, if for nothing else, as the author of the Christmas hymn, Calm on the listening ear of night.

The plain man who fills Tremont Temple twice a day for many weeks has built his own monument in the town of Northfield, as well as in the hearts of thousands of men and women all over the world whom he has helped to live better lives. It would be a good plan for us to think over the country towns we know, and see what natives of them deserve monuments—of memory, if not of bronze!

A Very Small Country Town.– The daily papers had something to say about it a few weeks ago. It is in Vermont. It has the name of a large town—Baltimore. Find it on your map—in Windsor County. Its population is fifty-nine. It has no church, no store, no post office. But I have looked up the State school report, and find that it has one schoolhouse and one school teacher. There are twelve boys and nine girls in the town, between the ages of five and twenty-one, and they apparently all went to school in 1896. The account says that "it has no distinguished sons or daughters." But how about those twenty-one children? That school teacher has a great responsibility! Does she have a Sunday school? Does she want any Sunday school papers? Perhaps Superintendent Nichols of the Weathersfield Sunday School goes over from Perkinsville—that is not far—to help carry it on. The children of the smallest town will be heard from yet!

LESSON FOR FEB. 21. Acts 6, 7.

THE FIRST CHRISTIAN MARTYR.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D. D.

The book of the Acts seems to have been written with a purpose to make distinct the successive steps of the Christian Church in its departure from Judaism. At first it included, apparently, only orthodox Jews. They formed a sect by themselves, but continued to worship in the temple. Then they antagonized the Jewish authorities. Next, they extended their membership so as to include Jews born outside of Palestine. Between these and those who had been trained under the direction of the priests of the temple there must have been marked differences of religious habit and opinion. Six or seven years after the beginning of the Christian Church two parties appeared within it, one of them composed of these foreign born Jews.

The church early organized a system of relief for its own poor, and before long the foreign born Jews began to complain that their poor did not get a fair share. Out of this disturbance in the church grew very important consequences.

I. The order of deacons. The apostles had meant to be fair, but the growth of the church gave them more than they could do. They, therefore, proposed a new order of officers. The proposal proved acceptable to all. It was decided on in the usual Congregational way, that is, by the vote of all the members, and in the same way the officers were elected [v. 5]. Then the apostles, at the request of the members of the church, set these officers apart by prayer and the laying on of hands [v. 6]. In the course of time these officers came to be called deacons [Phil. 1: 1; 1 Tim. 3: 8]. Perhaps they began at once to be called by this name from the Greek word used twice in the first and second verses of this sixth chapter of Acts to describe their work. Their special business was to be the almoners of the church to the poor, and the righteous spirit of the early Christians is shown by the fact that the names of these seven indicate that they all belonged to the class which made the complaint. One of them, Nicolas, was a convert from heathenism

II. The eloquent deacon. These officers soon began to do more than to visit and provide for the needs of the poor. As they went on their errands of mercy they proclaimed the gospel. Some of them became more famous as preachers than some of the apostles, and their lay preaching brought about great results. "The number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem exceedingly." Upon one class the effect must have been unexpected, for "a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith."

Of course this increased the opposition against the Christians, though this name was not yet given to them. Stephen became the leader of the new order, and argued for the gospel in the synagogues of foreign Jews. One of these synagogues was maintained by freedmen who had been Roman captives, who were called Libertines. Another belonged to Jews from Cilicia, a province of Asia Minor, and one of the leaders in it was a young theological student from Tarsus, a city of Cilicia, whose name was Saul.

III. The deacon worsted in argument. Stephen's logic and eloquence were too much for the Jews, but they found a way to overcome his arguments—a way which has often been taken by religious leaders who have more power than wisdom—they killed the preacher. They procured false witnesses against him, as had been done against his Master a few years before, in presence of the same court [Mark 14: 57-60], and by these they proved that Stephen had spoken against the temple and the customs of Moses. His defense was remarkable and should be carefully studied. Its chief points are:

1. God's work with men is progressive. It was progressive with Abraham and Joseph and Moses in the wilderness. Judaism itself was not the end, but only a step toward the fulfillment, of God's purposes for the world.

2. God's presence was not confined to Jews, nor was the temple the only holy place. In Mesopotamia God appeared to Abraham. In Egypt he led Joseph and wrought wonders through Moses. In the desert he gave Moses "living oracles to give unto us." God did not dwell exclusively in the temple. He would go with his church into the whole world.

3. Israel had always first rejected deliverers sent by God and afterwards accepted them. So Joseph was rejected by his brethren. So was Moses treated. "This Moses whom they refused . . . hath God sent to be both a ruler and a deliverer." So had they done with Jesus, of whom Moses spoke, saying, "The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a prophet, from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me."

At this point [v. 50] the hearers of Stephen seem to have caught the meaning of his argument and to have broken out in such disturbance that he had to close his speech abruptly. However, he made one more point:

4. He declared that they, not he, were guilty of the charge of blasphemy against Moses and against God. Their fathers had resisted the Holy Spirit by persecuting the prophets who had foretold the coming of the Righteous One, and they themselves had betrayed and murdered him.

IV. The martyred deacon. His death was accomplished by the same hate which slew Christ. Yet one can hardly help a feeling of sympathy with these persecutors, who represented Jewish religion, and held its sacred offices, and stained their hands with martyrs' blood, in the vain hope of saving those things which they failed to see had been doomed to die by the onward movement of the Holy Spirit. Stephen's doctrine was indeed radical for that time. Peter and the other apostles are conspicuously absent from this scene. It is probable that they were hardly ready as yet to accept all Stephen's conclusions. The temple, with its time-honored ritual, the familiar ways by which holy men had for ages approached God in worship, even the very organization which guarded the divine revelation of truth to men, were all to pass away. Is it strange that devout men sought to put him out of the way? Those who claim to be leaders of the people in God's name must either move forward with his movement or come into collision with it. Nor is it easy to learn so to treat reverently what the past has made sacred as not to be blind to the new light which God gives, and not to treat as enemies those who point to the way which the new light discloses.

Stephen is a noble example for those who are called to suffer for the truth's sake which those who hate them will not see. The first Christian martyr was not an apostle, not a native born Jew, but a Greek, whose sweet spirit, loving ministries and holy consecration won for him the reverence of the whole church and the glory of giving his young life for Christ. In the hour of death his face shone, not with anger, but with reflected glory. When his thought turned toward his persecutors his prayer was simply, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge." The murderous stones smote him on brow and breast. Bruised, bleeding and crushed, as he knelt he sank to earth, but with an inward calm which his tormentors could not break. As the howls of the infuriated mob rang in his ears "he fell asleep."

O, for a life like that and a death like that! "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee, because he trusteth in thee."

THE CHURCH PRAYER MEETING.

Topic, Feb. 14–20. What Makes Life Worth Living. Rom. 1: 16, 17; 1 Pet. 1: 3–9; Luke 6: 20–23; Phil. 3: 20, 21; 4: 1.

A perfect redemption. An abiding companionship. A sure and blessed hope. Sharing all these with others.

TRADE MARK,

The best $50.00 Hair Mattress made is not its equal in cleanliness, durability or comfort. We pay all express charges anywhere, and sell on the distinct agreement that you may return it and get your money back (if not completely satisfactory) at the end of Thirty Days' Free Trial.

Patent Elastic Felt consists of airy, interlacing, fibrous sheets, of snowy whiteness and great elasticity; closed in the tick by hand, and never mats, loses shape or gets lumpy. Is perfectly dry, non-absorbent, and is guaranteed absolutely vermin proof. Tick may be removed for washing without trouble. Softer and purer than hair can be; no repicking or restuffing necessary.

Rochester City Hospital, Rochester, N. Y., March 2, 1894.

Dear Sirs:—The mattresses have arrived, and are certainly equal to new. I am glad, indeed, to add my testimony to the many which you have already received as to the excellence of the Patent Elastic Felt Mattresses. It is surely proof enough of their superiority to say that after having had from twenty to twenty-five years' hard, constant use, without any renovation whatever, they have now been made practically new at less than one-half the original cost. HELEN M. GAMWELL, Superintendent.

How to Order. State exact size mattress desired (size 6 ft. 2 in. x 4 ft. 6 in. will be sent unless otherwise specified) and give address plainly. Remit by check, money order, express order, or New York draft, and mattress will be shipped same day.

Not For Sale at Stores.

If you are skeptical, or don't need one now, send for our handsome pamphlet, "The Test of Time," mailed free for the asking. It gives full particulars and prices. Also write for Book, "Church Cushions"; we refer to 25,000 Churches we have furnished.

PROGRESS OF THE KINGDOM.

MISSIONARY SHIPS.

(Parallel with The Congregationalist's March Topic for Missionary Meetings.)

Missionary ships for conveying missionaries and supplies to foreign lands are by no means modern missionary agencies. Vessels bought and equipped by zealous promoters of Christians missions were common centuries before the present missionary era, but such enterprises were usually pursued with mixed motives and not without political and commercial, as well as religious, ends in view. Even the Jersey Packet, the first missionary vessel of the United Brethren, engaged in barter with the Eskimos. This small sloop was sent out in 1770 by the Ship's Company, an English organization composed of members of the Moravian Society for the Futherance of Gospel, for the use of its Labrador mission. The following year a larger vessel, the Amity, was purchased, and this was replaced in turn by the Good Intent and the Harmony. There exists an interesting document signed by Benjamin Franklin, minister plenipotentiary at the court of France, requesting all captains and commanders of vessels of war and privateers to give protection and assistance, if necessary, to the Good Intent. This safe-conduct is dated Passy, 1779. Franklin says that the "mission on the coast of Labrador, for the conversion of the savages there to the Christian religion, has already had good effects in turning them from their ancient practices of surprising, plundering and murdering such white people as for purposes of trade or fishery happened to come on that coast, and persuading them to lead a new life of honest industry and to treat strangers with humanity and kindness."

In 1797 the Ship's Company was dissolved and the mission packet transferred to the management of the Moravian Missionary Society. The vessel which now makes its annual trip, attended by fierce storms and in imminent peril from drift-ice, from London to Labrador and back is known as the Harmony and is the fourth bearing this name. Other Moravian mission ships now in use are the Herald on the Mosquito Coast and the Bethel Star in Alaska.

Though the United Brethren claim to be pioneers in sending out mission packets, the first Protestant missionary society to launch a vessel under its own auspices was the London Missionary Society. It was in 1796, only the year after the organization of this society, that the ship Duff hoisted the mission flag, "three white doves with olive branches on a purple field," and sailed for the South Seas, carrying thirty missionaries. Three years later she was captured by a French privateer. Other missionary organizations early recognized the need of mission ships. Work among the islands of the Pacific could not be carried on without their aid, and boats on African rivers and lakes were important factors in penetrating the Dark Continent. Eventually there came to be two classes of mission vessels—those which, like the American Board's Morning Star, make annual trips between the home land and the foreign field, carrying missionaries and natives from place to place as well as providing supplies, and smaller craft which are entirely devoted to touring from one mission station to another. Examples of this class are the Hiram Bingham and Robert W. Logan of the American Board, which cruise about among the Micronesian Islands, the Good News on Lake Tanganyika, under the auspices of the London Missionary Society, and the Gospel Medical Boat, used by the American Presbyterian missionaries for itinerating on the Canton River, China. The gospel boat on the River Seine, in connection with the McAll Mission, has accommodations for evangelistic meetings on its deck and is really a floating mission. Indeed, such is the work and influence of these touring vessels that most of them deserve to be thus characterized.

Let us turn back for a moment to note some of the famous mission ships of the L M. S. The Duff was followed by the Messenger of Peace, built in Rarotonga by Rev. John Williams, with no help but such as the natives could give. In his youth this apostle to the South Seas was apprenticed to an ironmonger and practiced the manufacture of all kinds of iron work, little thinking that he should employ this knowledge in constructing a vessel among the islands of Polynesia. He had almost no materials but such as he made himself, and his ingenuity in constructing a pair of bellows out of wood, in making charcoal out of cocoanut trees, in welding and working iron, splitting trees with wedges, fastening the planks with wooden pins in default of nails, using cocoanut husk for oakum and bark of the hibiscus for ropes, in employing native mats for sails and for the fastening of a rudder "a piece of a pickaxe, a cooper's adze and a large hoe," remind us of the exploits of Robinson Crusoe. In less than four months The Messenger of Peace was in the water and for several years the little craft did good service, until it was succeeded by a larger vessel, the Camden. After the martyrdom of Williams the children in the Sunday schools of England raised funds for a handsome new ship, which was named the John Williams and sailed for Tahiti in 1844. There have now been four missionary vessels bearing that name. The last John Williams, a fine large steamship costing $85,000, was launched two or three years ago, and is by far the best missionary vessel in service. That too, was built and is partly supported by English Congregational children.

The first mission vessel that went from the United States was the Missionary Packet sent out by the American Board to the Sandwich Islands in 1826. Now the missionary fleet of the Board consists of the Morning Star, the fourth of that name built by means of children's offerings, the Hiram Bingham and the Robert W. Logan. All three are connected with the Micronesian Mission. These last two schooners are used exclusivly for touring among the Gilbert Islands, the Mortlock group and in the Ruk Archipelago. It would be delightful to be on board the Morning Star on one of her annual trips from San Francisco to Micronesia, to see the crowds of welcoming natives come out to meet the vessel in their canoes and hear the glad shout of "Morning Star! Morning Star!" to witness the joy of the isolated missionaries at receiving mail and tidings from home, to land at Kusaie and visit the training schools and girls' boarding school. It would be interesting to continue the journey among the beautiful coral islands, make the acquaintance of the native helpers who are conveyed from island to island, as well as of the boys and girls being carried to and from the Kusaie schools; and, in company with the visiting missionaries, to enter the native churches and homes and mark the difference between the Christian and pagan islanders.

We are unable to do more than to call attention to other noted mission vessels—the Southern Cross, which was associated with Bishop Patteson's work in New Zealand; the three ships in succession bearing the name of Allen Gardiner, sent out by the South American Missionary Society to the Falkland Islands and Patagonia; and the famous Daysprings, which, through the efforts of Dr. J. G. Paton, the Presbyterian Church has been able to build for service among the New Hebrides. It will be remembered that Dr. Paton personally gave a large sum of money, accruing from the sales of his autobiography, towards the last vessel of this name, and that it has been wrecked within a few months.

Readers of our Conversation Corner will not need to be reminded of Dr. Grenfell's steamer, the Sir Donald, which ministers to the diseased bodies as well as to the souls of the thousands of fishermen on the coast of Labrador. This brings to our notice another class of mission ships. In 1893 there were sixteen steam or sailing mission vessels and forty-one other boats for ministering to the crews on board ships and to the isolated inhabitants of remote islets, deepwater forts and coastguards. Dr. Grenfell is to be in Boston the last week in February, and there will be opportunities to hear him tell, in his earnest, manly way, the story of his work in connection with the Labrador branch of the Mission to Deep Sea Fishermen.

WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING.

CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, FEB. 5.

Mrs. Doremus Scudder, formerly of Japan, now of Woburn, after the Scripture selection, Heb. 11: 32-40 and 12: 1, 2, spoke of the Christian witness of the lives of the missionaries. As an illustration of love for the work she cited David Livingstone, one among many whose devotion has been remarkable. The joy that is possible in this service has appealed to all who know Mrs. Montgomery of Adana, who has often been quoted the last year as saying that she regarded it the crowning blessing of her life that she was permitted to share with her adopted people the special trials which have come to them. Mrs. Stover had said she would go anywhere but to Africa, and now would not wish to be anywhere else. Mrs. Scudder also spoke of the delight and satisfaction which she herself had found in the foreign field.

Mrs. Thompson, enlarging a little upon the exhortation given to modern heroes, with the high standard set before them, spoke of Miss Gilson's desire, as she takes up the new work in Gazaland and finds so many common, everyday matters to be looked after, that the spiritual side of the work may have its true place.

Another spoke of her own interest in foreign missions being aroused and fostered by "Uncle Albert," the familiar name by which she knew Dr. Albert Bushnell, who wished to be sent to "a hard field," and who went to the Gaboon Mission in West Africa, where he now rests.

Mrs. Joseph Cook spoke of the traveler's first impression in looking at large companies of Chinese or Japanese or Hindus; whether it be in any degree an impression of repulsion or of some appreciation of the really beautiful characteristics, it is by no means the feeling which Mrs. Edward Hume has when she talks about her girls in Bombay as "the most beautiful girls in the world."

Mrs. Greene gave her impressions of a large Chinese Sunday school which she had recently visited, where she had watched individual faces attentive to the teacher and intent upon the lesson of the hour. Mrs. Strong read an extract from a recent letter from Miss Matthews of Monastir, expressing great joy in being permitted to return to her work there after being unavoidably detained in this country.

Mrs. Billings presented a request from Miss Sheldon that the school at Adabazar might be remembered in the petitions for schools and colleges, and in the prayer which followed not only the school was included, but each teacher was named.

Miss Lamson read a letter from Miss Bessie Noyes of Madura, in which she referred to a Friday meeting, where she asked special prayer for one of the girls in the school and a gracious answer came. The request was renewed in behalf of the same girl, who speaks of herself as having "come out of heathenism," and who, while striving to live as a Christian, still finds the struggle constant.

BOOK REVIEWS.

THE LIFE OF NAPOLEON BONAPARTE.

The first volume of Prof. W. B. Sloane's biography of the great emperor reminds one pleasantly of the gratification with which its chapters have been read in the columns of the Century Magazine. But for many of us no serial publication possibly can equal in interest the reading of a work as a whole, and there can be no doubt that this and the succeeding volumes of the work will find ready welcome. We are surprised by the size of the book. Evidently it is not intended for general circulation, because it is much too large to be held in the hand. It hardly can be held in both hands. It will find its way into libraries but it will not be circulated to anything like the extent which might have been possible had it been printed in a more manageable form. Nevertheless, to print it thus would have involved some real sacrifice of valuable features. It is one of those sumptuous works which all admire. Paper, type and binding are of the finest and the lavishness and beauty of its illustrations are noteworthy. Many of them are full-page plates in color and a number also apparently are offered to the public in this manner for the first time. They add more than easily can be described to the interest of the volume.

The characteristics of the work, of course, have become well known already. It is a minute and painstaking examination of Napoleon's history, this volume carrying the narrative as far as 1797. It deals with the great emperor as a man and as a soldier and politician. Without going as much into particulars about his habits as some other works have gone, it nevertheless presents a conscientiously studied portrayal of his characteristics, his family and the incidents of his career, and draws many inferences as to motives and purposes. It is successfully impartial, recognizing on the one hand the remarkable ability of Napoleon, which amounted to positive genius in some respects, and also appreciating his limitations, his weaknesses and his faults. It reveals distinctly his utter selfishness and unscrupulousness, but it also makes plain the single exception—his unfaltering devotion to the members of his immediate family. It brings out more clearly than any other history which we remember the truth about the period during which he was watching for his opportunity, scheming, writing, now waiting in obscurity, now hurrying to and fro and gaining prominence at one moment and in one place, only to drop back again immediately out of sight, cultivating those whom he thought might aid him, perhaps only to drop them as soon as he found he had no more use for them, reckless of his professional duties, often discouraged, always recuperating, and never without a keen eye for the main chance.

To learn of the several volumes which he wrote and published during his early years, one or two of which attained considerable success in their way, will surprise many readers. The development of his strange character is skillfully outlined and so is the coincidence of great good fortune with his increasingly clear comprehension of his own abilities and his daring, and even defiant, use of opportunities. That he had great good luck, as we say sometimes, is unquestionable, but that he also was, as he so often has been called, one of the greatest generals in history may be conceded. His greatness lay partly in the fact that he had the shrewdness to recognize the limitations of the existing military tactics and theories and to become an innovator. He defeated his older antagonists by taking them by surprise through his new applications of military principles quite as often as by his daring or by the numbers of his troops.

Only the beginning of his career as a politician and statesman comes into view in this volume, but it is significant of what we know the remainder to have been. Here, too, the same unscrupulousness begins to display itself, the same wily plotting and maneuvering to subject foreign states to himself by subjecting them to France, and in browbeating and out-maneuvering the Directory so as to render it, however reluctant it might be, and France through it, his ready tool. All in all it is, indeed, a striking and impressive portrait and one inherently truthful which Professor Sloane has drawn. The author's style is straightforward and entertaining. It is learned without being pedantic and highly enjoyable. The work differs from most others upon the same theme in that it is somewhat more thorough in research and more free from bias in description, while equally graphic and engrossing. The author has consulted freely and intelligently the works of many specialists and, while it lacks the gossipy character which some other recent biographies of Napoleon have possessed, it is on that very account the more trustworthy. [Century Co. $7 00.]

RELIGIOUS.

The Gospel in Brief [T. Y. Crowell & Co. $1.25] is by the famous Count Lyof N. Tolstoi and has been translated from the Russian, the original not being permitted to be published in Russia. It is a translation of the third and fourth volumes of a series of the author's religious and philosophical writings, undertaken with his own approval. It is an attempt to harmonize the four gospels into a continuous narrative, but there are many omissions. It is put in modern language, and, whatever may prove to be the result as regards the original wherever it can be read, it is safe enough to say that it will fail to attract very much attention among English readers. Such an endeavor to reproduce the gospels in an improved form makes more conspicuous than ever the impossibility of such a task. No one familiar with the simple and beautiful gospel narrative ever will care to read this, except as a sort of literary curiosity. The preface is far more interesting than the body of the book, for in the preface the author sets forth the theory and purpose of his work. It is well intended, for his aim is to bring out simply and clearly the teaching of Jesus, unhampered by any interpretations of others. Others, however, may object to the author's interpretations.

The Resurrection of Christ [Presbyterian Board of Publication and S. S. Work. 75 cents], by Rev. J. H. Brookes, D. D., is a devout and careful study of the subject, defending the doctrine from the attacks of its enemies and setting forth its value to the Christian believer. It is well conceived and well executed in the sense of being a compact and easily readable statement of the essential facts.

Primitive Buddhism [Scott, Foresman & Co. $1.50] is by Elizabeth A. Reed. It is a concise hand-book, in which technical terms have been avoided as far as possible, and it supplies an analysis of the essential features of Buddhism, with some history of its development and its literature. The author is a scholar and has special familiarity with her theme, and her work has been examined and indorsed by a considerable number of distinguished Orientalists. It will take a prominent place immediately among trustworthy treatises on its subject. ——In the Tiger Jungle [F. H. Revell Co. $1.00] is a missionary record. It is the work of Rev. Dr. Jacob Chamberlain, and Dr. F. E. Clark has supplied the introduction. It is not a continuous narrative so much as a collection of incidents, but they do not lack sufficient consecutiveness to render them harmonious elements of an enjoyable whole. The field is India and the author has written out of long experience and keen observation. His chapters give vivid pictures of missionary experiences and the book will properly take its place on the shelves of the Sunday school library, but it will not remain long at a time on the shelves.

In Sabbath Day's Journeys [F. H. Revell Co. $1 00] Rev. Dr. W. J. Harsha presents a series of studies based upon the thirty-third chapter of Numbers. He treats the chapter not as a mere catalogue of stopping places in the desert, but as a portrayal of the work of sanctification in the soul. He displays considerable ingenuity in drawing lessons from the names which the chapter presents, and his book is enjoyable for its spiritual and practical suggestiveness.——Corn on the Mountains [F. H. Revell Co. $1.25] is the title of a volume of discourses by Rev. John Robertson, a Glasgow preacher. They are spirited and practical, adapted to plain people and intended and likely to stir them. We regret that it is necessary to add in fairness that they are much more sensational in portions than we like. We are not afraid of a certain sensationalism in the pulpit, if it be reverently intended and properly restrained, but some passages of these sermons seem to us to go too far.

Four Bible Studies [A. C. Armstrong & Son. 75 cents], by J. H. Osborne, deals with the parables of the Friend at Midnight, and the Importunate Widow, with Prayer, especially that of Elijah in his contest with Ahab, and with the parable in the first thirteen verses of Luke 16 upon making friends with the mammon of unrighteousness. The author offers fresh and suggestive interpretations and his book will be found helpful to a right understanding of the true relation of prayer to spiritual growth. It is scholarly and well written as well as somewhat original.——The Point of Contact in Teaching [J. D. Wattles Co. 60 cents] is by Patterson Du Bois. It is written principally for Sunday school teachers and points out the importance of finding common ground with the pupil to begin with and of building one's edifice of instruction and influence thereupon. A great deal of wise and timely instruction will be found in its pages.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

One more Life of George Washington [Harper & Bros. $3.00] is Prof. Woodrow Wilson's, and it is one of the best in many respects. It has been published already in Harper's Magazine in monthly parts. The author accepts the traditional view of Washington to a greater extent than Mr. Ford, whose book we noticed recently, and it is in a much greater degree an example of hero worship, yet the author does not lose his self-control and the picture which he presents undoubtedly is not only true to facts, as far as facts are depended upon, but also largely true in respect to the general atmosphere and color. If treatment of the more coldly critical character represents the Washington who really existed, as viewed under a microscope, so to speak, the larger and freer treatment here adopted presents an equally real Washington—the man viewed in the less strongly focused light of his times and his record, and this, after all, is the Washington whom the world chiefly knew and to whom it has looked back with reverence ever since. Professor Wilson's style is a fine blending of vigor and grace. One reads with increasing delight his pictures of character and of occurrences. He has written with enthusiasm but not abandonment, and this is a life of Washington which cannot fail to interest young people exceedingly. It is an excellent example of spirited and patriotic, yet temperate and scholarly, although not critical, work. The volume is illustrated freely by Howard Pyle and others and is more than ordinarily attractive in every way.

Alexandre Dumas's Mary Stuart, Queen of Scots [Merriam Co. $1.50] has been translated by J. M. Howell. It is a skillful turning of a biography into a story or a story into a biography, we hardly know which. The history of the famous queen is narrated in some detail, but with all the movement and incident characteristic of a good novel. The events of Mary's career adapt themselves readily to this treatment, but only a master hand could attain such a degree of success in shaping them. The authorities for historical statements ordinarily are not given and evidently the author has allowed himself considerable freedom in description, yet we doubt not that the history is substantially true to fact, and probably it also affords an essentially fair representation of Mary's character. If it err at all, it is in the direction of approval and indorsement, but it does not attempt to veil her evident faults.

On the whole, Miss Alice Brown's portrayal of the character and writings of Mercy Warren [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25], in the pleasant series about Women of Colonial and Revolutionary Times, is just, although it possibly overestimates her prominence. It also is delightfully vivacious and readable. Mrs. Warren, whose husband was one of the most useful of the Revolutionary leaders in Massachusetts, and who herself was the author of poems which in their day had some repute, and of a history of the Revolution, of which we never happened to hear before and which did not attain general or prolonged fame, was a woman of great energy, unusual public spirit and a degree of culture then exceptional, and one who was a recognized force in the community and to some extext beyond it. In describing her the author has revealed afresh and vividly the peculiar features of the New England life of the later colonial and early national period, and every page is full of interest.

STORIES.

Five issues of the new Riverside edition of Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe's works have come to hand, viz.: My Wife and I, We and Our Neighbors, Old Town Folks and Sam Lawson, Poganuc People and Pink and White Tyranny, and Stories for the Young, respectively [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.50]. We need say no more of them than that they supply their author's thousands of admirers with her characteristic stories in a very tasteful and convenient shape.——St. Ann's [Cassell Co. 50 cents], by W. E. Norris, is not an example of the author's best work, but is a somewhat interesting story, chiefly of English country life, in which one or two striking characters save the tale from being commonplace.——On the Red Staircase [A. C. McClurg & Co. $1.25], by M. Imlay Taylor, is a new addition to what may be now called the Prisoner of Zenda library. It is a fiery and daring tale of public and private affairs in the Russia of the last quarter of the seventeenth century. The hero is a French diplomat at the Russian court, and the author has made a dramatic study of the rough and picturesque characteristics of the Russian character and life of the time. It is a fairly good piece of work as touches execution.

Lady Bramber's Ghost [Stone & Kimball. $1 25], by Charles Charrington, is not a specially interesting story, although well written. It describes the strange career of an eccentric, not to say insane, individual who was really the working partner of an unacknowledged literary firm consisting of an author who wrote and a fashionable lady who was supposed to have written their results. The best that can be said of it is that his painful and peculiar history is described in good English.——By the same author is A Sturdy Beggar [Stone & Kimball. $1.25], which is also out of the common in that it deals with a morbid state of mind on the part of its hero, which at last develops into insanity. It sets forth more or less sincerely certain views of art, and, like his other book, is carefully and effectively composed, but it will hardly make much of an impression upon the public.

Urban Dialogues [Stone & Kimball. $1.25], by L. E. Shipman, is light but bright and amusing, with a good deal of shrewd suggestion in the way of comment upon modern society. Some of its contents have appeared in Life and Leslie's Weekly. Its scene is laid in New York and its actors are New York society men and women, and there are many keen hits in its pages.——Maria Louise Pool, in her volume of short stories, entitled Boss and Other Dogs [Stone & Kimball. $1.25], has displayed impressively her affection for dogs and has described a considerable number of canine friends in a variety of conditions and circumstances. Her familiar power of graphic delineation finds ample room in work of this sort, and her stories are excellent throughout. The loving fidelity of the dog's nature and the obligation to treat animals kindly are suggested impressively.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Another admirable book on its subject is The Story of Architecture [D. Appleton & Co. $3.00] by C. T. Mathews. It gives an outline of the architectural styles in all countries beginning with the architecture of Egypt and Nubia. It discusses also that of India and Southern Asia in general, that of Eastern Asia, Mexico, Central America and Peru, and then going back to Asia it takes up that of Assyria and Western Asia, and then to Greek, Etruscan and Roman and the Byzantine styles. The early Christian, the Saracenic, the Romanesque, the Gothic, ecclesiastical and secular, and the style of the Renaissance have their turns, and the closing chapter deals with American architecture. Perhaps the chief merit of the book is the fact that its learning, which is that of a master, is put so successfully at the disposal of the general reader. Without any sacrifice of scholarly quality the volume is extremely popular in style. Of course it is impossible for such a treatise to go deeply into details, nor is it necessary. The essential features of different styles are reproduced distinctly and with a good sense of proportion. Criticism is not lacking, for the book is no mere catalogue of styles, but it is intelligent and good-natured. The chapter on American architecture points out the fact that remarkable progress has been made among us during the last half-century, progress which is recognized abroad as well as claimed at home. The lavish illustration of the volume adds greatly to its attractiveness and its usefulness. It is a good book to be placed in the libraries of schools and colleges. It is also well adapted for the domestic shelves, where it will be consulted oftener than one at first would be likely to suppose.

Mr. Albert D. Vandam certainly has written an interesting book in his Under Currents of the Second Empire [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50]. It is based upon personal recollections and notes, made during many years, of conversations with relatives and acquaintances whose intimacy with the rulers and other influential people at the French capital was such as to give them exceptional opportunities of forming valuable opinions. The book is a useful addition to the literature of its subject. Without being one of the strongest, it is interesting and sometimes even gossipy. It is asserted to be based upon substantial evidence, but this is rarely supplied or referred to except in general. One must take the author's word almost always for the accuracy of what he says. This may be proper enough to do, but the free and easy manner in which he writes does not convince the reader absolutely of his self-control and trustworthiness. We have no reason to dispute any of his statements, but if they were made less in the manner of the ordinary newspaper correspondent, meaning well but writing in haste, we should regard them as more certainly to be depended upon. The picture which is drawn of the Emperor Napoleon III. is pitiable but doubtless mainly correct. Mr. Vandam seems to agree entirely with those who attribute to the empress much of the blame for the overthrow of the empire.

Last Days of Knickerbocker Life in New York [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50] is by the late A. C. Dayton, formerly a resident of New York city, and it deals with New York as it was from about 1830 to 1870. Its contents were printed in 1880, but mainly for private circulation. The author has an admirable style, and has furnished pleasant pictures of the comparatively staid and quiet, yet evidently enjoyable, life of the city in the days before modern bustle, growth and change had begun to affect it very much. Perhaps too large an amount of space proportionately is given to theatrical matters, and certainly some of the allusions to the church, clergymen and their friends are indefensible, but these are rare and doubtless unintentional, and in spite of them the volume is readable and has considerable value as an historical picture. It is illustrated with portraits and other pictures.

The Power of Thought [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.75], by J. D. Sterrett, is a treatise on psychology which impresses the reader pleasantly at once by a naturalness and simplicity of style quite unusual in works upon its subject. It is the most readable volume of its class which we ever have seen, and is also really able. Its main doctrine is that all action is the outcome of thinking in some form. Conduct only reveals and cannot help revealing the progress of knowledge. As Prof. J. M. Bartlett remarks in the introduction, Mr. Sterrett's manner of "stratifying consciousness, as it were, in periods, beginning with the earliest infancy, leads him to a thoroughgoing genetic method,'' and he is believed to be the first to embody this in a text-book. In philosophy Mr. Sterrett may be termed a dualist, but he is an independent thinker and has not hesitated to abandon some positions which others have advocated. The volume, of course, is one which appeals to a select class of readers and students rather than to the general public, but we can assure all who concern themselves especially with its theme that they will find it abundantly worthy of careful study.

Dr. W. A. Edwards and Miss Beatrice Harraden have combined forces in writing Two Health Seekers in Southern California [J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.00]. Of the eight chapters Miss Harraden has written two, her colleague supplying the remainder. The book is intended chiefly for the benefit of those who are thinking of visiting California for their health, and deals with the climate, the cost of living, the details of life and other practical matters, some of them somewhat technical. It is not intended at all to possess the interest of a narrative or a picture. As an authority upon the subject it discusses it will have force, although there seems to be some difference of opinion among people familiar with the country in respect to certain points discussed.——In Bamboo Lands, by Katherine S. Baxter [Merriam Co. $2.50], is a story of travel in Japan and represents such an experience as any traveler may have there, and such as, after reading it, everybody must desire to have. It is written entertainingly and illustrated lavishly and admirably. Among the many charming books on Japan it must take a high place. It does not attempt to deal with religious, political or educational matters, but confines itself to personal observations and experiences, and in every respect is a fascinating book.——The Yosemite as I Saw It [Damrell & Upham. 50 cents], by Dr. Cora A. Morse, is a vivacious and entertaining account of the author's journey through the Yosemite region, made up from letters written home. It is published by request, is charmingly illustrated and will be helpful to intending tourists.

The Critical Review [Charles Scribner's Sons. Imported. $2.00] has come to hand in the bound volume for 1896. As those of our readers who see its numbers are aware, it is one of the most profoundly learned publications in the line of comment upon theology and philosophy, and theological professors will prize this permanent embodiment of its diversified contents.——The Macmillan Co. send us a pretty little edition of Gulliver's Travels [50 cents], by the famous Jonathan Swift. It is small, but clearly printed.——The bound volume of Littell's Living Age [Living Age Co. $2.25] for October, November and December, 1896, makes a thoroughly interesting volume and justifies abundantly the strong hold which this publication possesses upon the public.——The sixty-eighth volume of the Sailor's Magazine [American Seaman's Friend Society. $1 25] includes the issues for last year and embodies much interesting material, picturing the spiritual successes of the missionaries of the American Seaman's Friend Society. In its way it is a very valuable record.

NOTES.

—— Not long ago The Youth's Companion offered prizes for short stories. It is reported to have received about 7,200.

—— The volume which Mr. Gladstone has owned longest is—he states in a letter to Mr. Bernard Quaritch, the London book dealer—a copy of Mrs. Hannah More's Sacred Dramas, given him by the author herself in 1815.

—— The large-paper edition of John Fiske's American Revolution originally cost $16, but copies have recently changed hands for $30 at private sale. Money put into some books is well invested, but it is important to choose the right books.

—— Leutze's famous painting, Washington Crossing the Delaware, was bought at the sale of the Marshall O. Roberts collection in New York, by Mr. John S. Kennedy, for $16,100, who announces his purpose to give it to the Metropolitan Museum of Art.

—— Mr. McClure of McClure's Magazine is at odds with Mr. W. W. Astor, proprietor of the Pall Mall Magazine, over that bright story, St. Ives. The former bought it for serial publication in America, agreeing that it should also appear in the Pall Mall, forgetting that the Pall Mall has an American edition.

—— Don Raimundo de Madrazo, the Spanish portrait painter, is now in New York for a short stay. He has painted portraits of a number of well-known Americans, among whom are Mr. and Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt, Sr., Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., and the late Robert L. Stuart.

—— William Morris's poem, The Lovers of Gudrun, which many consider his best, was substantially written at a single sitting. He worked at it one day from 4 A. M. to 4 P. M. The Kelmscott Press, which Mr. Morris founded, has gone out of business, not for lack of success but because nobody else can be found to carry it on as he did.

MR. MEYER IN BOSTON.

Though Rev. F. B. Meyer of London h been a frequent and welcome visitor to t
Northfield summer convocations, he was nev heard in Boston until last week. His pre ence, therefore, in the city for three da furnished a rare opportunity for those w have hitherto known him only by reputati or through his books Seldom does an enti stranger in so short a time make so decide an impression upon all classes of religio people. Mr. Moody was wise in securing th London pastor to supplement his efforts this city and New York.

Owing to the tardiness of the Majestic, M
Meyer did not reach Boston until nine o'clo
Thursday evening. He was whirled rapid to Mechanics Building, where 6,000 Christi
Endeavorers gave him an enthusiastic Cha tauqua welcome. It was their annual celeb tion of Endeavor Day and for nearly an ho
Mr. Moody had been holding their eager a tention while he discoursed on Daniel, b most of the great audience would gladly ha remained many minutes longer could th
have heard from Mr. Meyer. He, howeve had another audience waiting for him at T mont Temple, and was able only to bring t greetings of the London Endeavor Union, which he is president, and in tender, searc
ing words to urge upon his young hearers t great importance of distinguishing betwe working for Christ and letting Christ, by t
Holy Spirit, work through them.

Friday and Saturday were busy days f
Mr. Meyer. On Saturday he spoke not le than five times. In addition to the meetin morning, afternoon and evening at Tremo
Temple, he was heard by the Faneuil Hall a dience, which has been assembling eve noon to listen to Mr. Murphy, and he met t ministers of Boston for an informal soci conference late in the afternoon.

This gathering, convened by Dr. Lorim and embracing more than 200 ministers different denominations, proved especial delightful and instructive for those for who it was primarily designed. Tea and coff were served, and while Dr. Lorimer and M
Meyer sat on the platform one after anoth of the brethren would come forward for friendly handshake. Then Mr. Meyer spo concerning the way in which ministers shou teach the doctrine of the Spirit. They shou not bear down upon it continually to t weariness of their people, nor should th imply that spirituality is incompatible wi the hardest kind of practical Christian se ice. He then submitted himself to the proce known on the other side as "heckling," a questions came from all parts of the hou touching this matter of the deeper Christi experience. To them all Mr. Meyer respond tenderly and discreetly, and the sweetness his spirit, coupled with his downright go sense, won a place for him in every heart.

On Sunday there was no let-up in the d mands upon the London pastor, and the thr large auditoriums in which he spoke we filled to overflowing, even though the d was the most unpleasant Sunday thus far th winter. At Tremont Temple in the morni his text was Zech. 3: 2, and his subject T
Believer as a Priest. At Shawmut, in t afternoon, his theme was The Second Ada and he dwelt upon the advantages which co to believers through fellowship with the ris
Christ, who permits them to share his po tion, his victory and his gifts. In the eve
ing, at Clarendon Street Baptist Churc where he was much moved as he stood in t pulpit of his beloved friend, the late Dr. Go don, Mr. Meyer spoke from Isa. 33: 21, "B there the glorious Lord will be unto us place of broad rivers and streams."

Mr. Meyer's discourses were marked b great simplicity of style, even when t thought was most subtle. He excels in a and original illustration, and the earnestne and sweetness of the man are the hamme that drive home his words. There is no tra of censoriousness. Though he seems to stand on distant hights, there is not the faintest suspicion of spiritual pride. He seems to long, most of all, to help his brethren higher. It is a sweet and comforting gospel which he brings.

Mr. Meyer went to New York on Monday and is holding meetings there this week. Though he expected to return to England the last of the week, he has been persuaded by Dr. Chapman of Philadelphia to spend Sunday in that city.

MR. MOODY'S BIRTHDAY PRESENT.

Mr. Moody, who is stopping at the Hotel Bellevue in this city, had two callers last Thursday evening, whose errand was one of more than usual importance. They were his stanch and tried friends, Rev. F. B. Meyer of London and Mr. Henry M. Moore of this city. Before they left they presented him with $30,000 as a birthday gift from his friends in England and America.

When Mr. Meyer was in Northfield last summer, he went with Mr. Moody one day to Mt. Hermon, across the river, and learned of the imperative need of a chapel for the students. He at once took Mr. Moore one side, and suggested the possibility of signalizing Mr. Moody's approaching birthday by a present tnat would permit the erection of such a building. Another devoted friend of Northfield, a Mr. Huston, a Quaker from Coatesville, Pa., at once joined the conspirators, and the gift presented last week is the outcome of their united efforts.

On the other side of the Atlantic the purpose was made known through the papers as well as through circular letters, but here the money has come as the result of private solicitation only. In England men like Lord Kinnard and George Williams have been among the givers to the fund, which has come in in sums ranging from £100 to pennies and postage stamps. On this side there have been a number of gifts of $1,000 each, Mr. Huston, who acted as treasurer, heading the list with such a generous contribution. Several weeks ago he died, but his son readily came forward to take his father's place in the care of the fund, and added another $500 as his own gift. The Boston committee includes in its membership such representative men as Messrs. Samuel Johnson, H. E. Cobb and E. S. Converse. The response of the Christian public here, as in England, has been most gratifying. The amount raised in England was about $13,000, and the amount raised in America about $17,000.

When it is remembered that Mr. Moody's schools educate each year 700 students, at a cost to the individual of $100, it will be readily seen that he has all he can do, every year, to meet the running expenses, about $70,000 being needed in addition to what comes in from tuition fees. This chapel, then, is looked upon by him as a special boon. And it is not to be wondered at that, taking advantage of Mr. Meyer's presence in the city, he went, the next day after receiving the gift, to his Northfield home, to spend his birthday with his family and to think over the blessings which God has given him in his friends.

Where is that Sunday school in this country, mentioned thus in a letter to the Christian, London?

The teacher of one of the classes in a Sunday school connected with a prominent Presbyterian Church was approached before the lesson instruction one morning by an assistant of the superintendent, who said: "The lesson today is intended to illustrate a phase of the historic preparations for the gospel, therefore all mention of the name of Christ must carefully be excluded from the lesson today!" The lady thus addressed replied with feeling: "My scholars may some of them be in eternity before next Sunday and how can I forbear telling them about Christ as a Saviour?"

PASSING COMMENT ON THIS WEEK'S NEWS.

Very appropriate is the name of a new church in the Interior which has just consecrated its meeting house. The diversity of its membership, the evidences of its activity already manifest, its isolation from other churches in a growing neighborhood on the outskirts of a great city, and many other encouraging indications, should prove particularly favorable to its future.

A Boston district has been roused by a month's union efforts which for comprehension and harmony are seldom paralleled, especially in the complex make-up of a large city section. The participation of Episcopalians in the movement is specially noteworthy.

What better first fruits could be asked of those adults converted in Iowa than the establishing of family altars? If there are still unconverted members of those households, it is only reasonable to expect that they, too, will be brought into the fold.

A New Jersey church has learned how to develop its spirit of giving. Too many churches during the hard times are spending their missionary money at home.

A Nebraska church evidently appreciates the educational advantage of its location in a university town, and is living up to its privileges.

The novel invitation inscribed on a California house of worship carries us back to the affectionate simplicity of the early church.

Gratifying results obtained in a Minnesota church from most unpromising conditions encourage to patient, united effort.

That a Wisconsin church will accomplish the action recently taken is assured largely by the spirit of its decision.

Of Special Note.

Generosity of an Empire State church toward sufferers in the West.

Certain churches urging action by the Senate on the arbitration treaty.

A meeting house in Connecticut without pews for nearly a decade.

A magnanimous reward of faithful pastoral work in Cleveland.

A Western church which more than fulfills its promises.

Rapid church extension in the suburbs of a Nebraska town.

Heroic opposition to hard times in a Michigan church.

A STRONG UNION FOR REVIVAL WORK.

South Boston has witnessed a practical demonstration of Christian unity. Phillips Congregational Church began its special work by following the Week of Prayer services with a week of extra effort. Then all the evangelical churches, including the three Episcopal, joined in union services. The meetings were held in the various places of worship and were well attended, although two and often three services were held in different parts of the peninsula at the same time. Each pastor conducted the worship and the after meetings in his own church, according to his own custom and the usages of his denomination. In the Episcopal churches a part of the ritual was used, but the preaching was done by the pastors of the different denominations. On one occasion the rector clothed the two visiting Methodist ministers with robes, which they wore with good grace while they preached to his people.

The closing service was in the St. John's Methodist Church, and the genuine Christian fellowship which the meetings had fostered found expression in the official boards of all the churches kneeling at the altar and uniting in prayer for the divine blessing. While the meetings have been efficient in reaching outsiders, they have been especially notable in promoting and demonstrating real Christian union.

CHURCHES AND CIVICS IN ST. LOUIS.

Though last year was a dark one for religious work, yet through rifts in the clouds God's sunlight has poured. We have lost the pastor who seemed to connect us with those giants of the past, Drs. Goodell and Post—our beloved Adams, who went to California to be what he was here, a leader. His work fell on many, as did Dr. Quint's in Boston. But now Rev. D. M. Fisk is filling the new edifice on Compton Hill to the doors and making our hearts glad. Central Church, in the three years of Dr. Sargent's ministry, has welcomed to fellowship 119 persons—just doubling the membership. Pilgrim and First have seen magnificent ingatherings under Drs. Burnham and George. Fountain Park and Hyde Park, under Rev. Messrs. Vrooman and Jones, are in their new houses of worship, the one completed and the other so that it is usable. Reber Place has purchased a new lot in a location to hold its congregation and attract new people. Though Superintendent Love, of the City Missionary Society, departs, yet we hope for the coming of Supt. A. K. Wray and the division of the work of the weaker churches among the committees, so that greater interest will come from greater knowledge.

The committees appointed by the Congregational and Christian ministers of the city to promote closer fellowship and some form of union between the two denominations arranged for a general fraternal conference Feb. 8, when Dr. Burnham presented the Congregational side, and Dr. Garrison, editor of the leading Christian paper of the Mid-West, represented that sect. The Christians here are not identified with those known by that name in the East, but with those commonly called Disciples. They number 147,000 in this State alone. The spirit in which the meeting was planned promises much for peace and unity.

The Civic Federation is struggling with corruption in high places and in low, but grows stronger daily. It now enrolls 49,000 voters in the city and the clergy are in demand as speakers for its multiplying ward and precinct formations. Little more than a year ago less than a dozen men launched the new movement. Dr. W. W. Boyd, pastor of the largest Baptist church in the city, was chosen president and has thrown his magnificent manhood into it. Dr. C. S. Sargent, an original member, still represents the Congregationalists on the Central Committee. The great work of the last few months has been the preparation of a school bill, to be presented to the legislature. It was drawn up after consultation with the school boards of the eighteen largest cities in the United States. The present system, that of 1833, gives great power to a body of politicians, many of whom have proved unprincipled in the use of means and money. A number of them have been locked up in the State prison part of this past year. But now we hope for better things. The Civic Federation, too, will secure worthy candidates in both parties for the coming municipal election. S.

CONDITIONS IN SAN FRANCISCO.

Our Senator-Elect.

The wise men at Sacramento, in their biennial session, found little difficulty in returning Hon. G. C. Perkins to Washington. In the early days of California, while serving before the mast at six dollars per month, he entered the Golden Gate, and ever since has identified himself with the interests of the State, winning his way to fame and fortune. After four years as governor and two years in the Senate, completing the unexpired term of the late Senator Stanford, he is by no means a novice in politics. Though not college bred, he is a man of wide information; by no means a trained orator, he is nevertheless a pleasing and effective speaker. Popular throughout the State, particularly so with his party, his election is the expression of the will of the constituency. He is able in business and devoted to those honoring him, and California feels that she has a faithful public servant in him, as well as in Senator Stephen M. White, the pride of Los Angeles. Though not a church member, Mr. Perkins is an attendant, and for years has been identified with philanthropic work. His salary, it is said, is used for purposes of benevolence.

Race Course and Saloon in the Suburbs.

In Oakland there is trouble with the sporting fraternity. Recently, at an expense of about a quarter of a million, the California Jockey Club fitted up magnificently the race course on the outskirts of the city. Thither for several days once a fortnight go immense crowds, special trains connecting with the San Francisco boats. Against such demoralizing influences the clergy protested, finally appealing to the county authorities, but thus far the effort has been in vain. So strong is the financial side that morals appear to be of subordinate importance with those at present in power.

Beautiful Alameda has been somewhat more successful. Liquor dealers are realizing that the Anti-Saloon League is more than a name. Well organized and aggressive, it is pushing the war into the enemy's country, with the result that at least one seller of ardent spirits is minus his license. Rev. W. W. Scudder is among the leaders and several of his most substantial men support him. Preparations are now making for a hard-fought issue in the approaching municipal elections, when each precinct will have the privilege of refusing the saloon entrance.

Sympathy for Suffering India.

Mr. Berkeley B. Newman has addressed a mass meeting, the outcome of which was a purse of nearly $300, one enthusiast giving the price of a new piano. Then the interest widened. Delegates laid the matter before our ministerial meetings. A joint committee with overtures numerously signed waited upon the mayor, and now a metropolitan gathering is under consideration, which it is hoped will bring thousands of dollars for the starving millions. It is suggested that one or more vessels be chartered and that farmers be invited to fill their holds with wheat.

Christian Endeavorers,

Thirty thousand strong, throughout the State are making large plans for the July convention. From the 600 local societies it is estimated that nearly one-fourth of the membership will attend, while from along the coast and beyond the mountains 20,000 at least are expected. If not so large as former assemblies we mean the interest shall be as deep, the enthusiasm as great. Rumor has it, too, that some will be disappointed if one or more banners are not left with us, because of aggressive work—especially in the line of good citizenship. Knowing the reputation California has for hospitality, the committee in charge has wisely divided the labor, determined that the Lord's hosts shall have as cordial reception as has been accorded worldly conclaves here, and as other cities have given the Endeavor hosts. From various localities money is coming for expense. Several of the more important centers are planning for visiting delegations. Assured that the weather will be favorable, that San Francisco will receive her guests with open arms and that they will come in the spirit of the Master, we are anticipating a most helpful meeting—an object lesson to the whole community of the blessedness of those who remember their Creator in the days of youth. OCCIDENT.

ACROSS THE LINE.

Death of Rev. William Hay.

Rev. William Hay of Scotland, Ont., a unique figure of Canadian Congregationalism, died on Jan. 16, the seventy-fifth anniversary of his birth, and was buried three days later on the anniversary of his ordination to the ministry half a century ago. Scotland was is only pastorate, which he held from the time of his ordination until two and one-half years ago, when he retired with the office of honorary pastor. Such a pastorate is without parallel among the Congregational churches of Canada, and has few equals in the other denominations. The progressive and charitable spirit of the deceased and his close walk with the Master were marked features of his long and honorable career.

Changes in the Pastorates.

The New Year is usually marked by resignations and acceptances of pastorates, and the present one has been no exception, though the changes have been in filling rather than in vacating pulpits. The resignation at Bond Street, Toronto, by Rev. Thomas Sims, D. D., who has since been supplying Melrose, Mass., and other pulpits, is deeply regretted. Dr. Sims has been an able and judicious denominational leader, and it is sincerely hoped that he may not remove from the Dominion, but if he must go the Canadian churches will give him to those of the Republic with hearty good will and earnest prayer that upon both the rich blessing of the Master may long abide. Nor would they be selfish in this resolve to give up an honored worker, since Barrie has just called Rev. A. M. Lennox of Gutherie, Okl., and Alton and North Erin have brought back Rev. George Extence, who was loan to the North Dakota churches. These bret ren are most cordially welcomed to Canadi soil, where they will find ample opportuni for earnest, faithful work.

Annual Meetings.

The one universal thought among t churches at the present time is the annu meetings. A perusal of the reports sho clearly that the work of the twelve mont compares favorably with that of the year b fore. In the Maritime Provinces the difficu ties have been great, but the tone is hopefu and the brethren by the sea are to be congra ulated on the work of the year. Queb Province gives a splendid account of itse and from the records already announc mention might be made of Sherbrooke's i crease of the pastor's salary, Granby's r duction of the church debt, Westmount organization of a prosperous cause in a gro ing suburb of Montreal, and good work by t other churches of the city. In Ontario t churches are numerically stronger but fina cially weaker than those of Quebec. Wi many of them the problem has been a fina cial one, but even here are encouraging re ords of the year. Ottawa for the first time r ports two Congregational churches with tw regularly ordained pastors. At Kingston t chief facts so far announced are Bethel's pa ment of the remainder of a $600 debt a Calvary's successful special services.

The Toronto reports tell of Bond Street vacancy, the Northern's general activit Olivet's increase in finances and number Broadview Avenue's organization of a Boy Brigade which is now the largest in Canad Zion's conclusion of a long vacancy and Par dale's general advancement. London, Fir shows a reduction of the debt, and the Sout ern a new building upon which over $4,0 has been paid. Hamilton announces a goo year for both churches, while Brantford r ports an encouraging increase in membersh and the best financial showing for sever years. Other churches of Ontario, whe equally good service has been done, mig be named. The far West must not be forgo ten. Winnipeg, Central still holds an influe tial position, and with Maple Street Chur has done a good work in the Prairie Cit Brandon has been creditably grappling wi the church debt, while the Swedish church of Alberta have with self-sacrificing ener been occupied with the erection of two ne buildings. The Vancouver Church and pa tor on the Pacific coast have found compa ionship by the organization of a second chur in the Province at Victoria with a regul pastor, where good results are confidently e pected.

Principalship of the College.

The selection of a successor to Rev. W. Barbour, D.D., as principal of the college Montreal, is a matter of considerable intere at the present time. Dr. Barbour's resign tion will take effect at the end of June, a it is important that the office should be imm diately filled so that the work of the colle may not suffer. The committee appointed nominate a successor have approached Re J. H. George, D. D., pastor of the First Chur St. Louis, Mo., but no official announceme has been made as to the result.

Home Missionary Society.

The furtherance of the claims of the Hom Missionary Society is now an object of speci effort by the churches. Sunday, Feb. 14, announced for prayer and offering, and doubt the day will be generally observ throughout the Dominion. The appointme of a Home Missionary superintendent is al earnestly urged, and it is believed that su an official would do great service for t vacant churches and bring about largely i creased contributions to the funds of t treasury. The present hindrance in the wa of securing such an official is lack of mone for his salary. J. P. G.

AN INTERIOR CHURCH DEDICATION.

he new Union Church, Indianapolis, dedicated neat but inexpensive house Jan. 31. It is a frame lding, 32 by 60 feet, with lecture-room connect- by folding doors and a corner tower and vesti- e. The walled basement is used only for storage poses. The windows are of art glass, and the s in use come from People's Church. Union is eighborhood church surrounded by 300 families district between Fall Creek and White River, ewhat distant from other churches. A year ago ple felt that something should be done toward gious instruction and 30 women, representing denominations, none of them Congregational, ned an aid society and commenced raising ney to purchase a lot. Finally the C. H. M. S. called to assist by furnishing preaching. Rev.) Fisher has had charge of the enterprise. Mr. W. Stout of the Second Presbyterian Church, ry Ward Beecher's old church, gave the lot ch with the building represents a value of about 00. To pay last bills $120 were easily raised. house was crowded, two members were re- ved and the rite of baptism administered to sev- children. Rev. N. A. Hyde, D. D., preached the icatory sermon and Superintendent Curtis of- ed the prayer. The city pastors generally were sent and participated in the exercise. The peo- seem entirely harmonious, and the enterprise in spirit and union has been favorably commented n throughout the city.

QUARTER-CENTURY OF BIBLE TEACHING.

or 25 years Mr. C. W. Osgood of Bellows Falls been teacher of one Sunday school class in the st Church. Commemorating this fact over 100 mbers and friends of the class gathered at a re- tion in the vestry lately in spite of a severe rm. Bounteous refreshments were served and, owing, remarks emulating the faithful interest he teacher were made and several fitting toasts e responded to. Mr. Osgood also spoke pleas- ly of the past quarter-century, comparing devel- nents in other lines with the growth of Sunday ool work. An original poem was read, a review recent years in the class was given, and special sic was an attractive part of the celebration. ny who could not attend the exercises sent let- s of regret and congratulation. The class began h nine members and now numbers 300, with 83 ident members.

Rev. F. B. Perkins has just closed his course of six lectures on Foreign Missions. Their trend may be gathered from the admirable summary of the method of foreign missions on the syllabus, as follows: (1) An exemplary Christian life, (2) Gospel preaching and teaching, (3) Church organization, (4) Ecclesiastical training, (5) Schools and colleges, (6) Beginning of Christian literature, (7) Fraternal help in difficult problems, (8) Adieu.

NEW ENGLAND.

Boston.

Union meetings of six South End churches went forward successfully at the Warren Avenue Baptist Church last week. In the afternoons prayer meetings were held and in the evening Rev. W. E. Barton, D.D., preached. Nearly every evening the unconverted were urged either to come forward to the altar or to stand in their places and signify their desire to be Christians. This appeal met with gratifying responses. The meetings go on this week at the same church and next week will be transferred to Shawmut Church.

We are indebted to Rev. D. W. Waldron for statistics gathered by him and showing the present membership of the 43 Congregational Sunday schools in Boston—home, branch or mission—to be 11,930. The average attendance for the past year was 7,348, and the collections amounted to $8,305, or an average of nearly $200 a school. From these schools 192 persons joined the church on confession. Sunday schools apparently continue to be the chief feeders for the churches.

Berkeley Temple. In addition to what is known as the Murphy movement, the general character of which is well understood, there has been and is an unusual amount of interest among the young people in the Sunday school and in the two Societies of Christian Endeavor. Last week Sunday more than 50 young persons, including a large proportion of young men, signed cards expressing their personal acceptance of Christ. In the after meeting in the evening more than 40, including many heads of families, expressed a desire to become Christians.

ROXBURY.—Walnut Avenue. Rev. C. I. Schofield concluded, last Sunday, a series of special meetings which have been conducted in a way that has won hearty and general approval. About 60 persons have signed cards indicating their purpose to be Christians and to seek membership in some church.

DORCHESTER.—Second. Rev. Dr. Arthur Little preached to the Amherst students last Sunday, and his pulpit was supplied by Rev. E. G. Porter.——Pilgrim. The Fraternal Association celebrated its fifth anniversary last Sunday evening. Mr. Henry Goodwin gave the address on Fraternity. The organization merits congratulation on the success it has enjoyed.

Massachusetts.

BROOKLINE.—Harvard. The total benevolences last year aggregate a sum that is equaled by few churches in the denomination throughout the country. Counting in individual contributions to public charities amounting to $7,050, the total offerings were $23,513. The two largest gifts were to the American Board and the Home Missionary Society, $7,213 and $1,391, respectively. The present membership is 693; a net gain of 10 was made during last year. The new assistant pastor, Rev. O. D. Sewall, begins work March 1. The quality of the new organ, which cost $15,000, was exhibited at a recital last Monday afternoon before a large audience. A miscellaneous program gave ample opportunity to test every pipe and appliance.

NEWTON.—For the past week, under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A., Dr. Edward Judson of the Judson Memorial Church in New York has been conducting union meetings. He has proved himself a wise and effective worker and in response to his appeals a number have signified a desire to become Christians.

WEST MEDFORD.—On a recent Sunday the pastor, Rev. J. V. Clancy, made a brief statement to his congregation of the awful suffering caused by the famine in India. He then invited any who were so disposed to join him in a contribution for relief, to be sent to his brother, Rev. Rockwell Clancy of Allahabad, India, who is himself feeding daily, at his own expense, nearly a hundred starving children. The people responded by sending in as private offerings $120, which sum is now on its way to India.

QUINCY.—Bethany celebrated the close of its year by an elaborate annual supper, at which about 400 persons were present. The annual meeting followed and disclosed these facts: 27 new members, church incorporation, adoption of individual communion cups, opening of a training school for Christian service, Brotherhood of A. and P. started, special work for boys begun and a S. S. home department organized. Receipts for the year were $4,211 and expenses $4,088. The church membership is 320. Rev. E. N. Hardy is pastor.

IPSWICH.—First. The 50th anniversary of the dedication of the edifice was observed last Sunday. The morning service was a repetition of the original service of consecration. The house was well filled. Rev. Edward Constant, the pastor, gave a historical address in the afternoon, and ministers of other denominations had parts. The special music was appreciated and a display of 60 portraits of former members was a feature of unusual interest Evergreen decorations added much to the celebration.

SAXONVILLE.—The former pastor, Rev. G. A. Brock, was dismissed Jan. 26, and the new pastor, Rev. W. E. Dudley, at once takes up the work. The church is well located to become a strong center and looks forward with hope to the work under its young leader.

AMESBURY.—Main Street. The revival which swept the town in the yearly winter has not yet subsided. At this church there is a great interest in Bible study. The Sunday school gathers as large a congregation as the church service which precedes it, and the adults of the parish are being gathered in groups of 25 for further Bible study under the direction of the pastor, Rev. G. L. Richmond. Sixty-eight persons united with the church Jan. 31, 61 on confession. Extra services are still needed to meet the demand of the people for religious instruction. The S. S. enrollment is about 300 ——Union. The pastor, Rev. G. W. Christie, has recently given his third reading before Newburyport audiences from the writings of Ian Maclaren. Mr. Christie's dialect reading is of the pure Scotch, and his personal stories and explanations add interest to the hour.

ATTLEBORO.—Second, Rev. E. L. House, pastor, had a large attendance at its annual meeting. All reports were encouraging. Sixty-eight new members have united with the church, 56 on confession, the net gain being 52. The membership at present is 476. Not a communion has passed during the present pastorate without additions. Benevolences amounted to $2,200. The Men's Club prospers, gathering congregations that tax the seating capacity of the house. The people are eager that the pastor should not accept his call to Somerville.

WORCESTER.—Belmont. Rev. W. B. Oleson has been confined to his home several weeks by sickness. The church has voted to engage him as pastor for another year.——Summer Street, which was organized over 30 years ago as the mission chapel, proposes to move from its present locality, which is fast becoming a center of wholesale and manufacturing business, to a place further north, and perhaps to unite with Belmont Church.——Pres. G. S. Hall of Clark University recently gave an address before the Ministerial League on The Basis of Religious Teaching. He stated that latest investigations show that neither the intellect nor the will, but the heart, is the real basis of moral and religious character.——The Worcester Central Association has sent to the U. S. Senate a strong resolution urging the speedy passage of the arbitration treaty.——The C. E. local union has pledged $1,000 toward the support of Welcome Mission, and apportioned the amount among the 47 societies in the union. The societies are responding favorably.

WEBSTER.—Union meetings were held for four weeks with great increase of faith and earnestness in the work, and with manifest presence of the Holy Spirit. Some were converted and some others brought to willingness to confess Christ before men. The annual meeting of the society revealed a harmonious spirit and a balance in the treasury. Rev. H. A. Blake is pastor.

LEICESTER reports over $1,200 for benevolences the past year. This amount includes $100 special collections for the Armenians. The expenditures were $1,842. The Men's Sunday Evening League, organized a year ago, continues more prosperously than ever. Rev. D. C. Reid is pastor.

WEST BOYLSTON.—The parish has voted to sell the church property for $18,000 to the Metropolitan Water Board. A lower offer was first refused. The society is granted use of the house, free of rent, till 1900. About two-thirds of the church members, who number 115, will be affected by the building of the new reservoir.

WILLIAMSBURGH.—Mrs. L. D. James, a member of the church, has offered to build a greatly needed chapel, provided $1,000 are raised for repairs on the edifice. The conditions of the generous offer are likely to be met.

MOORES CORNER has just closed a three weeks' special series of meetings. A good attendance continued throughout and more than 10 persons manifested a desire to lead a Christian life. The whole neighborhood has been stirred. Mr. W. S. Anderson assisted Rev. J. C. Wightman, the pastor.

WILLIAMSTOWN.—White Oaks, in charge of Mr. Stryker, and the church at South Williamstown, in the care of Mr. Merritt, are enjoying seasons of special religious interest. These young men are students in Williams College and are doing earnest and effective work.——First made a special contribution last year of $370 towards the debt of the American Board, giving to foreign missions during the year $839. The entire benevolence for the year was nearly $1,700. The pastor, Rev. William Slade, has withdrawn his resignation for the present only, not permanently, as has been reported in some instances.

Maine.

HOLDEN AND DEDHAM.—Rev. H. A. Freeman is to have the assistance of Misses Washburn and Burdette to cover his large field. His work is hopeful. Most of the congregation attend the Sunday school. The pastor conducts a class of men.

FORT FAIRFIELD.—Rev. G. B. Hescock is taking a few weeks of rest, and is improving in health so as to be able to resume his duties soon. The pulpit has been supplied by Rev. C. V. Parsons, a Free Baptist minister resident in the place.

Special meetings continue, since the Week of Prayer, at Gorham, Madison and with much interest at Yarmouth.——Evangelistic efforts at Bluehill are fully attended.——Vesper services at Houlton are held regularly and are well sustained.

New Hampshire.

MANCHESTER.—Franklin Street reported encouragement at its late annual meeting. During the year 14 persons were received to the church, three on confession, making the present membership 539. The Sunday school enrolls 381. The church has received $5,000 from the estate of Mrs. M. A. Brown, the income of which is to be used in benevolences. ——First. More than 300 persons attended the annual church meeting. Reports of the different departments were mainly encouraging. During the year 14 were added to the church, three on confession, making the total membership 679. The parish embraces 585 families. The Sunday school enrolls 551 names. Benevolences the past year were $749 to foreign and $1,248 to the various home missions.

SWANZEY.—The citizens gave the new pastor, Rev. V. W. Blackman and wife, a rousing reception last Friday evening. Over 200 persons were introduced to them and many speeches were made and refreshments served. The Sunday congregations are growing and the prayer meetings are well attended. Before Mr. Blackman left Bethel, Vt., where he served three years, he received $26 in gold as an expression of confidence. To his wife was given a silver card basket.

CONCORD.—South. The evening service, Jan. 31, commemorated the 60th anniversary of the church. One of the original members was present. Several of the oldest resident members of church and parish gave interesting reminiscences of the earlier pastorates and departments of church work and brief biographical sketches of former deceased members.

SOUTH SEABROOK held appropriate services, Jan. 31, commemorative of the 30th anniversary of the pastorate of Rev. W. A. Rand. Meetings are held every evening, as the steadily deepening interest since the Week of Prayer encourages their continuance.

AMHERST.—The church received 29 new members the past year, 22 on confession. The present membership is 185. Outside benevolences were $700. A new church manual has just been issued.

Reports for the Year-Book show a loss of over 400 in the Sunday schools, but a gain in all other lines. The church at North Barnstead has been added to the list. Thirty-one churches are without pastoral supply, but most of them are not able, even with the missionary help, to support a minister. Over 450 new members have been added to the churches on confession, giving a net gain of 43. Most surprising is the gain of $129 in benevolences and $39,674 in home expenses.

Vermont.

MCINDOES.—The latest developments in the case of A. S. McGowan, alias David Martin, indicate that he served in Baptist churches in Massachusetts, New Jersey and the West. Charges of gross immorality were brought against him in this connection, and he was, by action of council, deposed from the Baptist ministry. Unanimous action has been taken by the McIndoes church, rescinding the favorable resolutions passed and demanding their return. Mr. McGowan has left for parts unknown. His wife and two children remain in the parsonage.

LOWELL.—Rev. L. B. Atwood is to close his labors here March 14, and will move his family to Westfield, formerly yoked with Lowell, where he will continue to supply.

BENNINGTON.—North. Union revival meetings have been held in the churches, the pastors being assisted by Rev. Mr. Cull, the State Baptist Evangelist.

Townshend, West, has held special revival services, Rev. A. J. Cameron assisting.——Caledonia County has been stirred in Sunday school interests lately by a series of meetings conducted by State Secretary J. B. Miller.

Connecticut.

NEW HAVEN.—The union ministers' meeting is organized for the year and officers are elected. The meetings are held on three Monday mornings of each month and are full of interest, and the discussions are particularly valuable since the association includes many of the professors of Yale College and of the divinity school as well as the leading clergymen of the city and vicinity.——Howard Avenue. The Ladies' Society has raised $414 during the year, filled a large home missionary box and provided for improvements on the meeting house. During the past year the S S average attendance has increased from 218 to 243. The teachers of the school have joined the normal class taught by Prof. F. K. Sanders of Yale ——United. The Men's Club service last Sunday evening was addressed by Rev. A. H. Bradford, D. D., of Montclair, N. J., on Oliver Cromwell.——Center. The benevolences for the year were over $11,000.——Plymouth. This church, formerly known as College Street, has had an unexpectedly prosperous year, the first in its new location.

NORWALK.—First gives encouraging reports from the various departments, showing that the past year has been one of marked prosperity. Nearly $7,000 have been raised for home work, and more than $3,000 for benevolences. Thirty-one new members have been added to the church, and 36 to the Sunday school. New members have been added to the church at every communion during the present seven years' pastorate. The membership is now 540. The 80th anniversary of the Ladies' Association was observed fittingly by a birthday fête, which was a memorable occasion. Rev. T. K. Noble is pastor.

SOUTH NORWALK, Rev. G. H. Beard, pastor, increased its benevolent contributions last year more than $1,000 over 1895, besides paying $10,608, the first installment on its building debt subscribed a year ago. Moreover, this is by no means a wealthy church. The reports at the annual meeting showed: 29 new members received, 1,800 visits made, chiefly on the poor, the sick and the stranger, 800 garments given to the poor, 1,100 bouquets of flowers sent to the sick in homes and hospitals, 100 needy families supplied with groceries, $3,082 given to Christian benevolence, $15,370 paid on church building and for expenses.

HARTFORD.—Fourth's benevolences last year amounted to $901. The present membership is 894, 71 of whom were received during the year.——Park. The year's expenditures were $1,094, leaving a small balance.——South. The mahogany pulpit, which was put in and first used when the edifice was dedicated in 1827, and the mahogany communion table of the same date have been placed in the auditorium. The repairs on the chapel are about completed.——Fourth The recent trial scene of Luther at Worms presented in Foot Guard Hall raised $450 for the church building fund.

WEST HAVEN.—First had 33 additions last year, 24 on confession. The present membership is 344. All bills have been paid, and a balance of $200 remains. The S. S. enrollment is 428. The ladies raised $600 to apply on the chapel debt, and the missionary society, besides raising considerable money for missionary purposes, sent a barrel valued at $92 to Nebraska, and did much charitable work at Thanksgiving and Christmas. Rev. N. J. Squires is beginning his 17th year as pastor.

VERNON was organized with 35 members in 1762. The first house of worship had no pews for eight years, the attendants standing up or providing eac for his own comfort. The day after the edifice w dedicated in 1827 the pews were sold for $7,700, mo than the building cost by $700. The church has se missionaries to California, Mexico, China, Japa and Africa. It has no settled pastor at present.

NEW BRITAIN.—First. Rev. G. H. Sandwell h been granted a three months' leave of absence, ar will sail for Europe with Mrs. Sandwell next wee It is hoped that a stay on the south coast of En land will benefit Mrs. Sandwell's health, which h been cause for much anxiety of late. Arrang ments are fully made for pulpit supply during th pastor's absence.

BRIDGEPORT.—South had a notable year for i crease in all lines. The membership gained largel 21 on confession, 27 by letter. The S. S. averag attendance is almost twice as large as a year and half ago An enlargement and improvement of th church building is talked of.——The pastors of th city have voted not to hold the usual union Lent services.

WINSTED.—First had an unusually large dea loss last year, but additions of 32, 22 being on co fession, make a net gain of 11 in membership. Th total of members is 366. Rev. G. F. Prentiss is pa tor.——Second. The remodeling of the church ar chapel, now under way, will probably be complet before the pastorate is filled.

PLYMOUTH had 16 additions during 1896 and increase in the Sunday school membership and the average attendance. The old church debt ar all other debts were paid, and a balance remain in the treasury. Rev. C. H. Smith is pastor.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

NEW HAVEN, an old hill town church of only 1 members, gave $310 for missionary purposes la year. A novel custon observed this year, as fo merly, was the writing by the individuals of t congregation their desires, purposes and reques for the unknown year before them, and havi them read from the pulpit. The custom has creat much interest and been found profitable. The pa tor is Rev. Samuel Johnson, one of the Nestors Congregationalism in the State.

NEW YORK.—Trinity has reduced its mortga to $1,650 and closed the year without a floating i debtedness. The work is well organized and sy tematically carried on. The men's annual dinner successful in reaching the male members of t congregation and promoting sociability amo them. The speeches by the men themselves we full of useful information and were much enjoye Rev. Franklin Gaylord is pastor.

HOMER.—Rev. F. A. S. Storer, the pastor, is doi finely along all lines. Last year had a better fina cial showing and also larger gifts for missio The congregations have doubled in numbers. new feature in evening services is a choir of you men. Mrs. Storer is a prominent primary work and this department has grown very large in t Sunday school.

CANANDAIGUA, Rev. C. H. Dickinson, pasto has recently sent $100 as a special offering to t Home Missionary Society for the relief of the su fering missionaries in the West.

BERKSHIRE.—Rev. J. J. Hough, the pastor, bei in feeble health, the C. E. Society conducts t meetings of the week.

New Jersey.

JERSEY CITY.—First has purchased the house a joining the hill church edifice as a parsonage the assistant pastor, Rev. J. L. Wells. He is giving a monthly series of stereopticon sermons on the Messiah at both churches. A Men's Club has been formed.——The People's Palace has given two large receptions within a few weeks. The past year has been a busy one. The amusement hall has been enlarged, a playroom and bathing facilities have been added to the day nursery, and shower-baths and a visitors' gallery to the gymnasium. Nearly 1,650 children have been cared for, 460 young men have become members, 820 pupils have been enrolled in the educational classes, and about 40,000 people have been visitors. In the summer over 12,000 free baths were given to the boys of the city.

Orange.—So many in the church are systematically studying the Sunday school lessons that the pastor usually preaches on some point of the lesson on Sunday evenings. The new home department numbers 60. For benevolent purposes $2,600 were raised last year, including shares taken in the Howard Roll and the A. M. A. Jubilee Funds. Congregational Work is taken in nearly all the families. The Young People's Societies now have 133 members and are flourishing. The pastor, Rev. C. A. Savage, with a neighboring Presbyterian pastor, is bringing into life the Orange Valley Social Institute, to take the place of defunct Y. M. C. A. and with much the same aims. More stress is laid on good citizenship.

Plainfield.—In spite of the times the benevolences for 1896 showed a substantial advance over those of the year before, and surpassed those of any previous year. The people have presented the pastor with a bicycle and his wife with a handsome Persian rug. The spiritual interest has been marked of late. The laymen have conducted a series of midweek services that were varied, interesting and profitable. There are 25 in the home department of the Sunday school and 80 in the Young People's Societies.

Westfield.—The beneficence of the church this past year amounts to over $1,000 more than that of the year before and to over $300 more than its home expenditures. Ten have been added to the membership.

Pennsylvania.

Mt. Carmel.—At recent communion services the additions have been large, and the church, formerly having a membership of about 60, has nearly doubled in size. At the last communion 18 members were received. A new edifice is now planned for. The financial conditions are the most encouraging in the history of the church. Rev. R. N. Harris is pastor.

THE SOUTH.

Maryland.

Baltimore.—The annual meetings of the four churches have all been held, and last year's work shows good progress despite of financial discouragement. About 50 new members have been added to the churches, 30 on confession. Home expenses have increased $600 to a total of $6,690; benevolences aggregate this year $1,751, a slight decrease from last year.——Second. The pastor conducts a class in study of good literature.——Canton and Fourth. Successful reading-rooms and night schools are conducted.——The Lawrence Memorial Association, a settlement conducted in part by members of the First Church, has been enabled to purchase the house it has used, and thus the work becomes more permanent and effective.

North Carolina.

Scarcely any of the 19 new A. M. A. churches which have lately come into the Congregational ranks in the State have a better service for communion than earthen plates, a common pitcher and tumblers. Any churches which have old sets laid aside, or are about to change, would greatly aid these churches by a gift of the old sets. Rev. A. W. Curtis, the general missionary, Raleigh, will receive them.

THE INTERIOR.

Ohio.

Cleveland.—Lakeview held special services every night in January. During the last three weeks the help of Rev. A. T. Reed was secured, whose labors were greatly blessed. About 90 unconverted persons signed cards, of whom 55 took further steps in public avowal of Christ as their Saviour. They represented all ages. The church was deeply quickened, the audiences included an unusual proportion of the impenitent, and the pastor, Rev. A. B. Cristy, felt greatly strengthened.——Pilgrim. Rev. C. S. Mills preached lately on A New Chapter in the Gospel of Peace, strongly setting forth the importance of the new British-American treaty. At the close of service the congregation by unanimous vote appointed a committee to send resolutions to the Ohio senators urging them to vote and work for ratification. The sermon was published at length the next morning in the leading daily papers, and the church voted to print it in pamphlet form for wider circulation. The Sacred Music Society rendered Sullivan's oratorio, The Prodigal Son, at a recent Sunday evening service. A congregation of about 1,600 was present. Mr. Mills, the pastor, received from the church a gift of $500 in gold, and Rev. I. W. Metcalf, his associate, $200, at the close of last year.——Euclid Avenue. Rev. H. M. Ladd, D. D., after 14 years as pastor, resigned Jan. 31. He becomes financial manager of the Ohio Anti-Saloon League, which is doing important work throughout the State. During his pastorate the fine stone building which the church now occupies was erected, largely because of the faith and courage of his leadership. The church has increased largely in membership and benevolences and has sent out colonies which have grown into four strong churches—East Madison Avenue, Park, Hough Avenue and Lakeview, the first three now self-supporting and the last still receiving some help from the mother church. Dr. Ladd was one of the founders of the City Missionary Society and has always been one of its wisest counselors and most earnest supporters. He will continue to reside in Cleveland.
